44 But this is on Mount Horeb, which is a barren place; there is a barren land around it, and it was a great mountain, like the Bohemian and Thuringian forests. This mountain range had many pieces or parts, and therefore also received many names, so that it was called Mount Horeb, item, Mount Sinai; it was located in a barren wasteland or desert. This means that the gospel is preached and water is given from a hard rock, nowhere else, because where there are dry, arid hearts, that is, miserable, afflicted sinners. As you have often heard before, that the gospel nowhere preaches rich consolation, or is drawn to the heart, except among thirsty, hungry, and meager souls. As the Magnificat [Luc. 1, 53.] also thus sings, "He hath filled the hungry with good things." It is also said of the Lord Christ: "The gospel is preached to the poor" [Matth. 11, 5. Luc. 7, 22].

45 Our Lord God's way is to create and work only where there is nothing. For God does not deal with that which is high and great except to break it. Again, he deals with the poor in such a way that he comforts them, and that he makes the dead alive, and preaches forgiveness of sin to them through the gospel, making souls and consciences cheerful and courageous. For where the soul is sinful and the conscience is troubled, it is given strength and power again at Mount Horeb. The prophet Elijah also saw at this mountain Horeb

1 Kings 19:8] that we may see that the prophets and the law have much to do with this mountain; that is, the law drives men to recognize their sin. For Moses comes and strikes the rock with a rod, and water comes out; that is, the Holy Spirit is given to them, so that they are refreshed and refreshed.

46 This is the temptation or strife of Massa Meriba. For in Horeb it is thus: When the law is preached, it humbles the consciences, it reveals sin, so that strife and contention are not left out. For there are some hearts that want to deal with God through their values, and strive against the gospel, not accepting it, as the Jews do, Apost. 13, 46, but others accept it with faith. This struggle and quarrel remains, that these want works, but those want faith; these do not want to suffer the gospel, but others want to have it. And such quarrels continue to this day, which happened at Massa Meriba. As it is also said in the 95th Psalm, v. 7, 8, when David speaks of the new ministry: "Today, when you hear my voice, do not harden your hearts, as you did at Meribah," but accept the voice without quarreling, and let your good works always fall away.

047 Now also let us hear of Amalek, what he is. Joshua was commanded to choose men of war, and to fight against Amalek: but Moses tarried in the mount, and lifted up his hands, and prayed. And while he lifted up his hands, Israel lay on high; but when he let down his arms, Israel lost. For Moses' . Hands became heavy, 1) therefore Moses had to sit down, and stones were put under his arms. But there were two on either side of him, holding up Moses' hands.

48 Now here are two histories. The holy scripture calls the people Amalek the firstlings among the Gentiles, as Balaam says in the fourth book of Moses [24, 20.]: Primitiae gentium Amalek, that is, when Israel went out of Egypt, the Amalekites were the first of the Gentiles, when they passed through, and they also set themselves against the children of Israel. Therefore it was written, Deut. 25:17-19, that they should be destroyed, because they first set themselves against Israel; as it is said there, "Remember what the Amalekites did to you on the way when you came out of Egypt, how they attacked you on the way, and struck those who were behind you, all the weak who were following behind, when you were tired and weary, and did not fear God. Now therefore, when the LORD thy God bringeth thee to rest from all thine enemies round about, in the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee for an inheritance to possess, then thou shalt blot out the remembrance of the Amalekites from under heaven; this forget not." And this was accomplished by Saul and Samuel, who drove out and destroyed these enemies.

1) Eislebensche: heavier.

(49) This people Amalek means the Jews, or the people of Israel. For when the Lord Christ came to earth, they opposed Christ with all power and authority. This people became the real Amalek. For when the gospel was preached by John the Baptist, by the Lord Christ Himself, and by the dear apostles, they were the very first to oppose the divine word, to persecute it with great earnestness, and to kill many Christians. Nor do they yet respect the divine word, for that is their office, to fight against Christ with the sword and with the tongue. It is a spiritual war and strife. But it is as it is written of Amalek, that there was an everlasting war between Amalek and the children of Israel, until the Amalekites were destroyed. So God also inflicted His punishments on the Amalekites for and for, and punished them until the third and fourth generations.

(50) Through the apostles and their preaching, the Jewish Amalekites were faithfully enough warned at that time; but because it was of no avail, their faith came into the hands of the Romans, by whom the Jewish people is subdued, and is still today disturbed and eradicated by the gospel, so that they can no longer do anything. And even if they, the Jews, hide themselves now and then in the countries, they cannot regain their strength so that they can

They were to become a nation of their own, to have their own king and their own head. Just as Amalek was never restored to a kingdom of its own; but since it was at first such a great, glorious kingdom, and, provided with all kinds of supplies, stood together like a mighty, great lake, or a deep-flowing water, it then became as small and little as a brook, where one might wade through with one's feet, as Isaiah the prophet [Cap. 11:15] speaks of it.

51 Joshua chose men to fight against Amalek, that is, God raised up preachers and apostles to fight against the Jews. And these fence and fight with the sword of the Spirit, that is, with the gospel.

(52) But this is of little avail, if our Moses, that is, the Lord Christ, were not on the top of the mountain, and our Prince and Lord. For we only speak the word, and preach it; but where he does not stir the heart, and give the Holy Spirit, and awaken faith in us, and comfort and strengthen us, it is done. This is shown in that Moses with his lifting up of hands contends more than Joshua with his sword; that is, we preach, but he gives the prosperity and the emphasis to it, as St. Paul [1 Cor. 3, 6.] also testifies, saying, "Paul planted, and Apollo watered, but God gave the prosperity to it." So Moses is here an image and figure of the Lord Christ, because all figures are to be drawn to Christ.

53. but Moses having heavy hands 2c. means Moses' preaching ministry, or the teaching of the law. For when Moses' ministry is going on, and the law is being enforced, his hands are heavy, that is, the works of the law are hard to do. But we do not have Moses in the New Testament as the Jews had him; we have only half of Moses; he does nothing more for us Christians than that we are initially brought to the knowledge of sins through him; as Paul says [Rom. 3:20] that sin is known through the law. After this we have Christ, who rules the inner man by the Holy Spirit, but his hands are still heavy in the matter of the heart. For he has yet

There are many weak Christians who cannot follow through with their works; as St. Paul also complains to the Romans [Cap. 7, 18. 19.] about this; the old rascal does not want to follow through. According to the inward law it is all fulfilled, but according to the old Adam the hands are still heavy, it will not follow, there the law is a heavy load and burden, so there presses and weighs down. "For the flesh lusteth against the Spirit," says St. Paul [Gal. 5:17]. And the Lord Christ [Matt. 26:41] says, "The spirit is willing, but the flesh is weak." The flesh always draws us back from the Spirit.

But the two servants who lift up Moses' hands also signify the ministry of preaching in both testaments. One must resist on the right hand and on the left hand with admonishing, stopping, punishing, forbidding, promising and comforting. One must resist, so that one does not become horny, slothful and lazy, as our flesh and blood would have its desire to do. Thus the word wants to be driven, so that we can

Let the flesh and the spirit be bold. When the spirit rules freshly, there is no need for the flesh, if only we are confident in the word. With the preaching of the divine word, the flesh must be kept in check.

V.15. And Moses built an altar, and called it, The LORD Nissi (that is, a host sign, a panier).

This altar is Jesus Christ, who is our ensign or banner [Isa. 5:26], on which altar we sacrifice, that is, give thanks and praise to God. For we have the gospel and the Holy Spirit, and know Christ, and also do Christian works here in the flesh. This is our sign, that in Christ and through Christ we give thanks to God for His holy Word. Otherwise the preachers here have made a vain Moses. Now it is good that Moses should be in part according to the outward man, but inwardly Moses should have nothing to do, but Christ alone should reign.

V.1-8. And when Jethro the priest of Midian, Moses' brother-in-law, heard all that God had done for Moses and his people Israel, that the Lord had brought Israel out of Egypt, he took Zipora, Moses' wife, whom he had sent back, and her two sons. One of them was named Gershon, for he said: I am a sojourner in a strange land; and the other was called Eliezer, because he said, The God of my father hath been my help, and hath delivered me from the sword of Pharaoh. And it came to pass, when Jethro Moses' servant, and his sons, and his wife, were come unto him into the wilderness, unto the mountain of God, where he had pitched his tent, that he said unto Moses, I, Jethro thy servant, am come unto thee, and thy wife, and her two sons with her. And Moses went out to meet him, and bowed himself to him, and kissed him. And when they had saluted one another, they went into the tabernacle. Then Moses told his brother-in-law all that the LORD had told Pharaoh and the Egyptians.

Israel, and all the trouble they had encountered on the way, and that the Lord had saved them 2c.

(1) Before this spiritual government is appointed, Moses ordains the temporal government; for otherwise the gospel cannot be well preached, except there be first quiet in a land, and good peace be made: wherefore Moses setteth this chapter before. For where there is no peace or quiet, the gospel is not to be preached.

2 In this chapter he describes how his brother Jethro, the priest in Midian, comes to him in the desert, bringing Ziporam, Moses' wife, and his two sons with him. For in chapter 2, vv. 15, 16, we heard how Moses escaped from Egypt before Pharaoh, and stayed with the priest in Midian, tending sheep there, until he gave him his daughter in marriage, with whom he begat two sons. And when he returned to Egypt, he sent the woman with the children.

They returned to their father, who is called Reguel above [Ex. 2:18], but here he is called Jethro. Perhaps Jethro was the stepfather of the woman, and Reguel, the right father, will now have died. When this Jethro hears that the children of Israel have gone out of Egypt into the wilderness, 1) he comes to his daughter's husband, Moses, and brings him the woman and her children.

(3) But what is this to us? Why is it written that one brings Mosi his wife and two sons, and after that Jethro is truly converted, recognizes the true God, and after that sacrifices to him? We will take three pieces or three lessons from this. First: Moses was in office, called by God and required to plague the kingdom of Egypt and King Pharaoh, and to lead the people of Israel out of the house of Egypt. For this reason he left his house and farm, his wife and child in Midian and gave them to our Lord God, who was waiting here for his house, his possessions and goods, his wife and child. He takes care of all this much better than if Moses himself had been present. But because Moses has been obedient to God, and has diligently followed the work that God has commanded him to do, God again honors him by providing for his wife and child, and in due time has them brought to Moses more gloriously than might otherwise have been done.

4 From this then we are to take this lesson, that if we go along in obedience to God, and for His sake we must leave house and farm and other goods, that we grieve not for them, nor grieve too hard. It shall be much better with the goods than before; they have then been commanded to the right householder. When Moses was about to take his wife and child from Midian to Egypt, he was sick to death, so he had to send them back. Now that he does not have them with him, he is much happier than when they were around and beside him. So God wants to teach us to trust in Him and to leave everything for His sake, because He is able to preserve it, to protect it and to protect it.

and give it back much more abundantly than we would wish or desire. Therefore it is also said by the Lord Christ in the Gospel [Matth. 19, 29.]: Whoever leaves field, house, yard, wife and child, for my name's sake, he shall have it back by the hundredfold. Otherwise, if they had gone away with each other, perhaps they or he would have died in Egypt. But now they have all remained alive and are reunited fresh and healthy.

(5) Secondly, so that this great miracle and work, as the redemption of the children of Israel from Egypt, would not remain unfruitful, here he states that the Gentiles also enjoyed this exodus, so that the Jews would not boast that they alone knew God, but the Gentiles now also know Him; God also has His saints and elect among them. He does not want to be the God of the Jews alone, but also of the Gentiles [Rom. 3, 29], yes, the Lord and God of all creatures. Therefore, when He brought the children of Israel out of the house of Egypt, and they murmured much, and were not reformed, God went and accepted the Gentiles also among His people. For this Gentile, Jethro, repents and turns to God, and rejoices in the knowledge of the true God, and in the glorious good deed that God has done for the children of Israel, in that He has liberated them from the house of Egypt with a mighty hand. And although this may be considered a bad and small thing, and seems as if Jethro alone had come to Moses in the wilderness, he certainly brought many people with him, for he 2) was a regent, even the head in Midian.

The Midianites came from Abraham, from Keturah, Abraham's wife, as it is written in Genesis chapter 25, v. 2. With this, God wanted to indicate that the people of Israel was separated from other people with outward statutes, here on earth, for the sake of this cause: for Christ was to take his humanity from this people. Nevertheless, he also reserved for him the Gentiles, to whom he gave faith and the Holy Spirit inwardly, even though he did not have a

2) Erlanger: es.

He made an outward distinction with them, as with the Jews and Isaac's seed. They also did not have Moses and the prophets, he did not separate them from others like the Jews, but inwardly he keeps them as good as the Jews, he gives them the same faith, knowledge of God and the Holy Spirit. Therefore, God has His church and a large number of believers even among the Gentiles; as the examples of Melchizedek, Job, Naaman Syri, the Ninevites and others show.

(7) Thus he was a priest and ruler, as the ancient fathers also ruled, as kings and princes do now, yet he also preached with them, and taught the people as a priest. For the secular realm was not so separated from the ministry of preaching then as it is now. And because he was in the holy office of preaching and believed, he did not keep this treasure and knowledge of God for himself, but he was to put it on and grow with it, as the Lord Christ Matthew testifies in the 25th chapter, v. 14 ff. Therefore, without a doubt, through him the land of Midian was converted and came to the knowledge of the word of God, just as the children of Israel had the same. So that the knowledge of God and the faith were spread far and wide, and did not remain with the Jews alone, but the Gentiles also enjoyed it. For God's works were to be known throughout the world, so that God would be praised and glorified not only by the Jews, but by all people in the world; as follows in the text.

V. 10, 11: And Jethro said, Blessed be the LORD, which hath delivered you out of the hand of Egypt, and out of the hand of Pharaoh, who knoweth how to deliver his people out of the hand of Egypt. Now I know that the LORD is greater than all the gods, because they have exalted themselves against them.

8. Jethro praises God and confesses Him before all men, making his confession. This is the right sacrifice that he can make to God, so that after knowing God, one rejoices that God is the Lord who saved Israel from Pharaoh; therefore he alone is the right God, above all others, who can control the great trees so that they do not grow into the heavens. Thus the Egyptians are

Those who have been sure and presumptuous have shown arrogance toward the poor Israelites. He who therefore knows God has known Him well and rightly; and thus He wants to be praised and known, so that one may know that He is such a God who can help all who are in need and desire His help; who also humbles all trustworthy and high people [1 Petr. 5:5].

Now this is what he praises about God, how he is above all gods and can by no means tolerate the arrogant and arrogant next to him; therefore he was not one with the Egyptians. For the Egyptians were arrogant and too brave and oppressed the people of Israel; no one can help them but this God. And with this God we also want to keep it, who is such a God that he can help and save from all distress, and humble the hopeful. But where are those who believe both? They despise both. For those who are proud, arrogant and proud do not think that God will see or avenge them; they want to know that God is merciful and forgives with punishment, so that they have room for their wickedness, and that their evil deeds often go away for a while [Ps. 64:6]. For God sees through their fingers, that is what makes them so bold; that is why they do not believe that there is a God. For they carry out their ungodly nature as they see fit [Ps. 14:1, 53:2].

(10) Now what happens on this side with us, who should believe and suffer? Here, too, we do not believe that God will turn great lords and merchants into little ones or none at all, or rich people into poor and beggars, or wise men, wise men and scholars into fools, or saints into disgrace. Yes, we also do not believe that God has an eye on us and asks something of us. If I lack food, or am in danger of death, or come into disgrace and ignominy, from that moment I think that I am finished, and that there is no one left who can help me. Or, if it otherwise happens that the heart is sad and one is in misfortune, then no one believes that God is with us; yet God preaches about Himself and says that He is present with us in distress; as Ps. 91:15: "I am with you.

I am with him in trouble, I will help him out and save him. He also proves it honestly, as in the case of Pharaoh, whom he can throw into the Red Sea and free the children of Israel from his tyranny. Who else would have helped this people? There was no one who ever took care of them or thought to save them.

(11) Therefore, remember this also: "Whatever happens to me, God is at home. Now if I know God, and know that there is a God, then think and be sure that he looks upon you; for this is his way, that he looks upon us, inquires after us, and takes heed, and is anxious that he may help us. For he is such a God, who sings, says and writes these things of himself, that he exalts the oppressed and the lowly, and in turn overthrows the mighty from the throne, or presses the trustworthy to the ground [Luc. 1, 51. 52.]. But because we do not believe, we are not saved; but those who believe, he faithfully helps, even if it takes a while, but he comes at last [Hab. 2, 3], and does not lack who alone can endure him, as the holy Scriptures very diligently exhort to this.

(12) He had such light in his heart that he sang with joy, as if to say, "I praise God, who helps the miserable and overthrows all the high and proud. Let anyone who wants to show himself to be a Christian sing this song or chant after him,

Now a question arises: Are there more gods than one? You heard above [Cap. 12, 12] that since the firstborn were all slain, God had passed judgment on the gods in Egypt. Now the Egyptians were a foolish people, full of gods; though they were also the wisest people under the sun, for which I hold them wholly. For Joseph and the children of Israel brought in a great light, for in Israel alone the right God was known [Ps. 76:3], and the same they also preached and made known. As the 105th Psalm, v. 22, says: Joseph taught the wise men in Egypt and taught them about God.

14. but later they are from this knowledge of god and the bright light like who fell away, and became much more blind than any other; as it is thus wont to happen that after great, bright light also great darknesses are wont to follow. That is why in Egypt they used to worship cows and oxen, calves, dogs, cats and birds, as well as the sun and the moon. And in the following chapters we will hear how the children of Israel learned this from the Egyptians, and how they erected a golden calf and danced around it. But what are these gods? It is the same for us. If we have lacked the right God on one side, then we have lacked him altogether, and he who does not fully grasp him has nothing of him; only that we do not set up such idolatrous images as they did.

(15) But if I believe that God is reconciled and satisfied by the masses, and do not accept the man Jesus Christ, who was born of the Virgin Mary, and suffered and died for me, is this not God's fault? I call with my mouth the right name of God and of the Lord Christ, but in my heart I have forgotten him. For my thoughts are not righteous in my heart, and I take my own conceit and follow it, of which the holy Scripture teaches nothing, but rather fiercely refuses and despises it; and this not with the cutting of the throat (as one is wont to say), but with the highest loss, namely the salvation of the soul; and thus I have blasphemed and desecrated the divine name, and made myself another god. For it should please the Lord Christ what is beloved to me, since it should rather please me what is beloved to Christ; for he is to master me, and I or others are not to master him. But so the devil gives me the conceit, and presupposes me, that he daubs the name of Christ and God upon it; and so one is deceived. On the other hand, the holy scripture teaches me that this pleases him, and that this is God's eternal will, to believe in Christ and to rely on his suffering, death and bloodshed, as John 6:29 says: "This is God's work, that you believe in him whom he has sent," and not to set up any work on which I place my comfort; then I will meet him.

(16) And so the whole world in our time has been in idolatry. It has fallen into this, so that at first they have wavered a little and stumbled, and then they have grown more and more into greater error, until all the earth has become full of idols, as the prophet Zephaniah says in the first chapter, v. 4 ff.

017 So it was with Jeroboam, when he prepared two calves, one in Dan, and the other in Bethel, and worshipped and sacrificed there, and there was the same worship that was in Jerusalem; and he smeared the name thereon, saying, Israel, here is thy God that brought thee up out of Egypt [1 Kings 12:28, 29]. This king Jeroboam knew well of the true God who is in heaven, and who had helped the children of Israel out of the house of Egypt; nor did he take this name and put it on his idolatry, saying, "The same God is honored here with these calves, he is served there, and the service which they did with these calves should please him, when God had said in his word, "In Jerusalem I will be honored and called, where the mercy seat is" [2 Kings 21:4]. 21, 4.]. But all this did not apply; therefore they came and went on, and established special services here in one city and there in another, and followed this example of Jeroboam, that they built altars in all the pleasant valleys and green pastures, and made the land all full of worship, so that one could not think of any more. But it was all said: Behold, this is the God who brought us out of Egypt and gave the promise to our fathers. There the name remained, but the heart and the opinion were wrong. This is now the name of God blasphemed and profaned, for the wicked devil has been under the title and name of God.

(18) Thus all idolatry comes and flows from unbelief and blindness, that we do not recognize God. Thus our monks' idolatry first began in the desert, when they did not want to associate with people and fled into the wilderness, and one of them did not want to eat this or that, did not want to have fellowship with other people, others wanted to wear this or that clothing, and with such things they did not want to give in to God.

serve God. After that, we descended so shamefully that we believed we could get to heaven through letters of indulgence or on paper, and then we placed little lights and candles before the idols, wanting to be saved by them.

(19) Is not this a gross mockery? If someone wanted to mock the Egyptians, who worshipped calves, oxen, cats, garlic and onions, we did it as badly as they, yes, worse. For there was no other thought than, I will do this or that work, I will build a church, then God will be gracious to me. What devil told you or commanded you to do this? Yes, you say, it seems good to me. Yes, dear, does it seem good to you? But you should learn it from God, which would be good, so you want to teach it to Him. These are thoughts that man learns from his lord and god, the devil. For there is no God either in heaven or on earth who can be reconciled with bell ringers with lights and butter letters or letters of indulgence. But you dream yourself of such a God out of the devil's inspiration, and use this to disgrace and dishonor the right, 1) true God.

The true God is not of such a mind that he lets himself be paid with light and wax, but he sends his Son from heaven, who becomes man, sheds his blood for me on the cross, and dies; he dares to do this so that I may be saved. This is the real, true God; the other gods are all just evil devils, even though you smear the name of God and his word on them, and because of that, God's name must become dishonorable among the devils.

(21) A jdolum, or idolatry, is nothing else but a human delusion and thought, imagined by the devil in the heart, yet bearing the name of the true God; thereby the devil deceives. When a man hears this, he thinks: O, this work pleases God, who made heaven and earth. Therefore he goes up, but he does not know that the devil is underneath. So the letters of the pope are full of God and his word, but what is underneath?

being? Nothing else, but the devil. For here they have been silent about the death and bloodshed of the Lord Christ, and each man has boasted of his obedience and good works.

(22) After this, idolatry is also cast out in outward works, that we have taken cords, candles, and caps before us, even as the Egyptians worshipped dogs and cats. And if the world should stand still for a while, you will see that the pure, true knowledge of Christ will perish again. Though the name of Christ shall remain, yet there shall arise among them sedevils and sects, and shall deceive the people with such things as are nowhere found in the Scriptures, as that they shall direct the people unto good works, and shall then become much worse than they were before.

23 Nothing else pleases our Lord God, except the one work of Christ. Therefore, just as it happened to us before under the papacy, so it will happen to us again; when this bright light of the gospel fades and goes out, we will again worship the plates, scabbed hair and ropes of the barefoot monks, and say: O, this pleases God well. But it is idolatry and belongs to the devil.

24 Now Jethro says here: All the gods could not do what this God does; that is, if you were to gather all the services of the other gods together and melt all the idols into one heap and lump, they would not help men at all if you took them all together in one heap.

(25) The monks, when they comfort one in distress, say: Have patience. But pagans can also have patience, and their way has also been to comfort in this way. Therefore, the doctrine of such saints of works does not comfort a conscience that is in Egypt, and they cannot all together counsel a weighed-down conscience in poverty, in fear of sin, or in distress of death. They can call upon their God and help him [1 Kings 18:24 ff], but he cannot help them out of a single sin, even if they come to him.

(26) Know therefore, dear man, when thou liest in sins, what thou oughtest to do, namely, that you know you have such a God who wants to help you, for this is how he is disposed toward you. You will not be able to help yourself. It is important to know this. The monks do not know this, but say: Have remorse and repentance for your sin; and teach impossible things, not the knowledge of the Lord Christ. But how is the soul helped by this, if I am told a hundred times: If you have sinned, think and repent and sorrow for your sin?

27. But it does not help, the conscience does not become calm, secure and satisfied, but more and more despondent and stupid, and does not think otherwise, because God is angry, and stands behind us with the club, and wants to have us dead, until such time that he comes who speaks thus: If thou wilt be secure in thy conscience, do thus unto him: Let thy good works and the good works of all men fall away, and learn to know God, and doubt not that this is God's way and nature, that he will help them that believe on his Son JESUS CHRIST. Accept this with firm, certain trust. Then, by the help of the Holy Spirit, a person will accept it and will certainly find it to be so.

28 Therefore our God is greater than all other gods; it is no more important than to know Christ. And if the conscience is rightly instructed, a good work will follow. If the understanding in the heart is righteous concerning God, so that I know what I should do for God, then I also confess Him rightly with my mouth and serve Him rightly. Otherwise, if the heart is wrong, the works are also wrong. But here a Christian directs his words and works to serve many, so that it is not a secret treasure, but becomes common to everyone. Now follows the third part.

On the morrow Moses sat down to judge the people, and the people stood about Moses from the morning until evening. But when his brother-in-law saw all that he was doing with the people, he said, "What are you doing with the people? Why sitest thou alone, and all the people stand about thee from the morning even unto the evening? Moses answered him, "The people come to me and ask God for advice. For where they

they come to me to judge between each one and his neighbor, and I show them God's law and His statutes.

29 Moses learned from Jethro his brother-in-law how to govern the children of Israel, because he saw that he had so many people as subjects, six times an hundred thousand men of war, who had come out of Egypt with Moses. Among so many there was indeed much quarreling and strife. Now the burden of doing everything is too heavy for one man alone; therefore, since Moses wants to hear all the matters himself and take it upon himself to decide, the people are neglected, and one hinders the other; therefore he says to him:

V. 17, 18: It is not good that you do this. You are foolish, and so are the people with you. The business is too heavy for you; you cannot do it alone.

030 He saith, Thou, Moses, dealest not wisely, that thou layest all things upon thee, and judgest nothing; so that the people are impatient, and nothing is finished: but do so unto him:

V. 19-22. Obey my voice, I will counsel you, and God will be with you. Take care of the people before God, and bring the business before God, and establish for them laws and statutes, that thou mayest teach them the way wherein they shall walk, and the works which they shall do. Look around you among all the people for honest people who fear God, who are truthful, and who are enemies of avarice; set them over a thousand, over a hundred, over fifty, and over ten, so that they may judge the people at all times.

(31) He wills that, according to the opportunity and ability of each man's mind and skill, the people in the regiment shall be provided, and persons shall be set before them to judge in their matters. Now what is too much for him who rules over ten, bring it before him who rules over a hundred; and if it is too hard for him, bring it before him who is set over a thousand. And here the people were first numbered by thousands, of which the prophet Micheas [Cap. 5:1] also says, that therefore every thousand should be numbered with the chief of them.

and captain were counted. But what no one among them could tolerate or settle, that was to be sent to Moses as the high authority and supreme judge.

32 This piece also belongs to us. Until now the people of Israel had come out of Egypt, and neither the spiritual nor the temporal government had been appointed or decreed; but now that this people lies in the wilderness, and is safe from their enemy, the government comes on, and Moses undertakes to order this people with temporal and spiritual laws and commandments. And Jethro the Gentile preempts Mosi, giving him counsel and instruction as to how he should rule and do right.

(33) You have often heard what is the temporal and spiritual government. In the spiritual realm, only our Lord God reigns, and Christ is the head of the believers. These believers are not seen, just as the Lord Christ is not seen [John 18:36]. But the Lord Christ does not arrogate to himself the temporal government, for there he has otherwise given heads and people who have it in their hands, and they administer according to the measure and right of equity. So in the spiritual kingdom servants and ministers are the preachers, who do not rule, but the word of God is the regent, and the preaching of the headship of Christ [Acts 20:28, 1 Cor. 3:11].

34 Thus it is described here how the people of Israel was brought into an outward order, and how the outward worldly kingdom was ordered. He does not first of all understand the spiritual regiment, but the physical kingdom, regnum animale, as St. Paul [1 Cor. 2, 6] calls it, of which also the Lord Christ [Matth. 22, 21] says: "Pray to Caesar what is Caesar's, and to God what is God's." There the Lord Christ also sets the temporal rather than the spiritual rule. And because of this, necessity must first be ordered by the secular sword. For there must first be peace on earth, otherwise one cannot preach that there is time and space for it, that it may be quiet and good peace. If there is peace, that one should have spears, guns and swords in one's hands, then one cannot do much with the preaching of the divine word.

35. Therefore God also has six days.

to work on, but on the seventh day to hear the word of God alone. This day he has especially ordained for peace, so that on that day alone one hears God's word. And that is why God still wants to have the rule in the world, so that everything will go on quietly and deceitfully, so that one can live peacefully, wait for his own, raise children, and above all, hear and learn God's word. For this reason, the sword is first used, and the people are brought into a worldly order and ordered how they should govern and keep to submission.

Such a rule is proposed by a bad man, who had no testimony from God that he should do it, although God confirmed it afterwards; but Jethro goes out freely and teaches Moses, who was full of the Holy Spirit, how he should rule, since the antitype should happen, and teaches Moses to the Gentiles how he should rule. But it is done to show how God has put the world kingdom into reason; and there he has given wit enough to govern bodily things. Reason and experience teach us how to govern wives and children, how to drive cows out and in, and what else concerns physical food. All this is a gift and present to reason, given and bestowed upon it by God; one must not ask the holy Scriptures for advice about this, but God has also thrown such a gift into the raptures of all the heathen.

37. And God will say: O, the worldly government I have already made and ordered. Where? In Genesis, Cap. 1, 28, when it was said: "Grow and multiply, and fill the earth, and have dominion over animals, fish and birds," 2c. bring the earth under you. God gave power and all resources to the worldly regime as soon as he had created only man. In addition, I am allowed by pure spirit to govern a horse differently from a sow or a cow; item, that I make a barrel of beer differently from a barrel of wine; this is taught by reason and experience. Such things are subject to our five senses, so that they can be governed by reason.

38. But it does not reach into these things that God has not subjected us to, but over the conscience. As there are many foolish princes who want to exercise their power and authority over heaven, and govern the conscience, even what one should believe or not believe; since the worldly kingdom should only deal with what reason can grasp. Reason deals with that which is beneath us, and not with that which is above us. For I can govern an ox that it must go as I will. A house must also be built and stand as I like it, or I break it down again and build it differently. Therefore, the worldly regime only deals with things and goods that are subject to external, physical things. And worldly people with their reason can be wiser in bodily things than spiritual people.

39. pagans have been found much wiser than Christians; they have been able to arrange and bring to their end world affairs much more efficiently, 2) and skillfully than the saints of God. As Christ also says in the Gospel [Luc. 16, 8.]: "The children of the world are wiser than the children of light in their ways." They know better how to govern external things than St. Paul or other saints. Hence also the Romans had such glorious laws and rights. For reason taught them that murderers should be punished, thieves should be executed, and how else to distribute inheritances; they knew all this and did it in a fine and orderly way, without the advice and instruction of the holy Scriptures or the apostles. As St. Paul, in the epistle he wrote to them, does not instruct or prescribe anything in this regard, but reminds them to obey the orderly rule given by God [Rom. 13, 1. ff].

40 We are to learn that God confirms and wants worldly authority, even if he does not appoint it according to our thoughts, or that he uses pagans for this purpose. For he will have ordained the authorities, not that they alone should be feared and honored (as they are also honored).

2) runny --- common, hurried; aligned - expedient.

1) fraudulent - compatible.

(Rom. 13, 1. ff.), but that one may live quietly and peacefully, and preach about God's word, divine name and kingdom. Therefore, where there is authority, our dear God often gives grace, peace and space for preaching His word.

41 When, in the time of the apostles, he gave the Roman Empire. Although it was a godless empire, and was harshly opposed to the Christians, they ruled by reason, and were feared by everyone, kept good peace; there was peace everywhere in their time, the world was open. This was an earthly, reasonable kingdom. But no matter how wise they were, they did not see what God was using them for, namely, that his dear apostles should go up and down in this empire and preach the gospel safely. So the Gospel was read quickly, in a few years, throughout the entire Roman Empire, just as God's word runs fast [Ps. 147:15]. It is a hurried word, in a flash it tears and rushes by all means; and when it is gone, then the devil comes, and also wants to preach.

(42) This is a part of this chapter, where the temporal government is ordered by commandments, rights and laws, how he should set wise, God-fearing people over offices. And we have heard that God first of all establishes secular authorities among this people without any special command from heaven, and how he also otherwise lets people use their natural reason. For this reason he also gave reason and five senses to men. And what the authorities here do, judge and adjudicate according to the laws of the world, God has done and adjudicated. As Moses says: "The people come to me and ask (not me, but) God for advice, and then I show them God's law and statutes.

43 Now Jethro also indicates to him, and we will look at it recently, how those should be skillful who are to govern and be placed in offices, which should be the conditiones or affiliations of a pious authority or judge. Of this Jethro says: "Look around you, among all the people, for honest people, who fear God, truly, and who do not give in to avarice.

Enemy, set them over them." These are the qualities, nature and virtues of a pious authority. As they are repeated in the first chapter of the fifth book of Moses, v. 16, 17, where Moses commands the judges to interrogate their brethren, and to judge rightly between them, not to regard any person in judgment, and not to shun any person; for the office of judgment is of God. And 2 Chron, nineteenth, v. 6, 7, king Jehoshaphat saith unto the judges, Take heed what ye do: for ye hold judgment not unto men, but unto the LORD, and he is with you in judgment. Therefore let the fear of the LORD be with you, and take heed, and do it. For with the LORD there is no unrighteousness, nor respect of person, nor acceptance of gift."

44 In this eighteenth chapter, the Holy Scripture leaves out nothing that serves the cause, or that would be lacking here, and paints the persons with proper colors who are to serve the worldly kingdom. From this one might well take a model of what kind of people should be used for the spiritual ministry or for the care of souls [1 Tim. 3:1 ff]. For since God wants to select such people who are only to command and rule over body and goods and other external things, how much more does He want to have such people, and much better ones, who would judge in spiritual matters and preside over the church purchased with His blood [1 Tim. 4, 6. ff. Tit. 1, 5. ff. 2 Tim. 1, 8. ff. 2, 1. ff.].

(45) But how doth he baptize them, and how doth he make them to be rulers of the people in temporal and corporal things? Not only does he describe those who are in authority in the flesh, but he also secretly touches on the vices and sins that are common among these people and that lead to obscenities. 1)

46 First, they shall fear God. For if a ruler, prelate, prince and lord, mayor or judge does not fear God, he will not perform his office well; he will not remember, when he wrongs someone, that he has wronged God by doing so.

would be angry. For whoever else sits in an office, and is to judge and govern others, then many a quarrel and strife come to the people's attention, that the people disagree and disagree, and give your judge or mayor enough trouble. If he is to judge and pass sentence, he will always enrage a part of the people, and he will be charged with it; and then it will commonly happen that he will have to push the great merchants and the rich noblemen, his good friends and brothers-in-law, or those who are otherwise respected before others, before the head and enrage them.

47 For the same scholars and great lords always want to be right, and they also want people to conclude and judge as they please. If they do not, they become the judge's enemies, and a ruler must risk his property, favor, wife, honor, life and limb to be harmed. Whoever does not have courage and may dare, does not belong here. For if he fears E, it is done for him. For if he helps one to the right, he has the other as an enemy; then this and that is lost to him. But away with this ruler, he cannot be pious. But if he helps your boy to stay, and oppresses the poor, then one is a good ruler, lord or judge in the world.

Therefore let him learn and keep the fear of God, and think: If this rich, powerful and strong man or lord becomes my enemy, then strike lucky, I have with me in my office and profession another who is much stronger, more handsome and mightier than he, and if this one has on his side all the devils, princes and kings, who are all worse than he is, what do I ask for it, if he is with me who sits above in heaven? [So one shall conclude the quarrels, that I say: Dear GOD, I ascribe it to you, whether it cost me my life over it. Then God says: "Hold fast; I will also hold fast. So it goes through, or must break, and one fears our Lord God more than men. But where do you find such rulers? Where are they?

49. Moses, in the fifth book at the first chapter, v. 15-17, also says well that judges and authorities shall be such men, saying, He hath set them over thousands, and over hundreds, and over fifties, and over tens, and officers among the tribes, and commanded the judges, saying, Take heed, judge aright: for the judgment is of God; look not to any person in the judgment. Yes, it is a hard addition; no one does it unless he has a special grace and gift. For there are all kinds of things that hinder a judge, such as fear, favor, money, and force; so one must have firm courage, like a rock of stone.

(50) Of this also the heathen have said, Magistratus ostendit virum, if thou wilt know whether a man be a hearty, confident, and undaunted man, charge him with an office, and thou shalt soon see what he is. The common man does not know what it is to govern. But if one should lead an army, have the ensign in his hand, and stand in front at the head, then all art, reason and courage will be too short for him, his courts will shake and his heart tremble; and if he is not seized with this virtue, he will forget God altogether.

(51) If wishing should help (according to the world's way of speaking), then one should wish that everyone would want to rule for a year; and if one would be an enemy to someone, then he should grant him that he should become a regent. Young people always think they are wiser than other people, and think that others have ruled foolishly, or do not yet do it the way it should be done; but they wanted to do it much better: they want to hit eleven pins and shoot them down at one throw, since there are only nine of them on the bosseleisch 1). But once they try, they often do it the worst. It is such a thing about ruling that no kingdom is righteous unless the fear of God is with it; and if one is found who has this gift, he rules well, and it is a gift of God; just as a pretty face is also a gift of God, which he casts into the Rappuse.

52 Otherwise, if anyone knew what it was to govern, he would run away or crouch in a corner, for he must consider that he will have everyone for an enemy. Therefore speaks

Jethro all here, that officers should have this virtue, that they fear God, and not be afraid of men. For if I should fear God, why should I be afraid of man? But if one were to count all the princes and rulers who fear God more than man, how many do you think they would number? I would write all their names on a finger; or, as he says, he would dig the names of all pious princes on a petschaft ring.

Now, this is how the rulers should be, and therefore it is also written that the authorities should be beaten and drawn over this last. To be sure, whoever has a piece of it, let him thank our dear Lord God for it. For otherwise the world is not worthy to have such magistrates. God gives it, but no one keeps it; just as the other laws of God are not done and fulfilled. It is indeed a commandment that one should have such authorities who fear God, but no one seeks or follows them. David was such a ruler, as were a few pious kings in the kingdom of Israel. For David feared God, and was not like him, neither shall he be like him in the earth; he is the crown of all princes. There were still men in his court, even his own son Absalom, who were hostile to him, and they drove him out of the kingdom, so that David was always sitting like on the hill [2 Sam. 15:13 ff].

For he that would be such a ruler must suffer all disfavor, and be exposed to many dangers. He who cannot bear this, let him stay away. Otherwise the common people will see that a great thing is sitting on top; but take it in your hand, and see what it is, especially if you want to rule according to it, that you fear no man. If such an office were offered to a Christian who understands it, he would flee from it and not accept it. If any man turn to the murmurings or wraths of the rich and mighty, let him not be an officer. For this will certainly happen to you; if you are such a ruler, you will be displeased enough.

55. therefore god also wants you to have for the authorities, as St. Paul also says in the first [epistle] to Timothy on the other, v. 2; item, that they also be held in honor. For it costs much to be overlords, both in spiritual and temporal government. But I am speaking of the righteous. Whoever wants to be a pious ruler will have so much unpleasantness, worry and trouble under his eyes that he would rather carry stones or be a farmer. But if a man wants to be a rogue and a knave in the government, he may take his wages away from here; there he will find it well, as he should have it and get it [Luc. 16, 25].

(56) This is a virtue, namely, to fear God, which rulers should do. But they are found few who do, respect and consider such things.

The other virtue is to be truthful, to love the truth. For this follows from the fear of God, where one has God before one's eyes, and where one insists and defies Him above, then one is also truthful, where one will do what is right with heartfelt love and desire, and will carry it out faithfully. Otherwise there are all kinds of deceitfulness, sham and deceitfulness in the world, so that people are led around by the nose; item, a waxen nose is turned on the right, and before one looks around, one has made evil out of good; and again, even what is wrong is turned to right [Ilsa. 5:20]. Solomon speaks much of this in the book of Proverbs, which he, as a great king himself, learned from much experience. So a ruler should be inclined to what is right and true, and help what is just and right-like, and again condemn what is found to be unjust, putting aside all respect for persons.

(58) The third virtue is to be hostile to avarice. The first virtue is against God, but the other two virtues are more against the people. But where do you find such gentlemen? I believe that if one were to separate and segregate the miserly in the world, one would find few princes who were not miserly and who did not exploit, exploit and exploit their subjects. In the courts, disloyalty, financial greed, 1) selfishness, and avarice now rule in the Princes and their officials. For they have room and cause for it, and embellish it with this cover and pretension; because sitting in the office of authority gives birth to and bears many temptations. But they do not take this into account at all, that they are honored and held in high esteem. They are given their property, tax, interest and pension, so they are also greatly feared. Therefore they get a proud, hopeful heart for the sake of honor, wealth and power, so that they say: "I have to do what I want, and do not think that they also have a God sitting above them in heaven [Eph. 6, 9].

1) Finance - intrigue, fraud.

(59) First of all, a man becomes bold and audacious out of arrogance, breaking and bending the law according to all his pleasure, so that he makes himself think that he is mighty; then, so that his hands are greased and silvered, that is, money and gifts are brought and carried to him. Therefore also in the 5th book of Moses at the sixteenth, v. 19, it is said that the gifts of the wise blind eyes. It must be an honorable heart, and rightly God-fearing, which should not let itself be deceived with the world's goods, and things should not be transgressed, but should prefer the poor's good cause and the rich man's injustice 1) [Dan. 5, 17].

(60) It is otherwise a great opportunity and occasion in the regime to do wrong, especially when one is stingy and does not respect God. Although there are other causes for doing wrong than anger, envy and hatred, if someone has been too close to a ruler or has done something against him, he will soon take revenge. Therefore

1) Eislebensche: erfürzichen.

These are the main reasons why people in authority pervert the law and do not act in accordance with it, as when they do not fear God, are not truthful, and take money or gifts. But if it is to be right, then such a man belongs here, who does not stand there after honor, authority, property or money.

(61) This is a fine rule, what manner of men the rulers should be. Not only does it say that they should not be stingy, but also that they should be hostile to avarice; that is, they should be so honest that they are not only lenient for their own person, but also defend others who want to let avarice ride on them. They shall not take poison 2) and gifts, but shall act justly, to serve and please God, the truth. But look around you, you will find few such rulers; just as Moses also found few of them.

Nevertheless, this must be preached to the rulers, so that they may know how to be skillful, especially that they may fear God. Whoever does not have this grace, let the office stand. For one will always see and find fault with the people. But this is certainly true, if they knew who they were and considered their ability, one would be offered a principality, and he would refuse it and not want to accept it. One would have to beg and plead with him; nor would he refuse the regiment. But if one runs, runs, begs and pleads for it oneself, it is not good, it is even a bad sign; it also never helps people to improve, as experience shows and teaches.

2) Gift---gift, gift.

B. Interpretation of the Ten Commandments

from the 19th and 20th chapters of the second book of Moses, preached at Wittenberg by D. Martin Luther.*) 1526. Printed in 1528.

In these two chapters you will hear how God gave the Ten Commandments to the people of Israel and practiced them as follows. 1)

1. but I will 2) faithfully warn and admonish all those who want to teach other people, and lead and preach the word of God, that they take care with all diligence and seriousness, that they teach Moses rightly and present him to the people; namely, where he gives commandments, where he demands and drives something, that they let him remain a master, teacher and lawgiver of the Jews, and do not drive him on the Gentiles or Christians, so that their conscience is neither 3) entangled nor confused. For he concerns us no further than to agree with the natural law. We have our Master, Christ Jesus, who has set before us the things which we ought to know, to keep, to do, and to abstain from.

(2) It is true that over the laws Moses also writes beautiful examples, both of faith and unbelief, of the punishment of the wicked and the ungodly, and of the exaltation of the faithful. Above all these, which are the best in Moses, are the kind, lovely promises and assurances, which we are to accept, to which we also belong, which concern and afflict us, as, of the seed, in which all the Gentiles are to receive the Blessing 2c. [We have an example in Luke, Cap. 17, 14, of the ten lepers. Now that Christ calls them to go to the priests, and they show themselves to the priests, does not concern me, for he speaks according to the law of Moses, which does not bind us. But the example of their faith concerns me, that I, like them, believe Christ, and, like the certain Samaritan [Luc. 17, 18. 19.] ascribes cleansing and blessing to Christ, praises, glorifies and gives thanks.

(3) Now enough has been said about this above, in the preface [to the first book of Moses] (4) in breadth and length, and it is well to be remembered, for there is power in it. For many great, excellent men have been lacking in it, and also now and many great preachers, who do not take proper care, push themselves hard in this place, do not know how to preach Moses rightly, want to make a Moses out of Christ, a law book out of the Gospel, works out of the word; harness the horses behind the chariots, do not know themselves what they are talking about; are mad and foolish, rush and rage like mad dogs; shout and chatter to the people: God's word, God's word; seduce the poor people, and push them into the pit. There have been many learned people, saints and fathers

1) Here Luther will have read the text of the 19th and 20th chapters of the second book of Moses.

2) "but" is missing in the Wittenberg.

3) Walch and Erlanger: again.

4) We have taken the bracketed words from the old edition of Walch. The Jena edition refers in the margin to the "Lessons" which we have included in Col. 2 of this volume. - In the Wittenberg edition, our writing follows immediately after the sermons on the first book of Moses.

*This interpretation belongs to the same sermon cycle as the preceding scripture, as can be seen from ? 22 of this scripture, belongs to the same sermon cycle as the preceding scripture, and will immediately follow in time. The peasants' revolt is mentioned several times as something past, e.g. Cap. 20, §120. 20, §120. In print, it first appeared in 1528 at Wittenberg with Hans Weiß under the title: "Auslegung der Zehen gepot. By Mart. Luther gepredigt zu Wittemberg, Aus dem. xix. und xx. Chapter of the other book Mosi, together with an instruction on how to read Moses. Mart. Luther. Wittemberg 1. 5. 28." Another edition was published without indication of time by Georg Rhaw at Wittenberg; a third at Erfurt in 1529. In the collections: in the Wittenberg (1556s, vol.V, p. 203; in the Jena (1566), vol. IV, pp. 486ff; in the Altenburger, vol. IV, p. 580; in the Leipziger, vol. III, p. 609; and in the Erlanger, vol. 36, p. 1. We give the text according to the Erlanger edition, which brings the original print, comparing the Wittenberger and the Jenaer.

did not know how far Moses would go, how he should be taught. Origen, Jerome, and their like, have not known how far he serves.

Faith alone is valid before God.

Now let us examine the text, in which we see a fine example, which God sets before us as a mirror, how man is so unskilled to appear or act before God, when he alone has the commandments, reason, human wisdom, prudence, sense and wit, and free will, as when he commanded them [Ex. 19:10, 11] that they should wash their clothes three days before they go up the mountain, be holy and ready for the third day. And Moses added another thing, that they should be holy and clean enough without, that they should abstain from their wives.

(5) We who know, hear and have learned the gospel know that whether the garment is clean, defiled, stained or unclean does not serve for the certain and inward holiness that is to exist before God; yet God wanted them to be adorned and clean at the same time, to walk in beautiful clean garments. Such outward purity was their holiness at that time. They abstained from their wives for three days.

But in the new testament things are different. There Christ reaches deeper, namely into the heart, leg and marrow; there outward cleanliness is no longer valid; the shadow is over, the right body has taken its place. God no longer asks whether the garment is defiled or not, whether the body is clean or unclean, smeared or not smeared. Paul had chains on his feet when he was in prison, Apost. 16, 24, could not almost wash his clothes in the dungeon. The martyrs were full of wounds, bloodstained, drenched with sweat, went in with rags and bad clothes.

7) Christ was presented with an adulteress who was 1) caught in the act, John 8:3 ff. (not to mention that she should be with her husband), yet he does not strike her from him; the adultery does not hinder, but he absolves her and sets her free. Likewise the Jewish lady

1) Thus the Jenaer. Wittmberger and Erlanger: an.

At the well, Joh. 4, 9. 26. 27. who was considered unclean by the Jews, as she herself was surprised that Christ desired to drink from her, and the disciples were also surprised that He spoke to her as to a Gentile: yet He did not despise her, but spoke kindly to her and comforted her, and held a beautiful discourse about the future Messiah.

8. in the old testament, in which everything happened in one figure, he wanted to teach, force and restrain the youth and the coarse people by such outward holiness and purity, and thus show and guide them into inward holiness.

(9) But in this is the right knot, that God wants to show that before Him there is no help nor any holiness, be it as great as it always wants to be. For what he gives, he will give out of pure grace; he will keep the prize alone. The Jews were not so holy, strong and mighty that they could hear God speak, but were completely despondent, thought they would die, fled from God, and said to Moses, "Speak to us, and do not let God speak to us, or we will die.

This is their free will, this is their purity and holiness. When God begins to speak, they are overtaken by fear, they are completely in despair and distress; they flee from God, in whom they should seek all comfort, and run to a poor sinner who, like them, is flesh and blood; they seek more friendship, comfort and love from a man than from God. What kind of holiness and purity is this, which does nothing good to God? If it were righteous, it would keep the sting, not shy away from GOD. But this 3) holiness speaks to God impudently: I do not want yours, I do not like to hear you, I want to hear Moses, I prefer Moses.

11 To hell with such holiness! Man's heart should seek more good from God, should seek more help and comfort there, than from all angels, holy men and creatures; as a righteous Christian does. But the holy hypocrites flee from God, not wanting Him. What is this but speaking to God?

2) of some kind, any kind.
3) Thus the Jena. Wittenberg and Erlangen: the.

You are a cane-master, judge and executioner, who comes behind with a club, want to strike it to the head. If I can't stand God, who is so kind, who is our Savior and Beatificator, what devil can I stand?

There nature is depicted to us, how it is condemned and flees from God. Where is now the free will and the human powers? Where are the laws of man and the preachers of works who speak to man? Do your best, we must also do ours, send yourself to the grace of God, and you will become a child of blessedness? Yes, yes, it is unready and unskillful with our ability; when it goes to the meeting, it does not hold the sting.

With this text we may push all free will to the ground. How would they reconcile with God, whom they do not like to hear, fleeing from Him to a man, providing themselves more loyalty and love to a sinner than to God. What a fine reconciliation this is to me! If a son did not want to hear his father, who would be kind to him, but turned to a servant who was a bad boy, sought more friendship from the servant than from the father, without doubt, it would greatly annoy the father and hurt him that the son would forget all his father's loyalty and turn to a bad boy. So it is here also. But this shows that nature and free will cannot and cannot stand before God, for they are afraid that he will strike them with a club and consider him no other than a devil, an executioner and a master of sticks, who could do nothing but be angry.

14) From this we conclude 1) that where the Holy Spirit does not model the Gospel promise to the heart, man considers God to be a devil, an executioner, a cane-master and a judge, and does more good to the worst of boys than to God. Where such a heart flees from God, and cannot stand Him, only freely conclude that it blasphemes God, and is of the devil as it stands and goes. It is not to flee, but to come near, for he is a father. Whoever then flees, he is chased into hell, and is the devil's game.

15 Now Moses writes here that it was done by the most holy ones, who prepared themselves three days before. If it were done by a sinner who was full of sins, it would be all right; but the holy ones abstained from their wives for three days beforehand, which was not unjust; they did what they liked, washed themselves, and prepared themselves in the best way, with all kinds of works, fasting, and whatever they could do. The same dear saints who were not tainted with fornication, pure from their own wives, adorned in the best and highest way that reason can, could not hear God, despaired and desponded of their own holiness. Therefore, this is an excellent text, which brings all holiness to the ground 2c. Thus it is indicated that we boys are in the skin where we are best and holiest 2c.

(16) So also our clergy, the holy people, have blued themselves with great holiness, and driven themselves, that they have become mad and senseless; and yet there is no more stupid and desponding people than they. [They vowed chastity, wore hard shirts, slept badly, fasted so that their breath stank, crawled into sackcloth, did this and that. But all this did not help them. Let us take St. Bernard as an example, whom I like to dress before other monks. For if ever there was a pious monk, it was St. Bernard. When he once lay so hard ill that he had ventured to die, 2) he had now kept virginity all his days, tortured himself with fasting and vigils that his breath stank; so that his brothers did not like to suffer him, he led a beautiful life, and did many beautiful sermons, was full of good works. When he saw the judgment of God, he said, "O Lord, I have spent my life wickedly and my time shamefully.

What have you done, dear St. Bernard, since you have been a monk, have preached beautiful sermons, have not been an adulterer, have taken nothing from anyone? Who will take away St. Bernard's works? The judgment of God. For when this is revealed to man, all man's righteousness has no place, may not stand; as David Ps. 143, 2. desires that God not be with him.

2) audacious --- devoted, prepared for.

I will enter into judgment, for before him no living man shall stand, nor be found righteous.

If then St. Bernard did not pass the judgment of God, how would other monks and priests pass? I hold St. Bernard higher than all monks and priests on earth; I have not heard nor 1) read his like. Therefore, God wants to indicate that all works are lost before His eyes, namely, if they are done in the opinion that one wants to stand before God with them.

19 Thus also St. John the Baptist with all his holiness must be a disgrace to all saints of works, because he testifies that he has it all from above, and points to Christ who takes away sin, Joh. 1, 29. 3, 27. not his holy life. I do not say about the works that are done for the benefit of the neighbor, and from

But that one should not come before God's judgment with such works to propitiate and befriend God, as the saints of works who roll up, bring their works, are hung therewith as with great sacks of hops, may speak to God: Pay me; as if he were a dawdler selling his kingdom of heaven.

20 Now this is written not only of the Jews, that they were not allowed to go, but also of all saints of works, who are well equipped with works; nor will they be dismayed when God's judgment approaches. How much less may those be added who are laden with sins. Much is said. He who has no more than good works, let him go to hell, he will gain nothing; it must be something greater than our holy life. The text of the 19th chapter follows. 2)

2) In the old editions, the last words form the heading of the following.

The nineteenth chapter.

In the third month after the children of Israel came out of Egypt, they came that day into the wilderness of Sinai. For they departed from Raphidim, and went into the wilderness of Sinai, and pitched there in the wilderness toward the mountain. And Moses went up to God.

Moses is here a mediator who carries the words of the people to God and the words of God to the people. This is also indicated by Paul, Gal. 3, 19, where 3) he speaks of the law: "And is delivered (spoken) by the angels through the hand of the mediator." But now we have God Himself as a mediator, as St. Paul says 1 Tim. 2, 5].

V. 3. And the LORD called unto him from the mount, saying, Thus shalt thou say unto the house of Jacob, and proclaim unto the children of Israel 2c.

2. this is the preface and the entrance to the people, so that god may have a

Gedingt does with the people; as if he wanted to speak: Dear people, before I deal with you, I will first talk to you whether you want to accept and keep this. As with us, if one wants to make a law in a city, one calls the people, asks the congregation whether they want to accept the law. The Lord does the same here; he does not want to force them to accept it, but if they accept it, he wants them to keep it, as follows in the text:

V. 4. You have seen what I did to the Egyptians and how I carried you on eagles' wings and brought you to me.

3 Now it is true: I have not only brought you to myself, but I have also carried you on eagles' wings, you have seen the good deeds, you have seen the miracles, how I brought you out of Egypt, fed you in the desert, preserved you, protected you, provided you with shoes and clothes. Now you have the choice whether you to have such a God, or to choose another. Now follow on:

V. 5. If therefore ye will obey my voice, and keep my covenant, ye shall be my possession before all nations 2c.

(4) This saying should be covered with red ink, that one may answer the spirits of the wicked. He says: He wants to have them as a people, as property. Say you to the red spirits: Put the glasses on your nose, look at the text right, he does not speak the words to the Gentiles, but only to the people of Israel. He says, 1) Israel is his people. If I am of the people of Israel, then I will do what Moses says. But the words make a difference. Many have been deceived with Moses; whoever can still resist, let him resist; it is high time. May God grant that the high and proud spirits may learn to understand Moses correctly; but they are running. May God grant that they do not tear down any further.

Will you now obey my voice and keep my covenant.

5 That is, you will accept and keep my law, which I will give you.

So you shall be my possession before all nations, for the whole earth is mine. [And ye shall be unto me a priestly kingdom, and a holy nation.

6 That is, I will adopt you as a special people, whom I will govern outwardly with laws, and no other people; as also David speaks in the Psalter, Ps. 147:19, 20: "He sheweth Jacob his word, Israel his statutes and his judgments. He will not do this to a nation, nor will he let them know his judgments. For at that time he let all the Gentiles go as they went; though at times he drew out of the Gentiles some, as, in Arabia, Job, and Naaman the leper in Syria 2c. But he never separated such a multitude as he did with Israel. Therefore saith he, If ye will keep my covenant, then ye shall be my possession, and I will be your God and Lord, and will dwell in the midst of you: though the earth be mine, yet will I be your God and Lord.

I will choose you, I will do something special with you, and you shall be a priestly kingdom and a holy nation to me. Thus God said: Moses, go, tell the people, teach them what they want to do. This was the counsel and theiding, 2) whether they would become one in the matter.

(7) What a fine orator and speaker is God! First, he tells them of the good deeds he has done for them; then he asks them whether they will accept him, recognize him as God, and keep his covenant. He tells them how he led them out of Egypt. This is the first good deed.

The other, that he led them on wings like an eagle; which Moses also indicates in his song in the fifth book Cap. 32, 3) 11.: "Like an eagle wakes up its nest, 4) and hovers over its young. He spread out his wings, and took him, and carried him on his wings." It is a special way of speaking: As the eagle teaches its young to fly 5) so have I dealt with you. I brought you out of Egypt, fed you in the wilderness with the bread of heaven, gave you water out of your rock, drove out the serpents, kept your shoes and garments intact, preserved and protected you from your enemies, rode with you as a father with his child; this I did to you, that I taught you to fly, that is, that you should follow me and believe me.

(9) Therefore, if you are moved by this example to accept me as a god, I will accept you as a priestly kingdom, that is, you shall all be priests and kings. St. Peter 1. Ep. 2, 9. carries out this saying, and points it to all Christians. All Christians are kings and priests, of which you have heard enough in other places and read in 6) books.

2) Wittenberger and Jenaer: "teiding", Erlanger: "Theding". According to the latter reading of the original, the assumption is obvious that "Geding" is to be read. Cf. 2 at the beginning and § 21. Otherwise, Theiding Rede would have to be taken here, as in the St. Louis edition, Vol. VIII, 978, § 23.

3) Wittenberger and Erlanger: Cap. 33.

4) Instead of: "wakes up his nest" the Bible offers: "ausiihret his young"; here the same is explained immediately following by: "teaches his young to fly."

5) Erlanger: lernet.

6) "in" is missing in the Erlanger.

1) Wittenberger: does not speak.

Be king.

V. 6. You shall be a priestly kingdom to me.

(10) But why does Moses apply this saying to the Jews alone? Answer: This saying was given to the Jews before they received the law: If ye will keep my commandments, and not break my covenant, then shall ye be kings and priests. So that they were not yet a law-keeping people; they were like those who believe according to the law, to whom no law has been given. Whosoever therefore believeth in God without any law shall be a priest and a king, whether he be Jew or Gentile, before or after the law.

(11) But they are not such great kings as the kings of the world are. For these are not true kings; they are only penny-pinchers and painted kings against the faithful, for they reign only temporally and outwardly. But the believers are righteous kings; not that they wear a golden crown on their heads, carry a golden scepter, walk in silk, velvet and golden pieces and purple, but, which is much more glorious, they are lords over death, the devil, hell and all misfortune. The worldly kings alone can handle gold, silver, money and goods, have wealth and power, strangle and torment the people, plunder, abuse and scrape their subjects, but they cannot help themselves; they cannot ward off the slightest ulcer on a finger, or that their belly, head and limbs do not hurt. Much less can they ward off sin, death, the devil, hell, sickness, misfortune 2c. Are therefore kings, as pennies are florins, and painted kings on the map are kings.

For to the true believing kings, who are in the kingdom of Christ, shame is an honor, hell is the kingdom of heaven, death is life, the devil is a brave man, sin is righteousness, misfortune is happiness, poverty is riches 2c. For they are lords over all things, asking after no one, because they are God's children, and have God for a friend, yes, dear Father [Rom. 9, 26.], with whom they find riches, great treasures and all goods, and the abundance of the same. Therefore

No sin, death, devil, hell, hunger, thirst, cold, heat, sword, nor all misfortune harm them; yes, in all this they overcome far, and find in all this the contradiction: in poverty riches, in sin righteousness, in disgrace great honor, in hunger and thirst all abundance, as has been said. Thus, because they have such inward riches, they pay no attention to worldly splendor, despising the golden crowns, purple, silk, gold, silver, money and goods. A golden crown, purple and jewelry belong to the kings at cards, it is all too bad for the children of God.

13. God is not to be portrayed as sitting in heaven on a golden chair, in purple and golden robes, with a golden scepter and crown, but as a Lord who sustains all things, fulfills all things, is present in all creatures, creates and does everything in all things, has everything in his hand; who is a Lord over sin, death, devils, hell, all misfortune and evil. So all those who trust and believe in him are kings. Therefore they have the same authority with their father, inherit all his goods, but still in hope, Rom. 8, 17. 1 Joh. 3, 1. 2.

14th Now therefore the words of Moses, when he saith, If ye shall keep my words, 2c. ye shall be priests and kings, shall not be understood of worldly kings, but of inward and spiritual kings in the faith, which are in the kingdom of Christ, wherein they are all kings, having equal authority with the most high King JESUS CHRIST, in which 2) kingdom every man is king for himself. If therefore ye shall keep, saith he, my covenant, ye shall not be temporal kings, but spiritual, and priests, that is, bishops and popes. God forgive me for mentioning the name here, I should not mention it!

Be a priest.

15) What then is a priest? In which mouth God puts His word, as Malachias [Cap. 2, 7.] speaks: 3) Labia sacerdotis custo-

- 1) Wittenberger: "Heirs of all his".
- 2) Jenaer: which.
- 3) "speaks" is missing in the Erlanger.

diunt scientiam [the priest's lips preserve the teachers; item, he offers and asks for the others. Such a priest in faith may come before God, plead for the people, speak their word, and present their best to God, then go forth from God to the people, presenting to them God's answer and command. And such a priest's word shall be as valid as God's word itself, because he does not lead his word, but God's word, which is an honor above all honor, as St. Peter says [1 Ep. 2, 9].

16 This then is the summa summarum of this saying: He that hath my word, and believeth it, is a priest; if ye then be my people, ye have faith. He therefore that hath faith is king and lord over sin, death, the devil, hell, and all calamities; for faith alone doth put you in such goods and glory. He that hath faith hath all things, is able to do all things, overcometh all things [Rom. 8:37, 38], neither temporal nor eternal, neither can the gates of hell hurt him [Matt. 16:18].

(17) Then he who has the word of God is a priest, and he who hears him hears God Himself. Thus, to be a priest and a king is nothing else than to have faith and the Holy Spirit, to preach the grace of God to others, and to come before God in good faith, as a child to its father. It is a small thing to preach, to ask and to plead in a right faith; but it is a great, mighty thing in the sight of God that a man, a poor, miserable sack of maggots, should come to such honor.

He promises them such honor when they keep his covenant. In addition to the spiritual kingdom and priesthood, he also appointed a physical kingdom and priesthood, of which Moses spoke later 1). Here he deals only with the spiritual priesthood and kingdom, and with the people who kept such a covenant. But those who disbelieved and did not obey his words were not affected by this saying, but were under the kingdom of the flesh. Nevertheless, at the same time God had some who were subject to the spiritual kingdom and priesthood as well as to the 2) physical kingdom and priesthood.

1) Wittenberger: also afterwards.

2) "dem" is found only in the Jenaer.

019 But when the gospel began, he abolished the fleshly priesthood, and the spiritual priesthood was preached throughout the whole world by the apostles. As David was a spiritual and physical king, yet he was subject to the physical priesthood, and yet he was a true spiritual priest; of which priesthood he wrote many beautiful psalms.

20 Therefore every Christian is a king to himself, and a priest to others. The priesthood is higher than the kingdom, it extends further. For the priest ministers the word not for himself alone, but for others; but the faith, by which he first becomes king, he has for himself alone.

These are the words you are to say to the children of Israel.

(21) This is the thing and the covenant that God has given to His people. Now the answer of the people will follow, how they will become one.

V. 7 Moses came and called for the elders of the people, and set before them all these words which the LORD had commanded.

22 It is said above, at the end of the eighteenth chapter, how Moses had appointed captains from the council of Jethro his counselor; of whom he has appointed some over a thousand, over a hundred, over fifty, and over ten, whom he here calls the elders, and are the rulers of the council. But he does not call them the elders without cause, for the elders were taken for heads. For the young are foolish, 3) unskilled and inexperienced for the regiment; although they are sometimes pious, they are still unskilled and unfit for the regiment. For it is not enough to be pious for the regiment. A donkey is also pious. It takes skill and experience. One can find a pious man, but he can hardly count five. He who is to rule must not lack reason, wisdom, prudence, sense and wit, if he is not otherwise to do great harm in the regiment. For the regiment is subject to reason.

23. the Gentiles also experienced and used this, both Greeks and Romans, as then of both their languages. For in Greek and Latin the rulers who are to preside over the others are called presbyters and senatores, the elders. As if they wanted to speak: Age shall rule, youth shall be ruled; as also St. Peter [1 Ep. 5, 5. 1) exhorts the elders that they should preside over youth, and the young that they should obey the elders and be subjects [1 Tim. 5, 17.].

3) Wittenberger: foolish and.

24 Although 1) God at times gives a young man more wit and understanding than an old man, Timothy and Solomon, the natural order is that wit is with the old, ignorance with the young. And God 2) also considers the world, that the old are more sensible than the young, therefore a common saying goes: One should not rub against old boilers, otherwise one sows crud. And another: If youth were wise and old age strong, it could not be paid for with gold. Youth is strong, and old age wise, sensible and witty; therefore youth should be obedient to old age, so that they need the strength rightly; that is the right way.

(25) Hear an example of a wagoner and horses. The horses, even though they are stronger, must obey the wagoner, and when they do, the wagon goes on its way. For it is much more up to the carter, even though he is weaker than the horses, than to the horses; he is the cleverest, he shows the way and the path. But where the horses do not listen, run over bushes and sticks, they break themselves, the wagon and the driver. In the world, too, things go well when youth is obedient to age. For youth runs easily with its strength; where it is not led in a bridle, everything goes to ruin. Therefore, the world is not well governed, where one wants to pass through with the head, 3) burdi burdi, only through, like the sow through the pen, 4) It does not turn out well. As it is happening now with our great princes.

1) Wittenberg and Jena: Wiewohl aber.
2) We consider that this reading of the editions is hardly correct. Instead of "And God" would be to be read: And so" or: "And such".
3) In the old editions: unsun.
4) Jenaer: Kobe. Wittenberger and Erlanger: Kober.

26 Moses called the elders, because it was too much for him to interrogate such a large people, namely six times a hundred thousand men. 5) Therefore he divided the regiment among the chiefs, who were to present it to the people and bring back an answer from the people. Therefore, he divided the regiment among the chiefs, who were to present it to the people, and again bring an answer from the people.

V. 8 And all the people answered at once, and said: All that the Lord has spoken we will do.

27 Drive on nicely, dear fellows, it is too high and too much presumptuous. This is how it happened: The captains, each one in particular, asked their subjects if they would accept the covenant, and when they all agreed at the same time and agreed to the matter, the captains came back to Moses, and at the same time they all told him how the people were willing to accept the covenant. Then the covenant began, and Moses carried it before God as a mediator.

V. 9. And Moses told the people's words again unto the LORD. And the LORD said unto Moses, Behold, I will come unto thee in a thick cloud, that the people may hear my words which I speak unto thee, and believe thee for ever. And Moses declared unto the LORD the words of the people.

28 Moses spoke to the people: You have now joined yourselves, you will hear the LORD himself speak; he will come in a thick cloud, that is, with lightning, 7) thunder, and cruel tempest. Now follows the text:

That the people may hear my words that I speak to you, and believe you (Mosi) forever.

(29) How this was done will follow hereafter. The people heard God and Moses speaking on the mountain. God spoke, and Moses answered him; and the people heard the speech and the answer.

That it believes you.

030 This is that thou, Moses, mayest obtain a name and a reputation before the people, that they may know that thou thyself didst receive it from me.

5) Erlanger: was.
6) "nun" is missing in the Wittenberger.

and not conceived from their own heads and presumptions. So they have become one in the matter; now it starts as follows:

V. 10 The LORD said to Moses, "Go to the people and sanctify them today and tomorrow.

This is the third message of God through Moses to the people. But what the holy is, is dealt with enough above, at the beginning of this chapter. Continue in the text:

V. 11: That they wash their clothes and be ready for the third day. For on the third day the Lord will come down before all the people on Mount Sinai.

32) That is, that they should be beautifully dressed and adorned in their best clothes; as is also shown in chapter 33, vv. 4, 5, where the Lord, angry because of their stubbornness, commands them to take off their jewelry and to put on common, everyday clothes: this they did, and they suffered, and no one wore his jewelry, because the Lord was angry. But here the Lord commands them to appear before him adorned and decorated.

V. 12 And put signs round about the people, and say unto them: Beware that ye go not up into the mountain, nor touch the end thereof.

033 Now this is a piece: when they are sanctified and adorned, put marks with barriers about the mountain, that they go not too far. But let it not be understood that the people hasted almost to go up into the mountain; for they feared, and would rather have been over all the mountains: but before the LORD came down, and descended into the mountain, they went. For when he came down in fire and thunder, there was no need for him to forbid them not to go. So they fled as the devil chased them; they trembled and were almost dead from great terror, and would rather have been over a hundred miles than stood at the bottom of the mountain.

34 Now this is the opinion of this text: Thou shalt sanctify it, and shut it up, before I come down into the mountain: otherwise the people would be so forward as to see what was in the mountain. So I will sanctify the mountain three days; on the third day I will sanctify it.

I will prevent them from coming near. For when they hear the voice, and the thunder, and the lightning, and the trumpets, they will not come near: otherwise the people 1) would have been so bold as to go up before the time. So he put a fear in them, that he would have the mountain honored as a place or place where God should come. Just as if a householder were told: Keep your house clean, for three days a prince will come to you, then he would keep his house clean, and prepare a beautiful dwelling place for the Lord, and make sure that no pig, horse, ox or animal enters. So God would have kept the mountain holy for him, so that no one would enter before him.

V. 13: For whosoever toucheth the mountain shall surely be put to death. No hand shall touch it, but it shall be stoned or shot with a bullet 2); whether it be animal or man, it shall not live.

35 He rebukes them so severely that they do not approach the mountain, that he forbids them, that whoever approaches will be stoned 2c. All this is done to make them timid and fearful. Are these the holy people who have thus adorned themselves, adorned and sanctified themselves, washed their robes, and in other outward holiness made themselves most excellent? Why do they not go there? They do not ask for anything.

When the horn sounds, let them climb the mountain.

(36) Then remove the marks and the barriers, and let them come and go up. Earlier he frightened them with words, now he will do the outward signs. There you see how the Lord drew in the people in an outward way and drove them, so that they also had to be astonished before the mountain, which was nothing else but stone and earth. Now follow how the people come near and God descends on the mountain 2c.

1) "Volk" is missing in the Wittenberg; in the Jena it stands as a conjecture in the margin.
2) In the old editions: "schos".

V.14-25 Moses came down from the mountain to the people, and sanctified them, and they washed their clothes; and he said unto them, Be ye ready for the third day; and let no man draw nigh unto a wife. And it came to pass, when the third day was come, and it was morning, that there arose thunder and lightning, and a thick cloud upon the mount, and the sound of a very great trumpet: and the people that were in the camp were afraid. And Moses led the people out of the camp to meet God, and they came down to the mountain. And all mount Sinai smoked, and the LORD descended upon it with fire; and the smoke thereof ascended as the smoke of a furnace, so that all the mountain was sore afraid. And the sound of the trumpet was strong. Moses spoke, and God answered him loudly. When the LORD had come down to Mount Sinai, to the top of it, he called Moses to the top of the mountain, and Moses went up. And the LORD said unto him, Go down, and testify unto the people, lest they break forth unto the LORD, and see him, and many fall from them. And the priests that come near unto the LORD shall sanctify themselves, lest the LORD break them. And Moses said unto the LORD, The people cannot go up into mount Sinai: for thou hast testified unto us, saying, Put signs round about the mountain, and sanctify it. And the LORD said unto him, Go up, get thee down: thou and Aaron with thee shall go up; but the priests and the people shall not go up, to go up unto the LORD, lest he break them in pieces. And Moses went down unto the people, and told them.

In this text we are told how it happened when Moses brought the people to hear the voice of God from heaven, as was said earlier. Now there is a special part here about the priests, of which the text speaks, that they should sanctify themselves beforehand, so that God does not break them: You and Aaron, says the Lord, go up; but the others are to remain below.

038 If any man ask, How is it that he remembereth the priests, when the priests were not yet at that time? For it will follow in the third book Cap. 1, 5. 3, 2. ff. how God chose the tribe of Levi and Aaron to be Levites and priests.

The priests should be those who were not yet ordered at the same time. How then does he call them priests here? Answer: This must be understood in this way: In the first book of Moses you often read that priests were before the old testament, that is, the law of Moses was given to the Jews, as also now and in the new testament priests are, namely, who have the word of God, understand, and preach to the others, as Adam, Abel, Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob also were, have preached 2c.

39] But they have not been smeared priests, like our papist monks and priests, who are shorn, wear plates, enter in robes and long skirts, say mass, sing vigils, read and mumble their seven tides; do not care much about the ministry of preaching, which is their right office alone; only think that they are and remain great lords. But that the poor souls perish, suffer hunger at the word of God, they do not care much about it; [they] eat, drink, and do not live like the common man, thinking thereby to be of a holier and higher status and merit before God than other people who do not follow their monkey game.

40 But Adam, Noah, Enoch, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob 2c. were not such idols and moles, but lived like other people, ate and drank like other people, wore clothes like other people. But because of this they were called priests and prophets, that they preached the word of God, led the people, taught and admonished 2c. So such priests remained among the people, who led the word of God and such priesthood, until the hour when they ascended Mount Sinai, and one of the twelve families of Israel, namely the house of Levi, was chosen and appointed by God to lead the outward priesthood, Deut. 3, 6. which priesthood is so much better than the papal priesthood, that it has a command from God, and a reason from the divine word, but that one does not have a letter.

41. But the right office of the priests is that they lead the word of God; this was before the Old Testament, in, and also after. The other way, which Mosi's and the pope's priests use, is only an outward larva.

and children's play; however, the former is appointed by God to the figure of the right priesthood, but the latter is a mere monkey play.

042 And when they were ready, and had washed and arrayed themselves, as Moses commanded them, on the third day, there came a great and terrible weather upon mount Sinai. You know that it is frightening to all people when a great, violent weather comes suddenly, as if it wants to tear down everything, heaven and earth collapse, one thunder and lightning follows the other. The world becomes too narrow, one does not know where he is safe, where he should flee to. The Jews were terrified because they were in the desert and had no houses. In addition, the storm came quickly and unexpectedly, with thunder and lightning, and with such fire as is written in the fifth book of Moses, Cap. 4, 11, that the fire reached to heaven, as it is wont to do when such great storms come. In addition, there was a great darkness, clouds and 1) darkness, and thunder, and a great downpour. In sum, it seemed as if heaven and earth were about to fall in a heap, so that they thought, and could not help thinking, that they would all perish at once. He adds something greater, and says:

(43) They heard that it was something more and greater than a bad weather, and that there was a great, thick smoke and steam around the mountain, like smoke from a furnace, that is, a black cloud, like black pitch smoke. Then think every man for himself, what fun there was in such a cruel weather, with thunder, lightning, smoke and trumpets. There was laughter to bite. This was the glory of God, when he showed his power in his future on Mount Sinai.

44 Now Moses leads them to hear God speak for themselves, but there was no heart, no courage, no love, no desire for them to go to God. And the text, namely, when he says, "And the people that were in the camp were afraid," is well to be remembered, for Moses has made him not written in vain. For God wants to indicate with it how we are sent against Him. It is a dear, pious God when he is silent and keeps still. He also speaks through the tongues of men, but there is neither fear nor fright; indeed, they are mocked, beheaded and drowned who speak the word of God. But if God should speak again in this way, then no emperor, king, prince or lord would be so powerful, his heart would falter and fall away, [he] would not be allowed to tremble.

45. Therefore, once God lets Himself be heard, no one's heart can stand before Him. The three disciples on Mount Thabor, when they heard God's voice, fell down as if they were dead [Matth. 17, 6]. And the Jews, who wanted to hash Christ in the garden, were overthrown with one word of Christ [John 18:6]. Our dear papists also boast much about free will, and good works and merits. They boast well, because God does not speak; but if He should speak to them as He did to the Jews, they would probably run back, crawl into a corner, and forget their boasting.

The Jews were pure and ready, as has been said, but when they were to go up, they were frightened and terrified. They were outwardly ready to the best of their ability, more than all the papists, monks, priests and nuns could prepare: yet it was impossible for them to stand before God. Is this not a great shame and a miserable plague, that we should flee from God, who gives us life and limb and everything we have? Where do we want to go, if we do not want to run to Him, yes, to whom we cannot escape? as David indicates in the Psalter, Ps. 139, 7-12: "Where shall I go before Your Spirit? and where shall I flee before Your face? If I go to heaven, you are there. If I make my bed in hell, behold, thou art there also. If I take the wings of the dawn, and abide at the uttermost sea, yet thine hand shall lead me there, and thy right hand shall hold me. If I say, "Let darkness cover me," the night is also light around me. For even darkness is not dark with thee, and the night shineth as the day; darkness is as the light" 2c.

47 Therefore, you see what the man for

is a creature, that where he is without faith, there is only anger and hatred in him against God. And this is an important text, which shows brightly how man is skillful against God. He flees Him, is an enemy of God, blasphemes Him. Because he is afraid of Him and fears Him as a severe judge, he cannot think of anything good to do to Him. Therefore we conclude from this text that all men are enemies of God, cannot stand him, hate his law. And even though they speak it with their mouths, they want to do and accept what God gives, like the Jews here, it is only hypocrisy, the heart never experiences it. And as the weather roars outwardly, making them afraid and despondent, so it was even worse in the hearts of the Jews; their hearts were writhing as if they were to be strangled and perish every hour.

Mount Sinai shows, and God through the mountain, what the heart feels when the Law is opened to it and it is moved by the judgment of God. Ask a man who is without faith and is now to die, what thoughts he has and what is before his eyes? He would certainly answer: Nothing but death. For just as the Jews saw lightning, thunder, smoke, downpour, so that their heart stood as if they were about to die, they were not safe for a moment, there was no other image before their eyes but death, they saw their executioner from heaven, they thought God was a cane-master and executioner, standing behind them with a club, and wanted to strike them on the head; so also a heart that is left to itself thinks 2) God is an executioner and cane-master.

49. A dying man, who is without faith, has nothing but thunder, lightning, hell, hellish fire, the wrath of God before his eyes; feels nothing but death. Why? God speaks to him and holds the law before him. There he recognizes what he has done, and the conscience knows what it has come to, because God has opened the law to him. There is no rest, but only fleeing, trembling and fidgeting; like Adam in paradise, when he heard God speak, Gen. 3, 9. 10, he would have gladly fled over a hundred miles, over all the mountains, if he had

The whole paradise was too narrow for him, but he could not escape God.

(50) We know it, but we do not believe it, for we have not experienced it. But those who have experienced it, who have sometimes been in misfortune, in great hardships of water, fire or death, know how to tell what kind of heart such a person has against God, how it does not trust him at all, but flees from him as from the wretched devil. From this powerful text we are to conclude that there is nothing good in man.

(51) Where, then, is the doctrine of preparation for grace, since they speak: We shall do as much as is in us? They speak of the matter as a blind man speaks of the color, they do not know what they are talking about; for if they prepare and send themselves in the best way when it comes to the meeting, the world will be too narrow for them. To prepare oneself from one's own strength cannot stand before God, cannot hold the sting. When death snorts under our eyes, it all falls away, stands like butter on the sun. We must be taught differently how to go to meet God and stand before Him. And (as it is written in 1 John 2:28) 3) it is very important that we may stand and not be ashamed when he comes. I would be a bad Christian if I wanted God to remain outside with the last day, when Christ Luc. 21, 30. comforts His own with the last day, as with the summer.

Now, what do works, caps, plates, spiritual status help us? If I sweat blood and torture myself to death, it will fall away; if death comes, it will not stop the fear and wrath of God. What is it then that I torture myself long and to death, if I am not corrected? Nothing helps, neither our word nor our work. It is Christ alone whom I must recognize as a brother and friend, and say to God: Lord, I know of no one, neither in heaven nor on earth, to whom I may have a comforting refuge, but to you, through Christ. I must strip myself naked, from all friends, works and deeds.

service. Lord, I have no refuge but in thy divine bosom, wherein the Son sitteth. If I do not have hope, it is lost.

This text has been put under the bench. Had it been pulled out, we would have known what man is capable of before God, and the doctrine of works and free will would not have been so torn down, which cannot hold a candle. Therefore, the devil dares to use it; and if it does not help, or if it persists, when it comes to the meeting, then God grant a good night to all priests, monks, plates, caps, works, merits, and all good life. For it must be another and much higher thing that leads me to God than a lousy cap or plate. In short, there must be such a courage and heart that does not fear the wrath of God, sin, death, the devil and hell; and where it already fears and is terrified that it will finally break through freely. But no cap can give me such courage; there must be something higher and better than the merit and work of all monks and nuns.

(54) I have admonished you, and do so again, that ye consider the text well, for it is mighty; and the true Christians also know what it is able to do, how mighty it is, as David, who also was therein, hath well known.

55 The epistle to the Hebrews, Cap. 12, 20. 21, shows from this place of the other

1) Instead of "so" should probably read "there".

V. 1. And the Lord spoke all these words.

001 Now when Moses had commanded the people that which the LORD had commanded him, that they should stand at the bottom, when he had set up the signs, 2c. he held his peace, and God spake unto the people alone. You can see how it must have been a bright, great voice, not the voice of a bad man, which such a great people might have heard. For Book of Moses, that Moses was also terrified, together with the other Jews. For as the epistle there tells us, he said at Mount Sinai, "I am afraid, and tremble." 2) And the terror was because there went out a smoke as of a furnace, and a sound of a trumpet was heard in terror 2c. Summa Summarum: There is no saint who would not be frightened by this, because he would be completely perfect and accomplished.

(56) This then shall be our work, that we may come to it by faith and the word of God, that we may grow stronger and bolder day by day, the longer the more we learn to know Christ, not only with the ears and tongue, but that it may come into the heart also. For the greater the knowledge, the less the fear; and the less the knowledge, the greater the fear. There is condemned all our being, with works, masses, vigils 2c.

57) And the next thing that follows, how the Lord called Moses to go down and testify to the people, 2c., is not yet the ten commandments, but a preface; and though the people did not understand the language, yet they heard the voice; and when God spoke to them, the thunder and the lightning and the trumpet kept silence, that they might hear and understand the voice; but the fire and the thick cloud stood for and for, that the voice of the ten commandments might be heard.

The twentieth chapter.

There were six times a hundred thousand men, without wives, and children under twenty years old. They occupied a large area, probably two or three miles, at the least a mile; in addition, Mount Sinai was a very high mountain. One of us can hardly bring his voice over six thousand people; if it is even strong, over ten thousand; but it was clear, resounded over the whole Polk, and could be heard by everyone; therefore it must have been a mighty, strong voice. They saw nothing but the clouds of water and the fire from which they heard the voice. Now this was the voice, as follows, namely the ten commandments.

The first commandment.

V. 2-6: I am the LORD your God, who brought you out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage. You shall have no other gods beside me. Thou shalt make no graven image, nor any likeness, either of that which is in heaven above, or that which is in the earth beneath, or that which is in the water under the earth. Do not worship them or serve them. For I, the LORD thy God, am a strong zealot, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children that hate me unto the third and fourth generation. And do mercy unto many thousands that love me, and keep my commandments.

The other.

V. 7. You shall not take the name of the LORD your God in vain, for the LORD will not hold him innocent who takes His name in vain.

The third.

V.8-1. Remember the Sabbath day, that thou hallow it: six days shalt thou labor, and do all thy work: but on the seventh day is the Sabbath of the LORD thy God, in the which thou shalt do no work, neither thy son, nor thy daughter, nor thy manservant, nor thy maidservant, nor thy cattle, nor thy stranger that is in thy city gate. For in six days the LORD made heaven and earth, and the sea, and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day. Then the LORD blessed the Sabbath day, and sanctified it.

The fourth.

V. 12. You shall honor your father and your mother, that you may live long in the land which the LORD your God is giving you.

The fifth.

V. 13. You shall not kill.

The sixth.

V. 14. You shall not commit adultery.

The seventh.

V. 15. You shall not steal.

The eighth.

V. 16. You shall not bear false witness against your neighbor.

The ninth.

V. 17: Thou shalt not lust after thy neighbor's house.

The tenth.

Thou shalt not lust after thy neighbor's wife, nor his manservant, nor his maidservant, nor his ox, nor his ass, nor anything that thy neighbor has. 1)

This is the sermon that God Himself preached to all the people of Israel in the cloud and fire, on Mount Sinai, with a bodily voice; although an angel, by command of God, led the voice, as is written in another place, with glorious splendor, in the place of God. But the people saw nothing, but heard the voice 2c.

We will briefly go over the ten commandments. First, it should be noted that the Ten Commandments do not concern us Gentiles and Christians, but only the Jews. The text testifies to this and compels us as it speaks:

V. 2. I am the LORD your God, who brought you out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage.

This is true and clear enough that we Gentiles were not brought out of Egypt by God, but only the Jewish people Israel. That is why Moses points the Ten Commandments only to the people who were brought out of Egypt by God. But that we also recognize, worship and honor the God whom the Jews honor, the one who led them out of Egypt, we have not from Moses or from the written law, but from other scriptures and from the law of nature. This I speak

1) In the Wittenberg and Erlangen versions, the last two commandments are in reverse order.

But again, to ward off the false spirits who would force Moses down our throats to keep him with all his commandments. But let us not do this, and let us not accept him with the slightest shake, 1) for so far as he agrees with the natural law. We want to read him as another teacher, freely and without constraint, but we do not want him to be our lawgiver. For we have laws enough in the New Testament; therefore we do not want to have him in our conscience, but keep that purely for Christ alone. So it is clear that the Ten Commandments were given to the Jews alone, and not to us. In spite of all the red spirits, that they say otherwise with truth!

The sign that the Jews shall take hold of God.

Now God, the Lord, as is his divine nature, gives the Jews a sure sign, so that they may take hold of him, grasp him and recognize him. This is what he does in all his dealings with us; he does not leave us gawking toward heaven, for he does not want us to serve him out of our own choice and discretion, as nature and reason are wont to do, leaving behind God's command and choosing their own worship; but God wants to be served, grasped and known, according to his own word and command. That is why he gives us signs, so that we may grasp him with certainty. To the Jews he gave the sign, he put the word in their mouth, so that they should call upon him. Which one? I call upon you, my God and Lord, who brought us out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage. Item, other words more, as follows: You who led us miraculously through the Red Sea, through the wilderness, fed with the bread of heaven, watered from a hard rock, led us through the Jordan into the Promised Land 2c. This was their word, their signs, by which they knew God.

The Christian's sign to take hold of GOD.

(6) Whereby do the Christians recognize and take hold of him, because the Jews' sign is not valid for them? Do they not also have a sign or word, God?

1) In the old editions: Title.

to seize with it? Yes, they also have their own sign and word, namely this: O God, Creator of heaven and earth, Who sent Thy Son, Jesus Christ, into the world for me, to be crucified for me, to die, and on the third day to rise again, to be taken up to heaven, to sit at Thy right hand, and have all things in his hand, and send his Spirit, that we should wait for his coming, to judge both the living and the dead, and so attain with him 2) the eternal kingdom, our inheritance, which thou wilt give us through him.

7 For this purpose, O Lord God, you have given us and instituted baptism and the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ, your Son 2c. For he has bound us Christians to these sacraments of his and revealed himself to us in them; if we take hold of him there, we have certainly met him. But all other things, which are not commanded us, we are to leave aside, for we would otherwise fall far short of him. This is the title we are to use, just as the Jews used to use their title when they were brought out of Egypt, out of the house of service.

8 Against this title Jeroboam king of Israel first contended, and afterward all the Jews. The same Jeroboam made calves of gold, and set one at Bethel, and the other at Dan, intending to bind God to them, and to seize him: for he said, 1 Kings 12:28, 29, "Behold, thy God, O Israel, which brought thee up out of Egypt." But it was the devil. Why? And was his opinion that he meant the right God? But God cannot suffer it; indeed, there is no God either in heaven or on earth who wants to have such a self-chosen service. So, this king paints God in his heart, and chooses his own sign from his own goodwill, in which he wanted to take hold of God. God does not want that, but he paints himself, and gives a sign to the Jews, saying: "If you find me, I will be sought and called: "I am the Lord your God, who brought you out of Egypt, out of the house of service"; then you shall take hold of me, there I am sure, there you will find me. But that thou shouldest take me in the calf, in the the altar, to this place, you will err; you will not find me either, indeed, you will miss my far, for I am not there.

(9) So it has also happened to us; we have a sign that we cannot fail to 1) meet God. But this is the sign, as reported above [§ 6]: O Lord God, heavenly Father, who for me gave your Son to become man, to die, to be buried 2c., in the same name I call upon you 2c. I cannot fail, [I] must meet, my prayer is also surely answered, if I can say and believe otherwise from my heart. For in this way he has commanded to call upon him 2), so he will let himself be found by the sign, seize and grasp, and give what we ask, we ask otherwise in Christ's name and in faith.

10. But if I made a special sign for myself according to my own liking, like Jeroboam and other godless people, and said: O God, my Lord, I call upon you to see that I have built a church, founded a mass, an altar, put a chasuble in the church, worn a plate, put on a cap, prayed my seventh, 3) matins, firsts, thirds, texts, none, vespers and completers with great diligence, whipped myself with scourges, walked woolen and barefoot, wore a hare rope and shirt, slept on the bench, on the ground, fasted, prayed, suffered great poverty, kept virginity, obedience and poverty, have been a monk, nun or priest: what shall he say to this? [He] will not court you much about it, but say to it: Have I thus painted myself to thee? Did I command you to recognize me by such works? I do not know you and your works, I did not give you the sign, it is the devil's sign and image, there is no God either in heaven or on earth who is so minded, who would be gracious to you because of such self-selected and self-chosen works; I did not command you, I did not command you.

so want to be seized. Which devil has called you? Then the plate, the cap, the monasticism, the piety all fall to the devil, 4) cannot stand the judgment of God, melts like the snow. God says: I have given you a sign and a measure, hold fast to it, let the other go, it is not valid before me; you have devised your own way yourself, the devil has given it to you.

(11) We Christians have been just like the ancients, who devised their own way of serving God; one took this sign, the other another, as he dreamed; they went and said: It is an old thing that God brought us out of Egypt; but at Bethel and Shiloh is the right place of worship, and there we will meet with God. Yes, they met their God, the devil. Over this they built churches and altars on the mountains 2c., thinking that they had met it. Then the prophets cried out against it, saying that it was wrong. Then the quarrel arose: Away with the heretics, only strangled and beaten to death. Then many a prophet had to lose his life. This is what happened to us: our dear papists invented many a little sin, one after the other, none of which was commanded to them by God. If we preach against them, they become mad and foolish, accusing us of being heretics, seducers, and seditious, forbidding good works; we shall all be strangled and put to death.

012 Now the Jews were to have kept their signs and their commandments, that God might have apprehended them; and that they also might have apprehended him, they were not to have devised new signs and measures for them. But now the same sign is over, [it] has been granted until Christ. But we Christians should not pray in this way, nor should we carry the sign upon us; it is now finished. The Jews would pray thus: O Lord God, who hast brought us out of Egypt 2c. Now if he had said to me, I have brought you out of Egypt, I am right in praying, O Lord, you who brought me out of Egypt 2c.

1) Wittenberger: künden; Jenaer: können, Erlanger: kunnten.
2) In the old editions (according to Latin construction) "himself" instead of: him.
3) Seven tide ---- Irorus ounonious; the names of the "seven tides" follow here in full: Mette 2c.

4) The words: "hat dichs... zum Teufel" are missing in the Wittenberger.

(13) Now, if I do not want to fail, I must grasp the word that has gone out into the whole world: I have given my Son for you, who shed his blood for you, died and redeemed you, and reconciled you to me, making me your friend and father.

(14) I may pray thus: Heavenly Father, who created all things, who brought the children of Israel out of Egypt [Ex. 12, 51], through the Red Sea [Cap. 14, 22], through the deserts and through the Jordan, redeemed them from the hand of Pharaoh, fed them with bread from heaven [Cap. 16, 15], watered them with water from the rock 2c. [Cap. 17, 6. 7.], but all this is not my business. Who did great wonders with Noah [Gen. 7, 5. f. Cap. 8, 15. f.], neither is it my business. You who let Peter walk on the sea [Matth. 14, 29], who commanded the lepers to show themselves to the priests [Luc. 17, 14], does not concern me either. I must call upon him and take hold of him with the word and sign that concerns me, namely, "O Lord, you who have redeemed me through the blood of your Son Jesus Christ. The word concerns me, it penetrates the heavens, with the word I certainly meet God, with it he has tied himself. So he tells the Jewish people in a special way that they should take hold of him in this work, by which they have surely met him. Therefore Moses put in the first commandment: "I the LORD your GOD, who brought you out of Egypt" 2c. You Jews should remember this work and recognize me. The sign has been granted until Christ, and no further.

(15) For this reason I want to warn all preachers here. For I see that it is necessary for them to learn the right custom of Moses, and to let the people swear by Moses, and to let him be no more than an example, and where he is an evangelist and prophet. Now if a preacher urges you to Moses, ask him if you were brought out of Egypt under Moses. If he says no, say, What is Moses to me, because he speaks to the people brought out of Egypt? Moses is finished, for his ministry lasts only until the time of Christ.

(16) So this text strongly enforces that the Ten Commandments are given to the Jews alone, and not to the Gentiles, as is also enforced in the third commandment. For the Gentiles were never brought out of Egypt. We have another work and another teacher, who does not, like Moses, force and frighten, but offers grace, comforts, gives and helps and saves, namely, Jesus Christ.

17. in Adam's and Abel's time the sacrifice [Gen. 4, 4.] went, that was their sign. But it is none of my business. Noah had his word and command of the rainbow and other things [Gen. 9:13, 14], [which] is not my business. Abraham had the circumcision [Gen. 17, 10. f.], which was given to him as a sign of his faith [Rom. 4, 11.], but it does not concern me. Isaac and Jacob had their command. Moses, Aaron, Joshua also had their word. But I was not told to bring the children of Israel out of Egypt, through the Red Sea, the wilderness and the Jordan; yet this is God's word and command. Forasmuch as he saith not, I command thee, and thou shalt do this, I will not accept it. David had a word that Christ should be born of him, as is often indicated in Scripture [2 Sam. 7, 12. 19.] and Paul highly exalts it in Rom. 1, 3. and Christ is called a son of David in the Gospel [Matth. 9, 27. 12, 23. 15, 22. 20, 30.] now and then; therefore it does not follow that I must be Christ's father according to the flesh. It is God's word, as the fanatics and the red spirits chatter. It is true; but it is not said to me. Moses also had a command to build the tabernacle [Ex. 26, 1. ff.] and to establish the priesthood [Cap. 28, 1. ff.], but I and you are not commanded to do so.

(18) So through and through; see in all the Scriptures all God's words and commands, and do not point them out to yourself until 1) you are sure that [it] has been said to you; do it then, do not ask what is held up to others and commanded. Yes, you speak to the spirits of the wicked, God spoke it to Moses, therefore I must also do it. Rather, say: There is no power in it, the word does not extend further than to the one to whom it is commanded. God means the fish swim in the water, as it is written in the first book of Moses [Cap. 1, 20. ff.], the birds fly in the air, the worms crawl on the earth, the sun shines; there is also God's word. Will you therefore become a fish, and dwell in the water? float in the air like a bird? Will you become the sun, the moon and the stars? See how it will be for you. Will it not be seen that Moses is given to a peculiar people? Therefore do not show him to the whole world, but to his people.

19 Thus we have [the] reason why God bears this name: "I am your God, who brought you out of Egypt"; for he takes care of them as his special people, whom he has chosen as his own. But it is no longer valid, because now I do not call upon God, who brought me out of Egypt. So that the spirits of the swarms may be answered and their mouths shut, who want to force Moses upon us. Let them go with their Moses, and let Moses remain a lawgiver to the people of Israel, and do not charge him against the Gentiles and Christians. For in the New Testament he has come to an end, and his laws are no longer valid; he must hide from Christ.

20) But that we Gentiles have a law, this is taught to us by our own conscience and reason; as also St. Paul Rom. 1, 19-21. says that the Gentiles also have a knowledge of God; for "God has revealed this to them, that they see God's invisible essence, that is, His eternal power and divinity, as it is perceived in the works, from the creation of the world; but they have not praised Him as one God" 2c. With which words St. Paul indicates that all pagans have knowledge of God, namely, that he created all things, gives all things, feeds all things, sustains all things; therefore their own conscience urges them to give glory to God and thank him for all benefits.

21 Therefore, even though Moses never wrote the Law, all men have the Law written in their hearts by nature. But God also gave the Jews a written law, that is, the Ten Commandments, for abundance; which are also nothing other than the law of nature, which gives us is naturally written in the heart. What Moses wrote in the Ten Commandments, we naturally feel in our conscience. "For the Gentiles," says the apostle [Rom. 2:14, 15], "who have not the law (that is, the written law of Moses), and yet by nature do the things which are in the law, the same, because they have not the law, are themselves a law unto them, that they may prove that the work of the law is written in their hearts, as their consciences bear them witness, as also their thoughts, which accuse or excuse one another." 2c.

22. Now even though both Jews and Gentiles have a law, they have nevertheless lacked God. For the law cannot be sufficient without God's spirit and faith, because God has decreed all things among unbelievers, that He might have mercy on all [Rom. 11:32], and all the world sinned in Adam [Rom. 5:12].

(23) Now God has honored and benefited the Jews by giving them the Ten Commandments orally and in writing, for the sake of becoming a man of the Jews. But we Gentiles, to whom God has not given a written law, should nevertheless honor, praise and thank him. For he is our God as well as the God of the Jews [Rom. 3, 29], as we will say later.

I am the Lord, your God.

(24) These words alone, separated from the others, namely from those: "He who brought you out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage," 2c., we must strike them out and pay careful attention to them. For they concern us all, the whole world in general, and every man in particular, Jew and Gentile; not because Moses wrote it, but because God created, sustains and governs all men 2c. As Paul also says Rom. 3, 29. 30: "Is God the God of the Jews alone? Is he not also the God of the Gentiles? Yes, indeed, also the God of the Gentiles; for there is One God who justifies circumcision by faith, and the foreskin by faith.

25 And these words, "I am the LORD your God," God speaks to all the people.

not otherwise, but as if there is only One Man. He does not say: I am the Lord, your God, but: "Your God. The little word "your", see well, because the greatest power lies in the little word. So now he says: "I am the Lord, your God", as if he wanted to speak: I will take care of all of you, and of each one in particular, as if there were only one, and no one else on earth. And this I do, that ye may the more diligently apprehend, perceive, and keep my words, lest any man say, God hath given the law, hath highly and abundantly offered to be gracious unto men, and to be their God, to do unto them as a father doeth unto his child; but it may not be my business, who knows whether he meaneth me also; it is the business of the multitude only.

(26) For this is the way of men, that they throw the word of God to the wind, not accepting it, only gazing at other people, not thinking that it should apply to them. Now God wants to intervene here and prevent them from opening their mouths and watching what others do, but wants to make them certain that He means each one in particular when He says: "I am the Lord, your God"; I mean you and no one else, as if He were speaking: See not what others do, but hear thou what I say unto thee, and see how thou receive and believe it; see not others, I will deal with thee, I will deal with thee, and thou shalt deal with me.

27. Therefore I have often said that one who wants to be saved should be of one mind, as if there were no other man on earth but he alone, and that all the consolation and promise of God now and then in the holy Scriptures should concern him alone, even if it were written for his sake alone, so that the devil would not deceive him when he is about to die, and would open his eyes, and many thousands of men wise, who have all lived and done as he has, and yet are condemned, would say to him: What wilt thou now presume to be saved, because thou art surely lost? Wilt thou be better than others, who have not done otherwise than thou, and yet are like-gone to the devil? Do you think you want to run away from him? Thus the devil can lead one into despair, as if there were no God to take care of him, to help him, and to save him from all distress.

Therefore, one should grasp the word that there is a God who is able and willing to help, as the same knowledge of God is naturally written in the hearts of all men, as Paul says in Romans 2:15, namely, that God, as the text indicates, is your God who created you. But when it comes to temptation, it is hard to persevere, to recognize God rightly, to believe and trust in Him, so that even the pious, who have the Holy Spirit, above the natural knowledge of God, hardly break through; it is such an excellent puff, when the devil thus drives us along, as I said, in the temptation, that he also makes work for the pious, and if it were imposed on him by God, overthrows them. If those who are under God's protection are so severely challenged, how will those who have only the natural knowledge of God, which is completely dark and faded through sin, survive? The devil leads them wherever he wants, because they do not respect God's word, it is a dream to them; the devil has possessed and blinded their hearts.

29 Thus it is well to note what God says here to the first: "I am the Lord, your God. "Thine, thy God," who takes care of each one in particular, more than a father of his own child. But few grasp it, few believe it. God is much too great, unbelief thinks, that he should look at me; should God, the high majesty, let himself down in such a way that he should have respect for me, a poor sack of maggots? yes, he lets it happen, he sits up in heaven, lets the 3) angels serve him; what am I against God? A poor water bubble, which breaks 4) by itself. But faith does not doubt that God, who created all things, heaven and earth, and all that is in them, will take care of 5) us. For there is the word:

1) In the old editions: as he speaks.

2) "not" is missing in the Wittenberger.

3) Erlanger: three.

4) In the old editions: their.

5) Erlanger: he himself.

I am the Lord, your God.

30 Therefore he is my God and yours, that he takes care of everyone in particular: feeds me, helps, saves, 1) and cares for me, gives me everything I need in body and soul, deals with me like a mother with her child, acts and behaves 2) with me as if there were no other man on earth but me. This was well seen and understood by St. Augustine when he said: "Lord God, you rule everything in a strange way, you deal with everyone as if you had nothing to do with anyone else but with him; you bring everyone through his whole life. One is born poor in this city, goes to another city, there he becomes abundantly rich. Another has enough, goes to another country, there he becomes a beggar. He gives to one and takes from another, and it is so strange that no one can say that he has led his life out according to his ideas and thoughts; it all goes differently than we think.

(31) There are many devils around us who could kill us every hour, but God is there to prevent evil from happening to us, otherwise all the princes and lords of the whole world would not be able to protect us from the devil's power. For he is a lord and god of the world, and has a thousand ways in which he would harm us, by fire, water, air, sword 2c. But God is stronger than he, defend him, so that he will not break my leg, ruin my eye, harm me, not even a hair's breadth. Otherwise the devil would be too powerful, would soon give me a defeat; there I would lie, and all my armor and weapons could not save me from him for a moment, if God did not stand over me. And where [it] God decrees, he devours the one with fire, the other with water; to the one he does otherwise, to the one so.

32) But God preserves us from him, and cares for us in a thousand ways, using parents also, so that the mother sees to it with care that the child suffers no lack, watches, sleeps the less, so that the devil does not bring the child. 3) This is a small care, as opposed to the care that God has for us; fer] cares for the child more than the mother herself. But no one sees this, no one even believes it; and yet it is certainly true that God cares for us in this way and resists the devil and all creatures, so that the devil could kill us. He who takes such great care of one man, takes no less care of them all in particular, so strangely that one even thinks he has to send with him alone. We will see this in eternal life; here we see it in faith alone. But few believe it, and yet it is certainly true. Therefore God is thus famous:

1) Wittenberger: redt; Erlanger: rett.

2) Erlanger: eloquent. - gebaren - to act, to proceed.

I am the Lord, your God.

If God would have us understand it as He speaks and proves it daily. I will take care of you when you work, when you sleep, 2c. that no one will harm you until the hour of your death comes. So the little word: "I am the Lord, your God," is not to be applied to the Jews alone, but to all people in the world, for he cares for them all, except that they, like the Jews, were not brought out of Egypt. One says: God is with in the ship. It is true and finely said. If he is not there, it sinks, and all care is lost, if he does not care, guard and watch, Psalm 127, 1.: "Where the Lord does not guard the city, the guard watches in vain."

V. 3. 4. Thou shalt have no other gods beside me. Thou shalt make no graven image, nor any likeness, either of that which is in heaven above, or that which is in the earth beneath, or that which is in the water under the earth. Do not worship them or serve them.

This is the other part of the first law, in which God forbids us to have strange gods. [He] himself indicates in the text who the foreign gods are, namely, that they should have no image, neither heavenly nor earthly 2c. That is, you shall not paint the sun, the moon, the stars, or any image of man, beast, or fish.

From the dilators. 4)

This text has been led by the spirits of the devil, and they have wanted to drive it upon us.

4) Thus the Jenaers. Wittenberg and Erlangen: This is the title of the pictures.

Therefore, let us deal with it, first, in the controversial way, then in the simple way. Our red spirits, Master Klüßling, who have even eaten the Scriptures, speak: Do you hear the word of God, which says to you: You shall not have foreign gods? So they frighten people with this pretense that they are using the word of God; they force them not to suffer the images, because God has forbidden it; they think it is a good thing to storm idols. But what shall we say to this? It is God's word, we cannot say no to it.

(36) Dear Christians, you have heard that when they come in with their Moses, wanting to bind your conscience with his laws, say to them: Dear Lord, put your glasses on your nose and look at the text properly. We know well that one should be obedient to God in what He says, and that we belong to God as well as the Jews. But a distinction must be made between the words of God and the words of God. When God speaks something, I should pay attention to whether it concerns me. Therefore, dear journeyman, if you want to force me with God's words, tell me a text that concerns me, otherwise I won't mind you telling me a lot from Moses. For Moses with his word was not sent to us; and even if Moses had not come, we would nevertheless have had this natural knowledge written in our hearts through God, that there is one God who makes and sustains all things. For the Gentiles also worshipped God without Moses' teaching, even though they lacked God, just as the Jews did.

[Matth. 17, 27. 1 told Peter to go to the sea and cast a line, and when he saw a fish coming out at first, he would find half a florin in its mouth, which he was to give to him and to himself. There is also God's word. But, dear enthusiast, go and do as Peter did; let us see how you will fare. Such blind minds are our red spirits, clumping into the Scriptures like a peasant into his boots. How would I get them all to put God's word on me? They prove earlier that God wants to have the words preached to me.

Therefore, God's words must have the addition, that I may know to whom they are spoken. The angels also have God's word, but what is it to us, because it is not spoken to us? Therefore we keep the word that is spoken to us. Christ drove Peter back; when he asked of John, "What shall this man do?" Christ answered, "What is it to thee, follow me" [John 21:21, 22]. I did not tell him, but you; you; you, you follow; he will also get his decision. I do not say it to him, but to you. That is why I said that God attacks each one in particular, as if he had no one else to do with but him. Now when he interprets a word to you, accept it, and keep your command, and let another wait for his command. They are hopeless drips and real swine, they want to be great doctors, they write great books, yet they know no difference of the word of God. Abraham received circumcision from God as a sign of his faith, as Paul also indicates Rom. 4, 11. There is God's word. But it is over with the circumcision of Abraham, it stands alone as an example of faith, but does not bind and force me.

(39) So I say here, that the idolatry and the overthrowing of idols may not be enforced from this text. For it 2) is said to the Jews alone, and not to us. Show me a text, so that God has forbidden me the images; not that I should be fond of the images, but that we should know for certain what our faith is founded on, so that we do not build on the sand, and our adversaries can answer. For a preacher, yes, also every Christian, should and must be certain of his doctrine; not build on a delusion, or deal with human conceit, but be quite certain of the matter, that [it] is thus, and not otherwise [Col. 2, 2.], which Paul calls Plerophorian; so that he could stand in all temptation, and answer the devil and all his angels, yes, God Himself without all wavering.

1) Wittenberg and Jena: that.

2) Jenaer: it.

(40) Therefore they must bring up another reason to prove that images must be stormed. For if they were challenged, and had no other reason, they would have to flee back, could not stand, and would accomplish nothing. Therefore I say, fo one must be certain of the matter, if one wants to teach others 1) with God's word. So Peter also teaches [1 Ep. 4, 11] that no one should speak, because he speaks it as God's word, which God has called and pleases Him; and "if anyone has an office, that he do it as from the wealth that God provides" [Rom. 12, 7]. But they cannot muster anything that God has commanded, storming and overthrowing images.

(41) Secondly, I say that the images must be torn down and cut off, that the hearts must be torn away and turned away. For what does an image hinder me if my heart is not attached to it? But then the heart is not attached to it, if I do not believe in the images, do not rely on them, and do not call upon them in a special way, as if I wanted to show God great honor and service with the images, as has happened until now. For up to now we have made images of Our Lady, St. Anne, Crucifix 2) and the like, and had the opinion that [they] were better than other wood and stones; indeed, that we would do God a great favor if we honored them; thus we had confidence in them. So they deprived us not only of money, but also of our souls. Now it is not necessary to break the arms and legs of such images, to smash them, for the heart would still remain unclean, but it is necessary to bring the people with the word that they have no confidence in images, as if they could help them, or as if they wanted to

1) Erlanger: the others.
2) Erlanger: St. Anne Crucifix.

To do God a special service with it; for the heart must know that nothing pacifies nor helps it but God's grace and goodness alone.

(42) But that the iconoclasts taught these things, they let stand, but go rather, and provoke the people to storm the images. Then the heart remains full, full of idolatry, thinking no other way than that it would do good, and please God, to storm the images, and proceeds to judge the others who do not, when there is neither a word nor a command from God. But if the people were taught that nothing helps in the sight of God but His grace and mercy, the images would fall from them and come into contempt. For they would think, "If it is not a good work to make pictures, then the devil will make pictures and painted panels; I will henceforth keep my money or invest it better. But the spirits of the red men must do something special, otherwise one would not think anything of them.

(43) The Jews have a commandment that they should not have images, but they have stretched the commandment too thin. For God rejects the images that one sets up, worships, and puts in God's place. For they are two different images. Therefore he makes a distinction and gives a rule as to which images are forbidden, namely, those that are set up as if they were images of God, as the text is very clear. Therefore, those who say, "All images are forbidden to the Jews," 3) are muzzled.

(44) The Jews are also too superstitious to make this text too strict, as our mad sophists do with Sundays and holidays, who soon make it a sin to sell herbs or do anything else of little consequence on Sundays. If they want to make it so tight, it would be better to sleep the whole holiday; otherwise one cannot be without work, as the Jews and Sophists interpret it. For it is work to put on a skirt, to take off shoes, to walk, to stand, to get up, to eat and to drink. But if one wants to interpret the Scriptures and the Word of God in this way, what will come of it? But this is the opinion with the celebration that they should not do any work that would prevent God's work.

So also here no image is forbidden, because those, thereby the service is prevented. So now here no other image is forbidden, because God's image, which one worships.

(46) They forbid children to sit on benches and tables, lest they fall; they forbid them to go to water, lest they be drowned; they forbid them to hold bread knives in their hands, lest they be stabbed; thus they forbid children, which nature does not forbid. For because the children are weak and without understanding, they would be harmed if they were not resisted. So God also guided the rude Jewish people with such commandments, forbidding them the outward images, so that they would not abuse them, would not fall into idolatry. But those who have understanding and are full of the Holy Spirit are not allowed to follow such commandments.

(47) If I were to be forbidden to take a knife in my hand to cut bread, lest I harm myself, or to walk on water, for yesterday a child would have drowned in the water, or to climb a bench, lest I fall, it would be a foolish, ridiculous commandment; I would say: Thou fool, lookest on me for a child, shall I first be swayed? So do our enthusiasts, pretending to be such foolish children, and still want to be taken for great teachers; but they may well go to school for a while. Moses was a disciplinarian of the Jews, as Paul says [Gal. 3, 24], who were a coarse, carnal people, to whom it was necessary to give outward commandments of images, so that they would not be offended by them. And it could still happen today that such commandments are given to the coarse people; but we Christians, who have God's word, are not allowed to do such jiggery-pokery, we do not belong to Mosi's school, we have a better master.

(48) Therefore, the Jews, as a rude and foolish people, were forbidden the images only because they wanted to honor God. But the Jews are nevertheless so

1) In the old editions: "heutes tages". Cf. 1 Sam. 17, 46, where in the Weimar Bible: "Heuts Tages" is found.

Foolishly, they do not throw away the good guilders and fat pennies, of which they have a lot, even if Mary's or St. John's picture is stamped on them, so that they, if all pictures were forbidden to them, would also have to avoid these. But this is just fool's heiding. Christ is probably as wise and learned as the spirits of the swarms; nevertheless, he is not afraid of committing sin, since he attacked the interest penny on which the image of the emperor, who was a pagan, stood, since he also asked [Matth. 22, 19. 20.] what the image and the inscription were, he did not say to the Jews: Fie, that this and 3) that concern you, why do you show me such an image, which God has forbidden you? you shall certainly not attack it. That is why you attack it on the wall, that not all images are forbidden. But if we were to follow the enthusiasts, we would have to coin no money, look into no water, look into no mirror, and put away everything that has only an image; indeed, we would have to put out people's eyes if we were to have no image at all, for we see images on money, in water, in the mirror. Are these not fine preachers? Therefore, you see clearly that God does not mean all kinds of images.

(49) Answer, then, the enthusiasts: Dear, what does the first commandment hold? What is its opinion? It does not teach about external things, such as plowing the fields or making shoes, but how to honor and serve God, both internally and externally. If you want to teach well and interpret the Bible correctly, you have to find the right opinion. Now, the first commandment teaches that I should have one God, serve and honor him alone; all the words in this first commandment apply to the sense and understanding. Therefore, the images are forbidden here that are needed contrary to the meaning and understanding of this commandment, namely, that one should not have confidence in images, but should look to God alone for all good things, and avoid everything that hinders us from this confidence.

50: Now by this text: "You shall have no other gods beside me", only the divine images are forbidden; 4) in addition to that the

2) In the original edition and in the Wittenberg: da er auch gefragt ward.

3) Erlanger: or.

4) Divine ones that represent God.

Jews, and not us. For this is said to the Jews alone. The words are well to remember. He does not say, "You shall have no other image before you," but says, "You shall have no other gods beside me," or before me. What does it mean to have gods? Wooden, stone, and silver images, which are gods, as follows. For men are caused to become idolaters; and though they do not worship wood, stone, silver, and gold, yet they have confidence that it pleases God to set up images in his honor; which then is contrary to the opinion of the first commandment, "I am the LORD thy God, thou shalt not" 2c.

51 Therefore take heed to the meaning of this commandment: I will, saith he, be thy God, I will save thee. I will help you, and that out of pure grace; [you] must not serve me, you must not establish a service out of your own conceit; you must not have the glory before me, that you buy something from me by your merit; I will not look upon your service. If I am to be your God, I will give you everything for free, body and life, wife and child, fields, meadows, wealth, honor and goods, forgiveness of sins and eternal life. These are divine works and gifts which I give thee; and thou canst neither give me nor do anything for them, but only give thanks unto me, praise me, and glorify me; not for that 1) which thou shalt yet receive, but for that 1) which thou hast now received. For thanksgiving is only for what you have received, not for what 1) you are yet to receive. What now wants to lead you against this opinion, that take away.

The iconoclasts, however, drive to, tear down the images externally. I did not almost want to dispute that. But they add: it must be, and it pleases God. In this way, they do not do anything different, except that they pull the images out of the eyes and put them in the hearts of the people, reversing the opinion of this commandment. Thus they deny God, and still boast, they tear down the images according to God's command and word. The devil on their head; if they tear down one, they will raise up twenty in the hearts; and of the same false confidence that the mob thinks it is doing God a favor by outlining the images, 2) they do not say a word.

(53) Now this is the right understanding, that Gentiles and Jews have the Lord for a God who gives everything for free, (2c) let it be said by Moses, or whoever wills it. Over this God commanded the Jewish people through Moses, that they should not have images to worship God. The other images are also not forbidden to the Jews, although they have been so foolish, and have interpreted that it is not proper for them to have any image at all. Thus, in sum, the first commandment requires righteous faith and trust in God, and nothing external is commanded in it. But no one can have this, if the Holy Spirit gives it 3) into the heart first.

The third part of the first commandment is a comforting promise. We have heard, first, the opinion of what God wants to be understood by it, when he says: "I am the LORD your God," item, that we should have no other gods beside him. Secondly, he also explains what he means by this, when he says that they should not have other gods beside him, namely the images that are worshipped; and that he holds this against the Jews alone, and not against the Christians and the Gentiles; and thereby wants to avert from them all cause by which they might come over to a false faith. Now, thirdly, the prophecy and the promise have remained behind. For God does both in the Scriptures, forewarns or terrifies, and comforts; terrifies the transgressors and the ungodly, comforts the faithful who keep His commandments, and speaks as follows:

V. 5 For I the LORD thy God am a strong zealot, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation that hate me.

55 In this piece it is to be noted that God here, first of all, is threatening, and secondly, is comforting.

2) Thus the Jenaer. Wittenberger: "bild umkreisten"; Erlanger: "umbreißen Bild".

3) In the editions: "jnen".

[He] sets beforehand that he is a strong zealot, who searches for the iniquity of the fathers 2c., after that he sets mercy afterward, and says: And do mercy to many thousands who love me 2c. For this is God's way and nature, as He also proves by deed from time to time in Scripture, that He first afflicts, terrifies, and makes the heart despondent, then He comforts and restores the heart; first killing the flesh, then making the spirit alive. This is what he is wont to do; therefore he does not change this order here 1). Whom he wills to raise up, him he first thrusts to the ground; whom he wills to make alive, him he first kills; whom he wills to make righteous, him he first makes a sinner; and whom he wills to make rich, him he first makes poor; whom he wills to have heaven, him he thrusts forward into hell; so that terror always precedes, consolation and joy follow after, as the Scriptures now and then indicate.

56. also Hannah, the mother of Samuel, 1 Sam. 2, 6. 7. speaks: "The Lord kills and gives life, leads into hell and out again, the Lord makes poor and makes rich, humbles and exalts" 2c, Item, 5 Mos. 32, 39.: "No God is beside me, I can kill and make alive, what I break, that I heal". This is his glory and title, which he alone wants to lead. He is angry and strikes first, then he is kind and heals, gives his comforting gospel, with it he comforts again, and offers his grace and friendship. The devil, however, reverses this order of God and makes it equal to absurdity.

(57) Secondly, it should be noted here that such a prophecy and promise does not concern us Gentiles and Christians either (for the way must be cleared for the evil spirits everywhere); for we have other prophecies and promises, but these concern only the Jews, not us, as we have been told in other passages above (§ 12 ff.). For Moses is a teacher of the Jewish people, therefore his words are all directed to concern the Jews alone. Although the commandments of God are written in the hearts of all people, the hearts are so much influenced by the devil, that they are not

But God now reminds the Jews of the commandments imprinted in their hearts, gives them a written law above the natural light, and even gives it to them orally, so that they may see it as it is written in their hearts.

The law, of course, is in the heart.

(58) If the natural law was not written and given by God in the heart, one would have to preach for a long time before the consciences would be struck; one would have to preach to a donkey, horse, ox or bark for a hundred thousand years before they would accept the law, even though they have ears, eyes and heart like a man; they can also hear it, but it does not fall into the heart. Why? What is the fault? The soul is not formed and created for such things to fall into it. But a man, when the law is held up to him, soon says, "Yes, it is so; I cannot deny it. He could not be persuaded so soon, unless it were first written in his heart.

(59) Because it was in the heart before, although dark and completely faded, it is awakened by your words, that the heart must confess that it is so, as the commandments say, that one honors, loves, and serves God, because he alone is good and does good, and not only the pious, but also the wicked. Although the devil strongly defends that man neither feels, knows, nor performs; indeed, man is not able to do anything without the work and light of the Holy Spirit.

(60) Now this is a bright and clear indication that these words, so that God here prophesies and promises, concern only the Jews, as is now indicated. But this is certainly true, so that everyone should be sure that this commandment applies to the Gentiles or Jews, and that it applies to whomever it pleases: "Whoever does not fear God, he punishes; but whoever honors and fears him, he is gracious to him and honors him again, as it says in 1 Sam. 2:30: "Whoever honors me, I will honor; but whoever despises me will be reviled." But he did not proclaim this prophecy verbally to the Gentiles,

2) Erlanger: "das selbs".

1) "here" is missing in the Wittenberg and in the Jena.

but only to the Jews; as the 147th Psalm, v. 19. f., says: 1) "He shows Jacob his word, Israel his customs and rights. He does not do this to the Gentiles, nor does he let them know his rights.

I am a strong zealot.

(61) That he now says, "I am a strong zealot," is also said to the Jews, not to us. For here he threatens with a bodily punishment, that he will punish the father in this way, if he acts against his commandment, so that the child must also be punished, even to the third or fourth generation. But he does not punish the soul in this way, but only physically and externally. As when he punishes a man's house, farm, fields and meadows, money and goods, as he did to the pious Job, whom he also attacked in the flesh [Job 2:7], though in a different way than when he punishes the wicked, of which he speaks here. Item, when he shows goodness in a thousand members, that is also bodily, and is so much: I will do you good in children and children's children, not only to the fourth, but in many generations and members, so that the house will remain in a good nature 2) and the generation will last through and through, as David's generation lasts through many generations until Joseph and Mary, even until Christ [Luc. 3, 23. f.].

62. again, the wicked generation shall 3) be cut off, as happened to Jeroboam's and Ahab's generations, whom God thus cut off, that of them it is written, 1 Kings 14:10 and 2 Kings 9:9, "he will cut them off, even him that pisseth against the wall, and will sweep out the descendants of Jeroboam, as one sweeps out filth, until [it is] all over with him." And of Ahab it says, "he will make his house like the house of Jeroboam" 2c. He can do such honor to those who honor him; despise and fail those who despise him.

In the New Testament, however, this punishment is abolished. For we see how God leads, and lets the worst, most desperate boys become rich, live in all courage and have the best luck, so that even the pious are annoyed and offended by it. Again, the righteous he lets flay and scrape, well torment and torture, sends them all misfortune.

1) "speaks" is missing in the Erlanger.

on the neck, so that she thinks that everything goes against the stream, as David nicely indicates in the 73rd Psalm, v. 9. ff. But David sees there the end of both, the ungodly and the godly, that God will thus fatten the ungodly to the slaughter, and the Christians he will keep in check with such misfortune that they will not depart from God, will not lick 5) and become too horny. Therefore no one should refuse to carry the cross, because our Lord and Master, Christ, carried it himself [Matth. 10, 38. 27, 31.]. Now the disciple is no more than the master, and the servant no more than the Lord [Matth. 10, 24].

In the New Testament, however, we have other predictions, namely, eternal death, the wrath of God with the last day, hell and eternal damnation, Marc. 16, 16: "He who does not believe will be condemned"; Joh. 3, 18: "He who does not believe in Christ is already condemned". 6) Joh. 3, 36.: "He who does not believe in the Son will not see life, but the wrath of God abides on him"; item, Rom. 2, 5.: "You are storing up for yourself a treasure of wrath for the day of wrath and the revelation of the righteous judgment of God" 2c. Item, again we have also in the New Testament not bodily but spiritual and eternal promise, Joh. 3, 16.: "He who believes has eternal life"; item, Joh. 7, 37. 38.: "He who thirsts, let him come to me and drink. He that believeth on me (as the scripture saith), of his body shall flow rivers of living water"; item, Joh. 4, 14.: "The water that I give shall become in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life."

But in Moses it sounds different: he wants to keep the promise to them, even if they are outwardly pious. And this is the opinion: If the Jews guard themselves against the images and live in the fear of God, then he will accept them and provide for them in body and soul. In body they shall have enough; and if they know him as a true God from the heart, the soul also shall be saved.

Many prophets have exalted themselves in their writings and prophecies, so that they also foretold future misfortune to the people because of their sin; and 1) they promised happiness and blessedness, 2) if they turned away from their ungodly life and converted to the Lord. 3) Again, many false prophets have been strengthened in their iniquity and false pretensions, have not understood the text correctly, have quarreled with the godly prophets, as several Psalms show, especially the 144th Psalm, in which the prophet David complains about these false prophets, saying, v. 11 ff: Their mouths speak uselessly, comforting the people when they should terrify them, saying, "Our sons grow up like plants in their youth, and our daughters like hewn-out oriels, like palaces," and all the corners are full, house, boxes, chests, cellars and floors, they have fine cattle, sheep, many friends, children, in the field all things are well turned out, and sing 4) all that stand and walk, "Blessed are the people who thus prosper."

This was the preaching of the false prophets in the Old Testament, which they based on this text, deceiving the poor people, promising them peace, and yet was peace, blessing, and yet was malediction. Then the godly prophets preached against it, wanting to lead them to a right understanding, but the false prophets sat down against them, as happened to St. Isaiah and Jeremiah, and then the false prophets said: Behold, what is written here? God will do good from heaven to those who keep His commandments, and will do evil and punish the wicked. But to us he does good, giving house and home full, money and goods enough, and beautiful children to boot; all because we keep his commandments. Again, he punishes with poverty and misfortune those who do not keep his commandments.

68. the entire book of Job goes through and through: there Job judges the 5) his Friends, and quarrel with him, saying [Job 4, 7. ff. 36, 6. ff.]: Do you consider God an unjust God, who punishes the pious? Turn it around: He does good to the pious, but punishes the wicked. The false prophets also judged in the same way; when they saw that someone was in trouble, that a wheel had fallen over a leg, or that someone's arm had fallen in two, or that some other misfortune had befallen him, they quickly judged: "He deserved it, God is punishing him, he is a wicked man. And this was a common rule, drawn from this text; so the people followed the same deceivers, judged also like them; when they saw poor or sick people, grind, sinners 2c., they said: Do not touch me, I am pure, God is favorable to me, he punishes you because of your sin.

69 The apostles were also under this delusion when they asked Christ about the blind man, Joh. 9, 1. 2: "Lord, who sinned, this man or his parents? Simon also, who had invited the Lord to his house, when the poor sinner washed the Lord's feet, judged also by the outward appearance, turned up his nose at the woman, she stank before his eyes, and grumbled against Christ, and said to him himself [Luc. 7:38, 39], "If this man were a prophet, he would know who and what manner of woman this is that toucheth him; for she is a sinner." So Christ was not only not the right, true Messiah for the holy Pharisees and scribes, but also not a prophet. Yes, shall this beggar be Christ? Put the glasses on his nose, he is of the devil; for he teaches against Moses, has to do with the leprous, blind, lame people, and, what is worst of all, mixes with whores and boys, with whom he goes around, eats and drinks with them; fie of the loose man! In sum, they thought that God gave to the pious what they wanted and to the wicked what they deserved, and they wanted to conclude from this, because they were doing well in body and in temporal good, that they were the ones whom God was doing so well for the sake of their piety. But they were far from it.

stood. It is true and never lacking: What God promises, be it temporal or eternal, He keeps [Ps. 33:4], He also gives faithfully; but they have looked at the text diligently and understood it fleshly. This is true, those who know, love, honor and believe God, as their dear God and Father, by a pure, true and uncolored faith, are sure of all God's promises. But here it is not brightly and clearly expressed and written that He will provide for the belly and not let it suffer any need, that He will feed in the midst of hunger, even if there is not a penny in store, and that He will protect in the midst of enemies without all sword, spear and armor, and make merry and healthy in sickness and temptation.

(71) But the Jews thought thus: If you serve God, you do not have to worry about bread from heaven, no roasted dove will fly into your mouth. It will happen like this: 2) You will have beautiful wives and children, a large household, a safe house, live in comfort, and have provisions for ten, twenty, or thirty years, and will not have to wait for hours from heaven, if you have nothing in your fist. In sum, there will be no lack, but superfluous enough of all things. So they wanted to be sure, and freshly concluded, where there was enough, and a large supply: There is God, that is a blessed man; but where there was lack, behind and in front: He is not pious, he is maledicted, and a jack in the skin, God is not with him. Yes, even the great saints lacked in this piece.

72) But this is not what God wants here, but this is His opinion, that He will be merciful and not let His own suffer any lack, whether there is a supply or not, whether the bag is full or empty, and even if there were not a grain on the ground, and the wine and the beer had completely run into the cellar, and the hail had killed all the grain, there would be no lack.

Heller iin bag would be, nor would there have to be any shortage, neither hunger nor thirst would harm.

So God wants them to be attached to Himself and not to the present, perishable good. They did not want to understand it this way, but understood that such promises of God would be fulfilled if they did not suffer any lack, did not try any adversity, but lived according to all will and desire. That is, not needing God and never asking for Him. Yes, such people wanted God to wait for them in heaven and let them wait for their money and mammon on earth. This does not mean to believe, but to feel; not to wait for God, but to have it in one's fist beforehand. So the false prophets went on, chattering to the people, where they were blissfully happy: There, there is happiness and salvation, there dwells God. So the verdict had to be constantly true among them: Whoever has sinned, God punishes him so that he suffers evil, and whoever does right, He gives him abundance.

74. But God proposed a bodily promise to this physical, rude people; but they should have understood by it the spiritual promise. He wanted to accustom them to Himself and teach them that they should wait for Him, that He would surely feed them and provide for them for time and eternity. So he mixed both promises, bodily and spiritual, into each other, although it is not clearly and brightly read and expressed. But he tied the spiritual promises to the bodily ones in such a way that they could not be separated from each other. They were to wait daily for bread from him, and to be sure that he would feed them for and for; but they did not want to be in the mind, relied on their holiness, thought that God must give them their need for the sake of their piety; thus they made of God an idol, which they should not need very much. For he who has no lack is cheerful and does everything according to his will, he does not need God's kindness, comfort and help, therefore he would wait for his angels up there, so they would wait for their guilders down there. That is to say, trusting and serving Mammon, and not God, have so want to serve two masters and limp on both sides.

God can also give a boy a box full, but it does not follow that he is pious, because he wants to pay him here. Again, he makes it difficult and bloody for a pious man; however, he is not his enemy because of this, yes, he means it paternally well with him. For this is the highest sentence, that God does not punish, but keeps quiet, and lets one live according to his will in the day.

76. he who lives without God is not glad of a penny, and enjoys little of all his goods, for he has an evil conscience, as the Scripture says Isa. 57:21: "The wicked have no peace"; and they are like the rich man in the Gospel, of whom Lucas writes in chapter 12, vv. 16-21, saying: "There was a rich man, whose field was fine, and he thought of himself, and said, What shall I do? I have not where to gather my fruits. And he said, This will I do: I will break down my barns, and build greater ones, and gather therein all that I have grown, and my goods; and I will say unto my soul, Dear soul, thou hast a great store of many years; have now rest, eat, drink, and be merry. But God said unto him, Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee, and what shall it be that thou hast prepared? So goeth he that gathereth him treasures, and is not rich in GOD." Such people have no heart for God, therefore they are always afraid of death, they are not safe, not only inwardly, but also outwardly; they fear that their house will burn down, that thieves will come and steal their guilders; there is no happy heart, no joy, no rest, neither day nor night. It seems as if they are rich, in good spirits, as if God is favorable to them; but it is the opposite with them. But what joy and good life is this to me, when one is never of good cheer, cares without ceasing, and thinks only how he will keep and increase mammon. That is why Solomon says in Ecclesiastes 9:9 that there is nothing better in this life than for a man to be happy with his wife and to do away with all worries. But no one, not even a king, can do this if he is godless, for he fears death, his enemies 2c. [From] such fear nothing can save him 2c.

But God wants the heart to be right on the inside; let it be right on the outside, as it always can be, whether there is a supply or not, as Ecclesiastes chap. 9:7-9 says: "Go, eat your bread with gladness, drink your wine with good courage; for your work pleases God. Let thy garments always be white, and let not thy head lack ointment. Use life with thy wife whom thou lovest, as long as thou hast the vain life which GOD hath given thee under the sun" 2c. No wicked man can do this; as has been said, he is always in trouble. For GOD is not in his heart, [he] fears his enemies, thieves, moths, lest they bite and devour his God, and, as the Scripture [3 Mos. 26, 36.] says, he fears a rustling leaf. For he that hath God for an enemy hath all creatures for enemies.

78. But it is true that God not only gives some saints the spirit and courage within, but also showers them with riches without. Thus He gave much wealth to the pious Abraham; He made David a mighty king; He made Job richer than all those who dwelt in the east; but they also had the Holy Spirit, accepted it as a gift from God, were in good spirits, and their hearts were not set on riches, but on God; as David himself admonishes all the rich, Psalm 62:11, saying: "If riches come to you, do not set your heart on them.

Thus, all other pious fathers and God's friends were like them, placing their hope not in temporal goods, but in God. Their heart was thus: Why do you insist on wealth, honor, health, etc., it all does not remain, today or tomorrow you must leave everything and go. So they were rich, both outwardly and inwardly. But there are so few of them, but the others have so much.

80. item, one also finds many [rommer people, who have great lack of food, but a good, sincere heart to God, and are those who hold fast to His promise that He will feed them, they trust in it with all their heart, and God also does it with

So they have better courage and conscience with a penny or a penny, even with an empty bag, than a prince, king or emperor with all his goods and wealth, and a morsel of bread and a drink of water tastes better to them than all their tasty morsels and the best wine to great, rich lords.

81. What does that do? God, who says: I will provide for you, cast your care upon me, I will feed you [Ps. 55, 23]. Item sMatt. 6, 33.]: "Seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you." And though it be not present in your sight, yet it shall be abundantly given unto you, more than they that have it a hundredfold in store. This St. Paul well knew, therefore he may write it of himself and other Christians, 2 Cor. 6:10: We are "as those that mourn, yet always rejoice; as those that are poor, yet abound in riches; as having nothing, yet possessing all things"; and to Philipians the fourth, v. 12: "I know not how to be, yet I know how to lead on high; I am in all places and in all things skillful, both to be full and to hunger, both to have left, and to be in want."

(82) Many wicked are also found, to whom all misfortune comes, and they have scarcely enough food in the house; but they cannot be in such good spirits as the godly, but begin to reproach, curse and blaspheme, and become impatient and foolish, saying: Has the devil brought me into this life; what does God take me for, that he has not given me even so much as my neighbors? He has created me in an unrighteous time. Where are they lacking? They are lacking in that their heart is unclean, that they have no faith, know nothing of God, in sum, are without God, as Paul says Eph. 2, 12.

This is the right understanding of the words of Moses: "I am a strong zealot, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation, and doing mercy unto many thousands that love me, and keep my commandments. He promises the Jews bodily welfare. But he wants it to be understood that he wants to bind them to himself, as if he wanted to say: "If you have nothing in the box, in the cellar or in the bag, then you will have nothing.

you shall have it with me. Why, "I am the LORD thy God." If I am your God, I am able to give you without any store; my hand is not shortened [Deut. 11:23, Isa. 50:2]. Some have their treasure in money and goods, some in me alone. What is it to thee, whether thou hast a store of money or of goods, 1) or not: it 2) is so certain to thee with me, and more certain than if thou hadst it in a heap? For the stock you have with you can burn, drown, be stolen, or be eaten by moths and worms and perish. But with me it shall surely remain; and though thou hast nothing, yet art thou rich and provided for, because thou hast me, and in me all things.

84 Again, a wicked man has nothing; and though he is rich in sight, yet he has want, he has misfortune enough; and though he has all things in store more than too much, yet he is poorer than poor. For what harm does Lazaro's poverty do him? What good is the rich man's great wealth? [Therefore no one is rich, if he is called emperor or pope 2c., because he is rich in God [Luc. 12, 21].

So these are the promises: If you serve God and recognize him as God, you shall have enough, whether you have it in store or not. But it is presented to them rudely and childishly. For as the law led them outwardly like a disciplinarian, so God also promises them outward prosperity; it is a child's school and child's teaching.

The New Testament, however, turns it around and looks at the spiritual and inward, holding faith before it, and says: If you believe and are devout, you shall have enough, Matth. 6, 33: "Seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness," so the belly is well provided for. Both testaments have this, but the Old Testament begins with the body, and yet the spiritual is hidden underneath, namely, that one must have enough in faith. It is the same thing in the old and new testaments, but it is a different order. The new seethes on the spiritual, drags the physical with it afterwards. As: I believe God could feed my belly, even if I have nothing in store; and if I trust Him for one day, I trust Him also for one, two or three years 2c. And so the inward faith brings with it, by which the soul is rich, that I also believe that I will have plenty as far as the body is concerned.

Abraham was promised [Gen 12:7, 13, 15] that he would take the land of Canaan, and yet he did not take it by one foot, Acts 7:5. 7, 5. But he trusted in God and believed that he would take it, so he died there and believed to his end that 1) he would take it, and yet he did not get there in body. But in faith he took it, for it was given to his seed. For God promised him that he and his seed with him would take the land. So under the bodily promise a spiritual promise was included, on which Abraham also looked more than on the bodily promise, as the epistle to the Hebrews indicates, Cap. 11, 9. St. Stephen also speaks of this in the stories of the apostles, Cap. 7, 5. f. So this promise was not made to the Gentiles but to the Jews.

So also that he is angry in the third or fourth member also belongs to the law, indicates a physical anger and punishment, not an eternal one. But in the New Testament it is different: the child is not punished for the father. But it goes like this: Every man believes for himself, the father for himself, the son for himself, the mother and daughter for themselves; as also in Ezekiel [Cap. 18, 20.] it is written: I will abolish this, that the son shall not suffer for the father, neither the father for the son. Because he promised the Jews a bodily promise, he also pardoned or punished them bodily.

In the New Testament, however, the promise begins with the spiritual, because he promises eternal bliss. So also, the punishment starts with the spiritual punishment: "He who does not believe (Marc. 16, 16.) is condemned." He does not say: I will punish the

1) In the Jenaer the words stand here: "and had nevertheless no Erbtheil inside, also not one foot wide". The Erlanger reports that this is a note of Walch.

The son cannot be condemned for the sake of the father, but the father himself must be condemned. The judgment is a harsh one, not on the goods but on the person. If one counts the members, then it goes to the Jews, whom he punished bodily, as, at the goods, house, yard, field, meadows, wife and children, servant and maid; as is proven in the histories.

God's natural work, benevolence.

90] It is also to be noted that in wrath and anger God counts and punishes only to the fourth member, but in love He proves His mercy, not only to the fourth, fifth, tenth or twentieth member, but to many thousands, and is a very fine and sweet saying. The pope also imitated God, wanted to become like him, cursed up to the ninth member. He had not learned it from God, but from his father, the devil, who can do nothing but lie, murder and curse. But God does not do it this way; He shows Himself that we should learn to recognize Him as a true God, who is naturally a thousand times more inclined to kindness than to anger.

91 Therefore his own work is to do good. But to be angry is the work of others, Isa. 28, 11. It is also necessary for us, that he should do more good than punishment. For we human beings can by nature suffer God to do us good for ten, twenty, thirty years; but when an evil year comes, with the storm, war, or pestilence, we want to despair; then God is no longer at home, there is only loud clamor. If God favors us for a year or ten, no one knows it, no one thanks Him for it. So our nature can suffer the good deed, but it does not want to suffer the punishment, grumbles from hours on, and would have deserved loud anger. God, however, gives us credit for showing more kindness than anger.

92. so also here; [he] punishes only to the fourth member; but his mercy he lets go to many thousands. If he would punish as severely as he shows kindness and mercy, who could remain before him? Therefore, if one wants to look at the goodness, no divine plague and punishment is too great.

also none to appreciate against his goodness. But we do not see it, we are blind. But when misfortune comes upon our necks, then we see what we have had. If God were so much angry and punished, as much as He is kind and merciful and benevolent, how could we bear it? Who would not despair?

We cannot give credit to God, who is so merciful, who shows us so much good, who showers us with so many benefits, if he sends us an evil hour; what would we do if he sent us so much evil time, sickness and all kinds of misfortune, when he graces us with good time, health and all happiness? Some people go along for twenty years, not having any offense; once a fever comes that lasts more than three days, they want to go out of their skin.

So it is clear and bright enough that God is more inclined to 1) mercy than to 1) wrath. You know how many thousands are slain from the peasants; there appears God's wrath and punishment. But this wrath is not to be estimated against the goodness of God. For on the other hand, many thousands have lived who would have deserved the same punishment, that God should have had them slain as well. 2) Now this has happened as an example and warning to others, and has been a fox's tail. And God shows what kindness he proves to us with it, that he does not let us all fall like this, who deserved it as well as the peasants. But we do not recognize it until the punishment comes home to us.

If he took my eye, broke my leg, cut off my arm, sent me a disease for eight days, so that I could not work for half a year, there would be weeping and wailing. But I do not want to forget that I have had good and healthy days for twenty years. Even if he takes away one eye, the other limbs are still healthy. So he does not punish the hundredth part, counting against the benefits he gives us. But when we die, it is all over with each other, for we owe him a death.

1) Wittenberger and Erlanger: "auf" instead of: zu.

2) So the Wittenbergers and the Jenaers. Erlanger: would also have had them strangled.

So, when he punishes, we shall know that it is only a fox's tail, for we shall not be repaid the hundredth part, as we well deserved.

Question: why does the son suffer for the father?

96. this question, why the son suffers for the father, the prophet Ezekiel has dealt with, and says [Cap. 18, 2.]: "You have a saying among you in Israel, the fathers have eaten sour grapes 3) and our teeth have become dull." And Jeremiah [Cap. 31, 29.] saith, Our fathers have sinned, and perished; but we must repay their sin. And it is still the same today: we sin, and we deserve that our descendants should pay for it. But this is not to be understood that it is a punishment of the soul, that the child is condemned for the father's sake; as Ezekiel himself indicates in this place. "The souls," says God through Ezekiel [Cap. 18, 4.] "are all mine, the father's and the son's, but whichever sins shall die"; but it is to be understood of the bodily punishment. He punishes the children for the sake of the fathers, lets them die, who must die nevertheless otherwise, and punishes thus the fathers that he sometimes exterminates a whole generation. So he blesses the fathers in the children, that [it] much descendants enjoy (bodily) that the fathers have been pious.

97. When therefore he will punish a father, he taketh away his children, as he suffered David's son to die [2 Sam. 12: 18]. For he punisheth us in the goods which he hath given us, showing that the children are the very best and dearest of all goods; and if he spare not the children, which are the best and dearest, how much less will he spare the oxen, asses, sheep, and other goods?

98. but it is to be noted that God rather reaches out to the pious than to the wicked and desperate boys, so that a saying has been made about it: The worse the scoundrel, the better the luck. So he took Job's children and all his goods, punished him bodily; yet he promised himself good things to God [Cap. 13,

3) Jenaer: "Heerling".

15.f. Therefore he had to have enough, because in the end everything he had lost was doubled [Job 42:10].

99. let this be said recently of the meaning of the first commandment, in which he exhorts the Jews to remember that they have such a God, who brought them out of Egypt, out of the house of bondage; that he might prove that he is mighty to keep them from all enemies.

Epilogus or Summarium.

(100) So you have the first commandment, which has two kinds of understanding or usage. First, the external, crude sense, as when one worships stone and wood, as is clearly expressed in the text: "Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image, or any likeness, either of that which is in heaven above, or that which is in the earth beneath, or that which is in the water" 2c. This is the gross and foolish idolatry.

The other mind and abuse is when one does not inwardly trust God with the heart in a right faith, but hangs the heart on other things and relies on a thing that is not God. This is then the right, inward idolatry, and the right, living devil. And although praying to external images of wood, stone, gold or silver is a great abuse, it is only a child's play, and a sign of the inward idolatry of the heart, in which the whole world is stuck and is completely drowned. For no one can believe God and trust that the Holy Spirit enlightens the heart. There are many who abstain from outwardly worshipping the images, but there is no one who does not worship the devil in his heart, whose heart is not drowned in unbelief, that he does not trust God, does not believe Him to be true, puts his trust much more in his own good, wisdom, ability, piety and holiness, than in God's goodness and mercy. That is the right idolatry.

Therefore, the first, highest and most noble good work in this commandment is faith in 1) God. For in this work all works must go, and their goodness must receive influence from it, like a fiefdom. And where faith is not, the works have their head cut off, and all their life and good is nothing; as Paul teaches Rom. 14:23: "Whatsoever is not of or in faith is sin." From faith, and no other works, we have the name that we are called believers in Christ. For a Gentile, a Jew, a Turk, a sinner may do all other works, but trusting God firmly is not possible except for a Christian enlightened by God's grace.

1) In the old editions: in.

(103) In this faith also all works become equal, and one becomes like the other without any difference, whether they are great, small, short, long, much or little. For works are pleasing to God not on their own account, but on account of faith, which is united and without distinction in all and every work, works and does them all, however many and varied they may be. Just as all limbs have their life, work, and name from the Head, and without the Head no limb can live, work, or have a name.

This faith does not only consist in believing, first, that it pleases God that I eat, drink, sleep or wake, 1 Cor. 10:31, or do other such minor works, but also, secondly, 2) when things go badly for me in body, goods and honor, 2c. that I nevertheless believe that God means it paternally with me, stands by me and will not abandon me. To believe this is the greatest art, namely, to have a good confidence in God, who is angry according to our sense and understanding, and to provide better things for Him than can be felt; for here He is hidden, as the bride says in the Song of Songs [Cap. 2, 9]: "Behold, He stands behind the wall, and looks through the windows, and peers through the lattice."

Thirdly, the highest degree of faith is when God does not strike and punish the conscience with temporal suffering, but with death, hell and sin, and immediately denies grace and mercy, as if He wanted to condemn and anger eternally, which few people experience, as David laments Ps. 6, 2: "Lord, do not punish me in Your wrath" 2c. Here to believe that God has a gracious pleasure over us is the highest work, that may come to pass from and in the creature. This good will and good pleasure, in which our confidence stands, was proclaimed by the angels from heaven when they sang on Christmas Eve [Luc. 2:14]: Gloria in excelsis Deo,

2) "zum andern" is missing in the Wittenberg and in the Jena.

"Glory to God in the highest, peace on earth, and goodwill toward men."

This is the meaning of this commandment: "You shall have no other gods": because I alone am your God, you shall put all your trust, confidence and faith in me alone, and in no one else. For this does not mean to have a God, if you call him God outwardly with your mouth, or if you worship him with your knees and gestures, but if you sincerely trust in him and put all your trust in him, whether in life or death, in love or suffering, as John 4:23 says of true worshippers. And this faith and confidence of heart is the true fulfillment of this first commandment, without which there is no other work that can do justice to this commandment.

(107) And as this commandment is the first, highest and best, from which all the others flow, go in it, and are judged by it, so also its work (that is, faith or confidence in God's mercy) is the first, highest, best work, from which all the others flow, go and are judged; and other works against it are just as if the other commandments were without the first, and there were no God. For this reason St. Augustine says that the works of the first commandment are believing, hoping and loving. For such confidence brings with it love and hope.

The other commandment of the first tablet.

V. 7 Thou shalt not take the name of the LORD thy God in vain. The LORD will not hold him innocent who takes his name in vain.

Summa.

(108) The other commandment teaches how a person is to conduct himself outwardly in words before men, or inwardly before himself, namely, to honor God's name. For no one can denounce God either before himself or before men according to the divine nature, but by his name.

You shall call the name of the LORD 2c.

In the first commandment you heard an urging and a promise if they kept his commandments. Here he puts only an exhortation and no promise. So the two commandments have the addition before all the others, that he will forbid with wrath, and will have kept them more than with any other. For the higher and greater the commandments are, the more easily, and the less, and the more shamefully, they are despised. The following commandments, such as killing, stealing, committing adultery, and bearing false witness, although they are also dangerous 1) and abused, are not as daily and mean as the first two commandments. For there are many of them who outwardly do not kill, do not commit adultery, do not steal, do not bear false witness; but here is no one who is not stained and defiled with idolatry in his heart, and does not take the name of God in vain.

Therefore, because it is so easily despised and thrown to the winds, God holds it in higher esteem, placing a charge that we should hold it in higher esteem. For He does not want it to be despised; indeed, He wants us to put more diligence and respect into it than into the others. For the others are easily kept where the first two are rightly taken. But we turn the page and hold least those we should hold most.

The commandment also has two abuses, like the first. The first is when one swears and curses uselessly by God's name and misuses it. 2) This is how the Jews understood it. Such swearing by God's name 2c. is now quite common and in daily use. For among all the members we have no more frivolous 3) member than the tongue, which therefore snaps, esteems low, that it thus frivolously names the name of God in frivolous things, which it should nevertheless hold in great honor. Therefore, because he is held in such low esteem, he adds a word of condemnation, saying, "God will not hold him innocent," 2c. It will not go well with him, he will see the punishment one day, he will grab him on the hood, so that he will rebuke and curse, and his

1) laughable --- gangly.
2) Erlanger: misuse the name of God.
3) Wittenberger: justified.

Name thus maltreated, he will not watch the length that one thus disgraces him.

This sin has been preached almost exclusively in this commandment, and has been practiced most of all, that we should not swear, curse, lie, deceive, conjure with the name of God, nor commit other abuses; all of which are gross, external things and well known to everyone. In which it is also understood that we are to prevent others from lying, deceiving, swearing, cursing, casting spells, and sinning in other evil ways with God's name.

The other abuse is so great that the first is child's play compared to the other, even though the first is horrible and great enough. This one, however, is so subtle and spiritual that no one understands it, not even the great saints; it takes a strong spirit to understand and see it. I will not say that one should get rid of it completely. For those who are in abuse consider that they are doing God a service by profaning and blaspheming His name in the highest way.

114. Just as many sin against the first commandment, especially those who have a pretense that they are the most pious and holy, throwing up their own works, putting themselves in the place of God, setting up an idolatry with their own conceit, under which they worship the devil, disregarding it and throwing it to the wind, even thinking that they are doing well and right, and have great pleasure in it; Yes, that is much worse, they want to have their deeds unpunished, they defend them by force; defiance that speaks against them; they do not think that God says he is a strong zealot, he does not let him grab the beard. And when they read it, they think that it does not concern them, and they swear to God that they are the dear children who sit in God's lap.

(115) So also those who have the greatest reputation for piety and holiness sin most grievously against this other commandment, namely, those who preach and teach under the appearance and name of the Word of God the doctrines of devils and the laws of men; preaching and teaching therefore according to their pleasure under the name of God, which they are not commanded to do, are quite insolent and obdurate.

in their proud sense, are not frightened by God's cruel insistence: "The Lord will not hold him innocent who bears His name in vain," which will pass over all such blasphemers; indeed, they still think they are doing right and please God, who will therefore also exalt them. Such spirits never come to recognize their sin; indeed, they consider it the highest righteousness, thus inwardly blaspheming the name of God under a holy appearance, which the world, reason and all human wisdom cannot recognize as evil.

The pope is completely drowned in this blasphemy. For he teaches under the name of God, which is against God, lays great burdens on men by his commandments; pretends that he does it by God's command, and yet the wretched devil told him to do it; thus he puts a lid on his teaching with the name of God: We command by reason of the almighty God, the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit, and by authority of the holy apostles Peter and Paul, 2c. whoever is not obedient to us is not obedient to God. He also knows how to apply to himself the sayings that Christ applied to the right preachers, such as: "He who hears you hears me, and he who despises you despises me." Rhyme. Then everyone fears, emperor, king, princes and lords, fall clumsily in, 1) to hell and the devil.

Thus the devil is able to disguise himself as an angel of light [2 Cor. 11:14], and gives false doctrine to false preachers and false spirits, under a semblance of right, wholesome doctrine. They proclaim the name of God in the world, pretending to be good and crying out: God's word, God's word! So they drive their evil poison into the people under the glittering color, so that the righteous doctrine is completely eradicated, are completely insolent, enter without all shyness, 2) fear neither God nor the world.

Therefore, God speaks here, and dreadfully dreads such blasphemers. Beware, I will not hold it against you; that is,

1) So the Jenaer; Wittenberger: fall in, plump; Erlanger: "fall in plump," 2c.
2) Erlanger: ahn allen Scheu.

I will punish and afflict thee with a terrible punishment. It is much more severe that he says, I will not give you credit for it, than that he says, I will punish you; as if he could not name the great severity 1) of the punishment. As if a householder were to urge his son or servant, saying, I will not give it thee, it is much more vehement and angry than if he were to say, I will strike thee; or, If I give it thee 2c. In such urges the negatio is much stronger than the affirmatio; the words of the urge are slight, but they will have a fierce, harsh and terrifying emphasis against [those] who blaspheme God's name in the way that is said.

119) This is the true abuse of the name of God, that one thus defends the false doctrine, and pretends that God wants it to be so, brazenly boasting: God's word, God's word, when God has not commanded it. And this abuse goes through and through in the whole world, namely with those who have the appearance and the name that they are learned and pious people, and pretend by the same appearance that their teaching is the right teaching. Therefore the common saying is true: In the name of God all misfortune arises. No greater misfortune has come into the world than that under God's name all idolatry and false doctrine is concealed, and such good appearances are made that they cannot be seen.

120 The peasants also got up in such a pretty shine. What moved them? What did they pretend? The name and glory of God. We want, they said, to defend, protect and handle the Gospel. As if God were too weak to defend His gospel, He should have such helpers to handle His gospel. So they took spears and swords at hand, thought they had God's word, thought they could justifiably kill the godless princes, because the Jewish people were commanded to do so in the Old Testament. So the name of God had to be their cover of shame. Who did it? The devil brought the prophets of murder, who persuaded them that they were doing the right thing; they should thank them. But

1) Walch and the Erlangers: size and gravity.

God did not forget his words and soon came with the punishment, as he said: "I will not hold him innocent who takes my name in vain. For he cannot suffer that one should thus jest with his name. He came suddenly upon them, and smote them over the heads; they lifted up the play against God, therefore the judgment came upon them. You have experienced the example and seen it for yourselves; remember it and do not forget it.

Thus it happens, and has happened, to all, as to those who take the name of God in vain. This is what happened to the heretics Ario, Manichaeo, Pelagio, 2) and to all those who took God's name in vain. God let them blaspheme for a while, abusing His name, but then suddenly He came upon them, and they fail so that their name now stinks in the whole world.

So also the pope has blasphemed God's name; although he has done it for a long time, the judgment has come upon him in the end, that now among the right Christians there is nothing more despised than the pope with all his monks and priests; it stinks like a wide-hop nest among them, and will also stink the longer the more, even among those who still hold him in high esteem. For it is true, and remains true, whoever dishonors and defiles the name of God must also be disgraced and dishonored.

This shall be a great comfort to us who teach rightly and know the name of God rightly, sanctifying and praising, not blaspheming and unholy. And even though we are despised, we are certain of our doctrine. But the sects and the spirits of the sects go along, boasting that they have the right spirit, soaring high, and yet nothing but blasphemy; chattering in, God's word, God's word; but they must come down. For the higher they are lifted up, the more they must be put to shame; and if it does not happen, let us scratch out the text here, and what is written here must be a lie.

God watches for a while, but he is a jealous man, he is envious, he cannot endure the length of it; therefore he finally throws in, and truly rudely. It is also annoying to a to blaspheme and desecrate his name, namely God. If someone assaults a citizen in his hanse, blasphemes and reviles him, and wants to do violence there, who would like to suffer that? If someone were to seize such a person in the act and slay him, who would say that such a person had been wronged? For everyone likes to have peace in his house, and whoever wants to take it from him has lost his neck.

If we cannot suffer one another to reproach and blaspheme another, how much less will God suffer that His name should be taken in vain, and that He should be regarded as an idol? How could he do that? It is not his place to suffer. He is a true God, therefore he also wants to save his honor. No one should oppress him, but if he does, he will be thrown to the ground. So the commandment is naturally written in our hearts, that it is not right to desecrate God's name in this way.

(126) Now you have two abuses of this commandment; the first is outward and gross, so that one does not curse or rebuke. This one is so gross that everyone understands it, that even secular authorities punish it. If only they would do it! The other is more subtle, which has an appearance as if it were God's honor; as the false preachers, and those who accept their teaching from them, thus abuse God's name. God punishes both of them; both master and disciple go to the devil.

How is the other commandment fulfilled? The first commandment, you have heard, is fulfilled by a true, right, firm faith, and by a sincere heart and good confidence in God; so that a man looks to God to preserve him, to help him, to counsel him, and to give all good things, both temporally and eternally. This is the right way. But where this confidence is not there, it is not kept.

So, in this commandment, if one preaches the word of God rightly 1) the name of God is led rightly, and is accepted by the listeners rightly. And again, the name of GOD is blasphemed when the preachers do not but deceive the people under the appearance of God's word and name. If the preacher is certain that he has the word of God and is preaching rightly, he does not submit to any honor that is due to God alone, but diligently does what he is commanded to do, does not lie or deceive, delivers the word clearly, without any falsehood, and fulfills the commandment. Item: Those who obey the preacher receive the word as if God Himself spoke it, grasping it with their hearts. 2c. This is the right use of the name of God, namely, to preach the name of God, to believe in it, to confess it, to praise it, to call upon it, and to leave life and limb for it; for all this follows from the first one.

Thus the greatest and highest work according to faith is to praise, honor, extol, preach, sing, and in all ways exalt and magnify God's name. And although it is true, as stated above [§ 103], that there is no difference among the works where faith is and works, yet this is to be understood, that if the works are measured against faith and its works, there is no difference among them. But if they are measured one against another, there is a difference between them, and one is higher than the other. Just as in the corpse the limbs have no difference from health, and health works in one as well as in the other, so the works of the limbs are differentiated, and one is higher, nobler, more useful than the other. So also here, praising God's honor and name is better than the following works of the other commandments, and yet must go in the same faith as all the others go in.

130) This is also to be noted in this and other commandments, that just as the first commandment states that we are to have no other gods, so it also states that we are to trust in One, that is, the right God, through 3) firm faith, and to have confidence, hope and love for Him; which are the works so that one may have, honor and keep one God. So also in the other commandment it is forbidden: We are not to use God's name uselessly. But this is not enough

1) Wittenberger: not.

2) Sodie Jenaer. Wittenberger: like it; Erlanger: like.
3) Erlanger: by one.

but is also commanded under it: We are to use His name usefully, that is, to honor, call upon, praise, preach and extol. And it is impossible that God's name should not be dishonored where it is not properly honored. For even if it is honored with the mouth, bows, kisses, or other gestures, if such reverence does not take place in the heart through faith in God, it is only a pretense and glitter.

This commandment is also fulfilled when one calls upon the name of God in all distress and temptation. For this is why God still allows us to suffer in many afflictions, to be afflicted with the fear of death, to be challenged with evil desires, so that He may penetrate us through such trials and give us cause to run to Him, to cry out, and to call upon His holy name, as the 50th Psalm, v. 15, says: "Call upon Me in the time of trouble, and I will save you, and you shall praise Me. For a sacrifice of praise will I have, and the same is the way whereby thou mayest come to salvation. For through such trials man becomes aware and learns what God's name is, and how powerful He is to help all those who call upon Him, and thereby faith and confidence in God grows almost to the full. Of this David says Psalm 54:8, 9: "Thou hast delivered me from all distress; therefore will I cleave unto thy name, 1) and confess that it is so good 1)." Psalm 91, 14. God says: "I will deliver him, because he hopes in me; I will help him, because he knows my name."

This is the greatest and most difficult work of this commandment, to protect the holy name of God against all those who misuse it spiritually, and to spread it among all people. For it is not enough that I praise and call upon [the] divine name for myself and in myself, in fortune and in misfortune; I must also go forth, and for the sake of God's honor and name, invite upon myself the enmity of all men, as Christ [Matt. 24:9] says to his disciples, "All men will be enemies to you for my name's sake." Here we must Father and mother and best friends, as Christ Himself says in the Gospel Luc. 14:26: "If any man come to Me, and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and child, and brother, and sister, and his own life also, he cannot be My disciple"; and Matt. 10:35, 36: "I am come to stir up a man against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the cord against her sister-in-law; and a man's enemies shall be his own household."

Here we must also have the name that we strive against the authorities, both spiritual and temporal, and are scolded for disobedience. Here we must arouse the scholars, saints, the rich, the powerful, and everything else that is in the world against us; that is, God's friend and the enemy of all the world. And although those who are commanded to preach God's word are especially obliged to do so, every Christian is also obliged to do so when time and necessity require it.

When a man accepts the word of God, the gospel, he should not think otherwise than that in the same hour he will be in danger of all his goods, house, farm, fields and meadows, wife, children, father and mother, even his own life. If danger and misfortune come to him at home, it is all the easier for him, and remember, I knew it well before, that [it] would be like this. This is where the Proverbs come from, Matth. 10, 24. 25.: "The disciple is not above the master" 2c., item: "If they have called the master of the house Beelzebub, how much more will they call the members of his house"; item, Jac. 4, 4.: "Whoever wants to be the friend of the world will be the enemy of God"; item, Joh. 15, 19.: "They will hate you, because you are not of the world"; item, Matth. 10, 34.: "I have not come to send peace on earth, but the sword."

From the oath.

135 Here it is also appropriate to speak of the oath. For by a right oath God's name is also used and honored outwardly, and by a wrong oath it is not honored.

136. is now here a question: whether one may also swear by the name of god in the new testament? For in the Old Testament [Deut. 6:13, 10:20] they were commanded, if they would swear, to swear by the name of God; but Christ, Matt. 5:34-37, declares, "Let no one swear at all, neither by heaven, nor by earth, nor by the city of Jerusalem, nor by the head, 2c. but let our speech be yea, yea," if it be yea, "and nay, nay," if it be nay. It has often been said of this, but for the sake of the young 1) and simple-minded we must repeat it.

137. It is the same with swearing as with striking to death. Death is strictly forbidden, as we know, in the Ten Commandments; but if it is done by command of the word of God, it is right and good. Thus, if a judge allows a murderer or a man who has beaten to death to have his head cut off or to be put on a wheel, he does well and rightly, and does not violate the fifth commandment of God, for God has ordered and commanded it to punish the wicked for the sake of public peace. Thus the dear saints Moses, Samuel, David 2c. slew by the command of God, and not by their own desire and choice. But he that taketh the sword without the command of God shall be judged with the sword [Matt. 26:52]. Now if I kill out of anger or malice, whether I am a judge or not, I am doing against the commandment of God: You shall not kill. But if the judge, for the sake of his office, has someone beheaded, hanged, drowned, or burned, it is not the judge who does it, but the judgment of God, yes, God Himself. For who else would be a judge, and hold such an office, if one were not certain of God's command, and had such defiance that it would carry out God's word and command, not he. If this were not the case, the conscience of a judge would have to despair.

But thus the judge can lift up his eyes to God and say: Dear Lord, I do not like to kill the man, because in your sight I am not more pious than he; but because it is your will and command that the public evildoers should be punished, that one may have peace before them, I am

I am sure and certain that I am doing the right thing, and that I am obeying you in letting him be strangled; yes, Lord, you are doing it yourself, for it is your command. Then God will do him justice and say: You have done right, you have obeyed my command, for I have commanded you. A judge must keep this defiance if he wants to stand before God otherwise.

(139) Just as death, beheading, wheel-breaking, and other such judicial acts should not be done of one's own will, desire, or choice, so it is with oaths. In short, oaths and swearing are forbidden, as is beating to death; but if the authorities require an oath from me, I shall swear. It is often found in Scripture that the prophets swore; item, Christ and the apostles, especially Paul, often swear. Why? Did he forbid swearing? Christ brought his teaching into the world by command of his Father, and to confirm his teaching, which was unknown to the world, and to excite and confirm the weak hearts of men, he used the oath. So also from time to time Sanct Paul swore.

140 Therefore, an oath is forbidden if it is made out of one's own conceit, wantonness, recklessness, and evil desire. But if it is done out of necessity, it is not forbidden, nor is it wrong. But then it is done out of necessity when the authorities require an oath in court 2c. As also happens when one pays homage to princes and lords and swears; and it is right. So also one may swear out of duty of love, namely, if one neighbor swears to another to keep faith with him, if the other desires it; not (as they said) in spiritual things alone, but in all things against one's neighbor, to make him sure, if he desires it, and will not give you faith otherwise; or that one may be reconciled to him, as the epistle to the Hebrews indicates, Cap. 6, 16, where it thus speaks: "The oath is the end of all strife, for a fortification among them." So Joseph swore by the name of Pharaoh, in the first book of Moses Cap. 42, 15. So the prophets swore by the life of kings. For such oaths are not forbidden, as the mad sophists quite

1) Wittenberg and Jena: "Jews".

Therefore, this is the decision: If it is called the authority, and your neighbor desires it, and benefits him, then swear that it is right; because you pledge him to God, and give God the honor that he is faithful, and will see such testimony. It is the highest honor one can give to God that one considers him faithful and true.

141 This is what is said about keeping an outward oath when it is done by command of the authorities. But if one swears without the command of authority and without the duty of brotherly love, but out of frivolity and one's own will, it is forbidden and unlawful, and contrary to the other commandment, which says that one should not use the name of God uselessly. Then (as Christ says Matth. 5, 34. 35.) "one should not swear, neither by heaven, nor by earth, nor by Jerusalem, nor by our head" until necessity demands it. But then necessity requires it, if your neighbor has it and will not believe without the oath, and the authorities swear to it. For then it is the same as calling upon God to bear witness to the matter. If it is not wrong to call upon God over a drink of beer or a morsel of bread, it is also not wrong to use the name of God for the benefit of one's neighbor.

Now let this be said of the two customs of this commandment. The outward abuse is gross and low; but the inward abuse is so high and great, 1) that it is beyond all measure. Namely, with false doctrine and false worship, God's name is dishonored and blasphemed, but through right doctrine, which teaches the word of God rightly and clearly, God's name is praised and glorified. Therefore the sayings from the Psalter, Ps. 7, 18. belong: "I will praise", extol and honor "the name of GOD the LORD." Item [Ps. 99, 3.]: "We give thanks to thy great and wonderful name, which is holy." Item, Ps. 100, 4. 5. "Give thanks and praise to his name, for the LORD is good." Item, Ps. 113, 1-3: "Praise the name of the Lord. Praise his name from now until forever. From the going out of the sun to its going down, praise be to him.

the name of the LORD." And Solomon in his Proverbs [Cap. 18, 10.]: "The name of the LORD is a strong castle; the righteous runneth thither and is protected."

Such praise should not be done with the mouth alone, for monks, priests and nuns also praise God's name in this way, but only to proclaim and preach God's praise and glory, that he does not make us blessed because of our good works, merits and piety, but only because of his grace and mercy. So do not our ministers praise him. And that they not only preach and hear the same, but also confess it before the world and the devil, and leave life and limb over it. Oh Lord, there are so few of them who praise, confess and glorify the name of God.

The third commandment of the first tablet.

V.8-11 Remember the sabbath day, that thou hallow it: six days thou shalt labor, and do all thy work: but on the seventh day is the sabbath of the LORD thy God, in the which thou shalt do no work, neither thy son, nor thy daughter, nor thy manservant, nor thy maidservant, nor thy cattle, nor thy stranger that is within thy gates. For six days the LORD made heaven and earth, and the sea, and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day. Therefore he blessed the Sabbath day and sanctified it.

Summa of this commandment.

The third commandment teaches how man is to keep himself outwardly against God in works, that is, in worship.

V. 8. Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy; six days you shall labor 2c.

145 St. Paul and the whole New Testament have set forth the Sabbath of the Jews, so that it may be understood that the Sabbath concerns the Jews alone. Therefore it is not necessary for the Gentiles to keep the Sabbath, although it was a great and strict commandment among the Jews. The prophets have also indicated how this Sabbath should be abolished. Isaiah at the last Capi-

1) Walch and the Erlangeners: roughly.

v. 23 says: "When the Messiah comes, there will be such a time that one new moon will be on another, one Sabbath on another. As if he wanted to speak: There will be a Sabbath every day, and a new moon every day. So, in the New Testament, the Sabbath is inferior, according to the gross outward manner. For this commandment also has two senses, like the other commandments, an outward and an inward or spiritual.

In the New Testament, every day is a holy day for Christians, and all days are free. Therefore Christ says: "The Son of Man is Lord even over the Sabbath", Matth. 12, 8. Therefore Paul admonishes the Christians from time to time not to be bound to any day [Gal. 4, 10. 11.]: "You keep days, and moons, and feasts, and seasons. I fear yours, lest perhaps I have labored with you in vain." Item, to Colossians [Cap. 2, 16. 17.] even clearer: "Let no man therefore make you conscience of meat or drink, or of any part of the days," namely, the feasts, "or new moons, or sabbaths, which is the shadow of things to come." 2c.

147 Although the Sabbath has been abolished and consciences are free of it, it is still good and necessary to keep a special day each week to act, hear and learn the word of God 1). For everyone cannot wait all the days. Nature also demands that one day a week be quiet and refrain from work, both human and animal.

But whoever wants to make a necessary commandment out of the Sabbath, as a work required by God, must keep Saturday, and not Sunday; for Saturday is commanded to the Jews, and not Sunday. The Christians, however, have kept Sunday and not Saturday, because Christ rose on Sunday. This is a sure sign that the Sabbath no longer concerns us, or even the whole of Moses; otherwise we would have to keep the Sunday.

1) Taken by us from the old edition of Walch. Jenaer and Erlanger: "for the sake of the word of God"; Wittenberger: "for the sake of the word of God".

and is a great and strong proof that the Sabbath is abolished. For we find in no place throughout the New Testament that the Sabbath is commanded to be observed by us Christians.

Why then do Christians keep Sunday? Although all days are free, and one is like the other, it is nevertheless useful and good, indeed, very necessary, to keep a celebration on one day, be it on the Sabbath, Sunday, or another day. For God wants to keep the world clean and to govern it peacefully; therefore He has given six days for work, but on the seventh day servants, day laborers and all kinds of workers, yes, also horses, oxen and other hard-working livestock are to have rest, as this commandment says, so that they may recover with rest. And especially that those who do not have leisure at other times may hear the sermon on the feast day and learn about God through it. And for this reason, that is, for love and need, Sunday was kept, not for the sake of the commandment of Moses, 2) but for our need, that we might rest and learn the word of God.

Our papists, however, have unfortunately made it so that we have been harder on our holidays and have had more of them than the Jews. But it does not matter whether we celebrate or not, consciences are free; whoever does not want to celebrate, let him work anyway; we do not want to scold him or chase him away. But if he wants to be pious, to know God, he needs the holiday for the sake of hearing the word of God. But if he wants to be insolent and wicked, let him go to the devil, as those who do nothing else on holidays but eat, drink, and revel day and night.

This is the gross and external meaning of this commandment, which does not bind us, but is free to us, is in our power and arbitrariness, whether we want to celebrate 3) or not. If it is necessary for my neighbor, then I drop the holiday and serve my neighbor; but if he needs instruction from the word of God, then I abstain from the work. Therefore, the pope does not have the power to keep neither Sundays nor

2) Erlanger: will.

3) Wittenberger: should.

to celebrate other days [than] necessary to command. That is why we celebrate, because we need to learn God's word. That the Sabbath is a free holiday is indicated by Christ from time to time in the Gospel, and when he interprets the Sabbath.

Of the spiritual Sabbath.

152) Here it must be known that Sabbath in Hebrew means celebration 1) or rest, because God rested on the seventh day and ceased from all His works which He had created, Genesis 2:2. Therefore He also commanded the Jews to celebrate the seventh day and to cease from all their works; and the same Sabbath is now changed into Sunday for us, and the other days are called working days. But Sunday is called a day of rest or a holiday or a holy day. It is probably translated as holiday, because we celebrate and stand idle on it. The Jews called it Sabbath, but we call it holiday.

143] After this, it has also become customary to call it a holy day; and here it is taken from the text, as it says: You shall keep the Sabbath holy, that is, you shall keep it holy, let it be holy to you. Now this was a gross, outward holiness with the Jews, that they did not work on it, ate and drank differently, dressed differently. Now this is a bad holiness before God, that I need different clothes, food and drink in honor of the Sabbath 2c.

The spiritual holiday, however, is the right Sabbath, which is kept when the heart celebrates the right Sabbath; which is the highest and most spiritual work of this commandment, which comprehends the whole nature of man.

This Sabbath Christ modeled for us in the tomb, where he kept the Sabbath rightly, where he lies in rest and celebration, abstaining from all works. He sees not, he hears not, he sleeps not, he wakes not, he eats not, he drinks not, he dwells not, stirs not tongue nor veins, neither hand nor foot, he stands not, so he walks not.

156 Anyone who wants to keep the true spiritual Sabbath must be completely dead with Christ. No one will keep it rightly, unless he is really dead. But we saw the right

Sabbath here to keep, when our old Adam ceases from all his works, reason, will, desires, lust, which all is dead, and shall hear in the right Sabbath. And everything that is in us shall be divine, as Paul says Gal. 2, 19. 20.: "I died to the law through the law, that I might live to God. I am crucified with Christ. I live, but now not I, but Christ lives in me. For what I live in the flesh, I live in the faith of the Son of God" 2c. This is a proper celebration of Christians. Item, Gal. 6:14: "Through Christ the world is crucified to me, and I to the world." [One has died to the other. The world does not know what I do, and I do not know what the world does; none knows the other, all is dead and pure. But this Sabbath is finally kept only after we have died.

157. If then we live as Paul writes of himself, everything becomes divine, hands and feet, tongue, ears, eyes, body and soul, all thoughts; and whatever I do, I am sure that God will do it in me. When I do my handiwork and work, I know that it is pleasing to God, for it is His divine command. Therefore, if I am certain that it pleases God, it is not my works but God's, for I do them in obedience to God, and do what pleases God, and not what pleases me, do it with my will and with my whole heart. But if I do my own works, and my members, ears, eyes, tongue, hands and feet, heart and thoughts, are directed according to my will and not according to God's will, they are all works that go outside and against faith. Therefore these are the right works of the right Sabbath, which proceed from faith, in obedience and command of God: for God works the right Sabbath.

That is why God was so strict and harsh about the Sabbath in the Old Testament, by which this spiritual Sabbath was signified. For it all happened in one figure, Col. 2, 16. 17. The old Jewish Sabbath was only a shadow compared to the true Sabbath of the Christians, therefore God also had him stoned who picked up wood on the Sabbath, as is written in Deut. 15, 32. 35. But this was done for our sake, so that we might be able to live with

1) Wittenberger: frey.

To be diligent in our celebration and not to do or establish anything without God's word or against God's word, 1) but to do what we do by God's command.

But those who, with their own reason and conceit, fall into idolatry and preach unrighteousness, giving false doctrine under the name of the word of God and the appearance of the word of God, deceive the world and go out fresh, so that they will only be heard; thinking that they have done well, if they only bring something new into the world. But this text here admonishes us to stand idle and beware of such works that are not commanded by God; so, like swine, they plunge in, tear down images, and then boast that God told them to do it, that it was God's word, that it was done by God's command. But it is their own choice, and not God's work, as mentioned above.

[§ 35 ff.] is indicated in the first commandment. God says to us: Keep still, sanctify the Sabbath for me, let me work. If we now choose our work and leave God's command next to it, we are keeping the devil's celebration, not God's.

160 St. Peter, 1 Ep. 4, 11, says: "If anyone speaks, he speaks it as the word of God; if anyone has an office, he does it as from the wealth that God has to offer: Let all your words and works be founded in the word and command of God, and if you are not sure of this, let it be so that you are not harmful to yourselves or to others. Item, St. Paul, how often he indicates that all his works, preaching and teaching are from God's command; as he says Eph. 3, 7: "According to the gift of God's grace, which is given me according to the working of His power." Item, 1 Cor. 15, 10.: "By the grace of GOD am I that I am, and his grace toward me hath not been in vain, but I have wrought much more than they all; not I, but the grace of GOD which is in me." Item, 2 Cor. 13, 3: "Ye seek to know him that speaketh in me, even Christ." Romans 15:17-19: "I can boast through Jesus Christ that I deal in divine things. For I should not speak anything where the same Christ did not work through me to make the Gentiles obedient, by word and work, by power of signs and wonders, and by power of the Spirit of GOD" 2c.

The holy people were careful not to interfere with anything, because they were sure that God was working in them beforehand; but when they were not sure, they kept quiet with all their doing, singing and saying. This is called the true Sabbath, which the whole world has kept and the devil's celebration has accepted. The pope and all his followers, monks, nuns and priests, have taught only the works of men, and have left the true divine and spiritual works aside, even despised them and considered them heretical, and have spent their lives in their own chosen works and beings.

162. even now, when the true Sabbath was restored through the preaching of the holy gospel, the sects rose up anew, established new works according to their own conceit, and thus tore up the true Sabbath, so that God might not have His work in us.

For if the true Sabbath is to be kept, the old Adam with his arrogance must be subdued and killed, so that nothing happens inwardly in the heart, except God Himself, so that each one may be certain in his state that his deeds please God. A married woman shall be sure in her state that her childbearing, suckling and childbearing are as pleasing to God as if He had spoken to her Himself and commanded her diligently. Thus a maid, when she sweeps the house, cooks, waits on the cattle, shall also have the defiance to keep the Sabbath right, and walk in God's command, if she faithfully carries out what she is commanded. So, in all ranks, one should keep the defiance that God has thrown them into such ranks and works, and each one should let his rank please him, however bad he may be. Then all ranks become equal in faith. For God does not see how great or small your status is, but whether the status pleases you and you accept it as given by God. Therefore, a shepherd can come before God just as well as a the emperor, and his low, despised status does not hinder him at all.

1) "Word" is missing m the Erlanger.

Therefore, only God's word, command and work should be considered. Therefore, only God's word, command and work should be considered, and only that should be praised and commended; the other should be reproached for everything that goes beyond God's word and command. If a maid waits for cattle, a woman carries children, a man waits for his work, a servant feeds horses, a prince or lord cuts off the head of a bad boy, all of them, each in his own class, may defy God and say, "God has done it.

So also those who curse rightly and by faith can say: God curses you. For so the prophets cursed the wicked, yea, God did it in them. But in this way the prophets cursed: Lord, let them be put to shame, let them stand in disgrace, destroy and smite their counsel and counsel, and all their doctrine, drive them back 2c. So Moses also prays against Korah and his band [Num. 16, 15]: "Lord, do not look at their sacrifice", do not let them continue.

If you notice a work in yourself that God does not work in you, trample it underfoot and ask God to disgrace everything in you that He does not work Himself. And if you could save the whole world with one sermon, and you do not have the command, let it stand, for you will break the Sabbath, and will not please God.

The works that are needed to kill nature and the old Adam are fasting and mortification of the body 2c. Of which, how far and long they are to be used, is dealt with in the booklet of Christian freedom and good works. 1) Of the Sabbath also says the Epistle to the Hebrews in the third, v. 11, and in the 4th chapter, v. 5.

(168) Now this is to be noted, that such Sabbath works are to be done in faith and good assurance of divine grace, that all works may abide in the first commandment and faith, and that faith may exercise and strengthen itself in the same, for the sake of which all other commandments and works are written.

Therefore, see how a beautiful golden ring is made of these three commandments and their values.

1) This refers to Luther's Sermon of Good Works, Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. X, 1298.

The first commandment and faith flow into the third, and the third in turn flows through the other into the first. For the work of the first commandment is to believe, to have a good heart and confidence in God. From this flows the other good work, praising God's name, confessing His grace, and giving Him alone all glory. Then follows the third, worship with prayer, listening to sermons, writing poetry and contemplating God's good deeds, mortifying oneself and forcing one's flesh.

When the evil spirit becomes aware of such faith, God's honor and worship, it rages and begins to persecute, attacking body, property, honor and life, bringing upon us sickness, poverty, disgrace and death, which God also decrees and decrees upon us. Behold then the other work, or the other celebration of the third commandment; by it faith is tried almost as high as gold in the fire. For it is a great thing to have good faith in God, even though He inflicts death, dishonor, sickness, and poverty upon us, and in such a cruel image of wrath to take Him for the most gracious Father; which is done in this work of the third commandment. Suffering then urges faith to call upon God's name and praise in such suffering, and so, through the third commandment, comes again into the other; and through the same calling upon God's name and praise, faith grows, and comes into itself, and so strengthens itself, through the two works of the third and other commandment. And so it goes out into works, and comes back to itself through works; just as the sun rises to its setting, and comes out again 2c.

Thus we have the summa of the first three commandments. In the first is commanded how our heart shall mind God in thought; in the second, how our mouth shall mind God in word; in the third, how we shall mind God in deed. And this is the first and right tablet of Moses, in which these three commandments are described, and govern man on the right side, that is, in the things that concern God, and in which God has to do with man, and he with God, without the help of any creature.

The other table of Mosi.

The commandments in the other tablet descend to the neighbor, and indicate how one man should behave toward another. Thus follows the first commandment of the other tablet:

V. 12. You shall honor your father and your mother, that you may live long in the land which the LORD your God is giving you.

Summa.

The first teaches how to behave toward all authorities who sit in God's stead, as they are to honor father and mother, lords and wives 2c. Therein this fourth commandment follows the other first three, which meet God Himself.

You shall honor your father and your mother, that you may live long 2c.

174 This addition, that he says, "that you may live long in the land which the Lord your God will give you," also indicates that the Ten Commandments are given to the Jews alone, and not to the Gentiles. For he speaks here to those to whom the land of Canaan was promised; now it is promised only to the Jews, as he teaches afterwards.

This commandment, says St. Paul Eph. 6, 2, is the first one that has a promise from God. He who is obedient to his parents and honors his father and mother will live long and remain in the land. Now you have heard above, in the first commandment, that it also has a promise and a promise, and the other a promise; how then does St. Paul say that the fourth commandment is the first that has a promise from God? Answer: Paul usually lists the commandments in the other table, and not in the first. So also Christ, when he speaks of the love of neighbor, introduces the commandments of the other table. When the scholar asked him what he should do, he said [Matth. 19, 16, 18.]: "You shall honor father and mother, not kill, steal, commit adultery, not bear false witness" 2c., not remembering the first three commandments.

This is the reason for the question: St. Paul is talking about Christians who are now sufficiently instructed in the faith and in what God is doing; and, as is indicated in the first three commandments, who are now already full of the right worship. As if St. Paul wanted to speak: You must not now do more than keep yourselves to your neighbor, as God has kept Himself to you. Now, the first commandments are not fulfilled by works, but by the Spirit of God in the heart. But the faith that they have in God in their hearts, they are to prove outwardly in their works, so that the works show how they stand before God, but so that these works are established by the Spirit in the heart. Thus the New Testament keeps the commandments of the other table; therefore Paul also calls it the first commandment, understood, of the other table, which has a promise, namely, if you honor your father and mother, you shall remain in the land; if not, you shall be cast out of the land.

177. You see how God holds this commandment of the Father and the Mother so high that He makes it almost equal to the first commandment, leading almost such words. For as the first commandment has a promise, namely: He that keepeth it shall obtain mercy unto many thousands of years, 2c. So also this fourth commandment, before the other commandments of the other table, hath its promise unto them that keep it, that they may live long, 2c. So he will have nothing more feared and honored after him than his father and mother.

(178) Secondly, he uses the glorious word, "Thou shalt honor thy father and thy mother. "Honor" is not a small word; it does not mean: You shall love your father and your mother, be obedient to them, do them good, or the like, but you shall honor them. But honor extends further than love; therefore God thinks highly of father and mother. For honor is due to God alone. Now he shares the honor with father and mother; therefore there is no greater dominion on earth than the dominion of parents. But it has become common, therefore never respects it.

The world despises it, and soon grows tired and weary of it. Kings, princes and lords also have their honor, wear a golden crown on their heads, a golden scepter in their hands, golden chains on their necks; now they should also be honored, Rom. 13, 7. 1 Petr. 2, 17. and feared. But it is not the same honor as the honor one should show to father and mother.

For the authorities of princes and lords are not pleasant authorities, but fearful, for they are our Lord God's masters, judges and executioners, with whom he punishes the wicked; but father and mother are not so fearful, but quite pleasant. It is written in Rom. 13, 3. ff. about the authorities, that they should ward off the wicked, wild people, and handle the pious; therefore they take money, interest and womb. But father and mother is a gentle, fine, merry authority, they do not take from children, but they dare life and limb, strike into the entrenchment for the sake of the children's belongings, put for them neck and belly and everything they have. Worldly authorities only want to have; they cannot give anything, because the children are of their flesh and blood. The princes and lords cannot boast of such things, for we are not their flesh and blood.

But father and mother, they can boast. As soon as the child is born, it must be nourished by the sweat, flesh and blood of its parents. They toil themselves, care day and night, and there is only love, and no seriousness or anger. For if it were not so sweet, if father and mother did not love the children so warmly, how would they be brought up and nourished? They would have to rot in the dirt. But there is nothing but love, service and benevolence on the part of father and mother; they put their bodies and goods into it, bear care and anxiety; there is nothing but toil and labor day and night for the children; yes, everything must serve the children, property, house and farm, maid and servant.

Thus the authority and power of the parents is separated from the power of the worldly lords. With the parents there is no fear and terror, but pure love. With the authorities it is not much love, but fear and trembling, Rom. 13:3, 4: "The mighty are to be feared of evil works." Item: "If you do evil, fear; for she does not bear the sword in vain. She is God's servant, an avenger of punishment on him who does evil." This power does not give, it takes from us, so that it could protect the good and punish the evil.

God is recognized and finely painted in the image of the parents.

Here we should also learn that father and mother are very similar to God in their ministry to the children, and in them the divine and fatherly heart towards us is finely depicted. For in father and mother we can feel and experience how God is disposed towards man. Therefore He is not ashamed of the fatherly name, and Christ, His Son, calls Himself a bridegroom, Matth. 9, 15: "How can the bridegroom's children suffer, as long as the bridegroom is with them?" and Joh. 3, 29: "He who has the bride is the bridegroom" 2c., and calls the community of His believers the bride. And 2 Cor. 11, 2: "I trusted you to a man to bring a pure virgin to Christ"; and those who are born of His bride through preaching and faith are called children of God, Joh. 1, 12. Matth. 6, 9. Rom. 8, 16.

This is now finely painted in marriage. But in the eyes of the world, it is a frivolous thing that despises all these things, for it must remain blind and obdurate, so that it does not see the great wonders and great works of God. If we had nothing else from God but the great, glorious goodness of our parents, in which God shows His goodness, we could not thank God enough for it. But the world does not respect him; [it] is a bad thing to it such a fine, delicious work of God, to be father and mother, to beget children, to wait for them. Yes, our unspirituals turn up their noses at it, when one praises the married state, do not see that the command of God is attached to it. For God commands father and mother to wait for their children, so that we can learn and see, as in a mirror, how God treats us.

that is, as the father's heart is toward his children, so is God's heart toward you.

This is where the common saying comes from, and it is also true: that father and mother can earn heaven and hell from their children, if they preside over them for better or worse. For father and mother must take care and remember to provide the children with food, drink, shoes and clothing in the flesh, and also in the soul, so that they may learn to know God through His word; thus the hungry, thirsty, naked, imprisoned, sick, etc., whom father and mother must provide for, are the souls of the children. Then God makes a hospital out of every householder's house who has children, and sets him up as a hospital master, to take care of his children, to feed and water them, and to preside over them with good teaching and example, so that they may learn to trust God, to believe in Him, to fear Him, and to put their hope in Him, to honor his name, not to swear nor curse, to chasten themselves with prayer, fasting, watch, work, worship, and word, and to celebrate the Sabbath to him, to learn to despise temporal things, to bear adversity with gentleness and patience, and not to fear death, not to love life.

Behold, what great lessons these are. Behold, how many good works thou hast before thee in thy house, in thy children, who have need of all these things, as of a hungry, thirsty, bare, poor, captive, sick soul. What a blessed marriage it would be, if such a married people were together, and thus stood before their little children. Truly, their house would be a real church, a chosen monastery, yes, a paradise. For father and mother become like God here, for they are regents, bishops, pope, doctor, pastor, preacher, schoolmaster, judge and lord. The father has all the names and office of GOD over his children; and just as GOD cares for us, nourishes us, protects and shields us, teaches and instructs us, so also the father teaches the child, nourishes and provides for him.

In the same way, the child could not be closer to its parents, for it is flesh and blood, indeed, the nature of its parents. Therefore, a pious child has no greater confidence in any creature than in its parents, in whom it is so excellently depicted to us how

God is against us, and we are against Him. For as a child takes care of all that is good toward its parents, so a Christian takes care of all that is good toward God; and again, God takes care of a Christian as a father takes care of his child, and even more kindly. A Christian also knows that God cares for him more than all men and creatures, yes, more than he himself.

187 So that the children may know this about their parents, God has commanded them to honor their father and mother. They shall not look at the flesh and blood of their parents alone, for if they look at that alone, they will not find anything delicious in them, and will soon despise the parents; but they shall open their eyes and lift up their faces above flesh and blood, and they will find a wonderful thing in their parents.

For two things must be seen in the parents: first, that they are flesh and blood; second, the jewel that God has attached to the parents, namely his word. For He has thus put them in His word, as in a monstrance, and clothed them with His will. Thus, the parents must now be regarded as bearing the word and the will of God. Just as in the past the pope put the bones of the dead in precious monstrances, in gold, silver, silk, purple and precious stone: this had a great reputation because of such splendor; otherwise it would have remained in contempt, if it had not been so adorned. But the 2) is the right living sanctuary in father and mother. For God has placed his word there, in which is the whole divine majesty. And so it is his divine will that they should be honored; therefore they should not be measured by flesh and blood alone, but by the word of God.

People have run to St. James and other saints, to Rome, to Jerusalem, to Aach, to see the sanctuary; but here no one wants to run to the right sanctuary. Why? It is God's work, therefore one soon gets tired of it; the devil drives us away, flesh and blood do not like it. Because it does not glisten, that is why it is also valid before of reason. There is one who runs to St. Jacob, who vows to Our Lady; another runs to the monastery, but none has commanded you, but wants you to serve your parents; there you find him, not for the sake of parents, but for the sake of His word.

190. But just as the children despise God's commandment in this, and prescribe special ways for them to serve God, so do the parents. One vows this, the other that; but no one vows to govern and teach his children well, in honor of God; abandons those whom God has commanded him to keep in body and soul, and wants to serve God in another place, of which he has not been commanded. No bishop resists such a perverse nature, no preacher punishes it; indeed, for the sake of avarice they confirm it, and every day they only think up more pilgrimages, elevation of saints, and other such devilish specters.

But if you want to find the right sanctuary, stay at home, whether you are a father or a child; do not run to St. Jacob, to Rome, to Aach, 1) to Our Lady, to the Holy Blood, to the monastery. Look at father and mother, there the word of God will teach you, if you honor father and mother, that you honor not flesh and blood, but God Himself, who has put His word on them. And you parents, if you preside well over your children, you do God great favor, as St. Paul teaches in 1 Tim. 5:4, 8: "Let a widow who has children or nephews learn beforehand that her own household is godly, and repay her forefathers in kind, for this is pleasing in the sight of God. But if anyone does not provide for his own, especially for his household, he has denied the faith, and is worse than an unbeliever." If we were not so mad and foolish, and completely hardened, and possessed by the prince of the world, the devil [John 12:31], we could well realize and grasp that these are the right works that come from God's word and command.

These have been the good works of the world until now: to shut oneself up like a wild animal in the monasteries, to count the grains at the paternoster, to wear caps and plates, to put on hard shirts and gray skirts, and to do such monkey business. But no one has been able to see this delicious work of honoring parents and raising children, even though a true Christian is recognized from these works and their like, done in faith. But the world does not want works that are good, but those that shine and are adorned; so it runs to them, giving with both hands. But if a pious and obedient son has walked along in a red or green robe, honoring his father and mother, he has been nothing.

Now it would be necessary to show here how one sins against this 2) commandment, as briefly explained above; but it would be too long. To speak briefly of it: The pope has even nullified and abrogated this 2nd commandment. This is also how it happened with the Jews, as Christ indicates Matth. 15, 3-5. "For your own sins," says Christ, "you have abolished God's law. GOD commanded: You shall honor your father and mother; but he who curses his father and mother shall surely die. But ye say unto the children, that they should say unto their parents: Corban"; that is, if an adult child has money and property, and his father and mother were poor, they would not receive help from their child, then the Pharisees went to it, freshly concluded that it should be given to God and for worship, because it would be better invested than if it were given to the parents. That is nothing else than to prove God wrong.

This is how it happened with us: If one should give father and mother, it was a bad thing; but if one should endow anniversaries, masses for the souls, vigils, carry them to the priests and monks with heaps, help them to their lazy days, that was a spiritually good work, they were our intercessors, lifted us up to heaven. To hell with the good works! The children left their poor parents, who probably needed their help, and ran to the monasteries, pretending that they wanted to serve God. Yes, the devil. Because,

1) In the editions the comma after "After" is missing. Now there is indeed a vestment of the holy virgin at Aachen, but that there was a special Marian cult there, is not known to us. On the other hand we find with Luther particularly mentioned: gen Lorette zur Alarm, Maria zur Eiche, zur Maria gen Regensburg.

If serving God means leaving father and mother in misery against God's commandment, then it is a strange service to me. Therefore, all monks and nuns are against this commandment, of which enough is written in the booklet of monastic vows. 1)

195. about the punishment of the disobedient children it is written, Deut. 21, 18-21. If any man have a wilful and disobedient son, which will not obey his father's voice, nor his mother's voice, and when they chasten him will not obey them, his father and his mother shall take him, and bring him unto the elders of the city, and unto the gate of the same place, and shall say unto the elders of the city: This our son is wilful and disobedient, and will not obey our voice, and is a taciturn and a drunkard; let all the people of the same city stone him, that he die. "2c.

What was the honor against the parents?

The first honor to show to father and mother is to be obedient to them, to follow their commandment, as St. Paul says Eph. 6:1: "Children, be obedient to your parents. The other honor, when we have been brought up, and have now become men and women ourselves, where father and mother are lacking, that they are poor, hungry, thirsty, naked, sick and weak, that we reach out to them, help them, serve them with food, drink, clothing and all kinds of necessities, and consider them the greatest sanctuary that is on earth. For honor is not in words and gestures alone, but rather in deeds. It would be a small honor if I took off my hat to my parents and still let them suffer hunger beside it. "Not with words alone (says St. John in his first epistle Cap. 3, 18] we should love, but in deed and in truth," that is, that the work of love should proceed with a will and from a right believing heart. That is, to love with truth and with action. Item, to esteem them great, and to think much of them, and to esteem us quite lowly toward them, that we may know that God is thus well pleased with us.

1) This is the text: "Luthers Urtheil von den geistlichen und Klostergeübden," Walch, St. Louis edition, vol. XIX, 1500.
2) "against the parents" is missing in the Erlangen edition.

that we should be born of our parents, whether they be of high or low estate, rich or poor; even that which they call us, which is not contrary to God, that we should not think of it otherwise than that it is called and required of us by God. For it is so ordained of God that we have become their sons and daughters. Therefore, we should accept their words and works as if God Himself created them with us. Therefore he does not say, "You shall love them, but you shall honor them.

For honor is greater than love. Love is toward those who are like us; as when two love 3) each other, neither esteems himself higher than the other. But honor is toward a superior, and has a fear with it, lest we offend him whom we honor, and do to him also as to a lord, not for punishment, but that he may love him whom he honors. In the same way, we should not only love our father and mother, but also honor them, hold them in high esteem, and fear them as our overlords, ordained by God.

And no one is exempt here to pay such honor to the parents, be he ever so high. Yes, the emperor, pope, and all cardinals are not above the commandment, because they are not above God. Therefore the pope and emperor are under father and mother, according to this commandment. And Christ also confirms this in Matth. 22, 45, when he says: "If David calls him a Lord, then how is he his son?" As if to say, If he were his lord, the son would be over the father. This does not rhyme. The king's son must still take off his hat before his father, as Solomon also did; even though he was king, 1 Kings 2:19, he stood up and went to meet his mother and worshiped her.

Therefore the parents' authority and rule surpasses all other authorities, the pope's, emperor's, kings', princes' and lords'. It is the highest estate, soaring high above all estates, and the others are but pieces and patches against it; indeed, all estates come from it. But because we all have father and mother, the rank has become a mean, despised thing; not much is thought of it, as

3) Erlanger: an einander Lieb.

God's works happen; if they become mean, one soon tires of them, seeks only what is new and strange.

Now, such honor should not only be done to the parents by bowing the head and taking off the hat, although this is also strange now, but with all the heart. For God does not say: Your hand, mouth, tongue or knee should honor father and mother, but "you". But what is "you?" "You" does not mean your hand, tongue, heart, body or soul, but all of this in heaps with your whole being and nature, how you walk and stand, body and soul, sense and wit, what is on, off and in you.

201. How, if they command something against God, shall I obey? No, God is excepted; we shall not obey if they command against the commandments of the first tablet; they shall have the preference. Then shall the son say unto his father, We have a God more than thou. I will gladly be obedient to you, as long as it is not against God, as Peter says Apost. 5, 29: One must be more obedient to God than to men. It would be fine if it were so in the world that children honored their parents, but if the children do not want to obey, God commands the parents to be ruthless. And where they are not strong enough, God has given them a helper to punish the naughty, naughty children, namely, the secular authorities; as God commanded in the Old Testament, Deut. 21, 18-21, as indicated above [§ 195].

God indicates through the Ten Commandments what He thinks of the race.

Now we can see what God thinks of us, that he gives us such commandments that we should not have strange gods, that we should not use his name uselessly, that we should keep his Sabbath holy. That we may know that we are suspect in his sight; yea, he thinks no more of us than that we are desperate wretches in skin, full of idolatry, blaspheming and profaning his name, and breaking the Sabbath. For if he thought us pious, what should he command us to do? But he lets such a rumor go out from us, makes us sing and say that we are such fine, pious children, who do not know their own Father, their God and Creator, yes, despise him, [and revile and disgrace [him] in the very highest.

It is annoying that he spares no one, that he does not spare the Pharisees and scribes, nor our monks and priests, the holy, pious people; lets the judgment go straight over kings and emperors, popes, cardinals, princes and lords. 2c, sings and says of them that they do not know God, that they do not love God, but that they are desecrators and blasphemers, yes, that they are also murderers, death-rowers, and rascals in the skin; why does he not spare the holy people? He does not desire it. He does not say it to me and you alone, but to all people: "Honor father and mother." He knows what is in us.

Therefore he comes before us, frightens us with his commandments, so that he shows what he thinks of us. It is a great defeat; we may well become ashamed. If someone said to me: "Dear friend, honor your father and mother, do not break your marriage, do not steal; dear friend, do not hit your father and mother; I should soon accept it with displeasure, I should say: Are you mad, who do you take me for? Now God does not think us better. Shouldn't we be displeased with God, that he deals with us so seriously, considers us disobedient, murderers and thieves 2c.? Oh, dear Lord God, do you not think more of me than that I should be such a one as sleeps with another's wife, standing by another's goods 2c.? If we were serious about what God meant by this, we would find 1) nothing else, but that God considers us desperate boys. As we all are, we do not keep His commandments, none excepted; for God has decided us all under sin, Rom. 11, 32. Gal. 3, 22.

So the Ten Commandments are a mirror in which we see what kind of people we are. Yea, saith thou, I will keep the ten commandments well; I will not take from any man his own, neither will I kill, neither will I lie with my wife, neither will I deceive, neither will I lie 2c. Well, dear one, we are not talking here about outward doing or not doing, but that you do what is right.

the commandments of God require, or refrain from what they forbid, with a whole, pure heart. Thou mayest say, I will honor my father and mother; yea, thou mayest honor them, but not farther than it pleaseth thee, and because it is good for thee, and [thou] profitest by it. But when father and mother are ruined and have nothing, and you are rich, when they are sick and you are well, then it is when you are to provide them with clothing, food and drink, when you are to bear their old age, weakness and unwillingness, that you will realize how you will honor them from the heart. Then the common saying will be fulfilled, that a father can more easily feed ten children than ten children can feed one father.

There is an example told of a father who gave his children all his goods, house, farm, fields and meadows, and all his provisions, and said to his children that they would feed him. When he had been with a son for some time, the son was tired of him and said, "Father, when will you go to my brother? When he had been with the other son for a while, he got tired of him and sent him to his sister. She soon had enough of him. So the good old father was completely worthless and badly taken care of. When he was about to die, he sent for an old box, put a sealed letter in it, and called all his children to him, as if he wanted to give them a will and a treasure. The children came and were all obedient. But they did not mean the father. When he died, they found a letter that said: No father shall hand over his property to his children, or give up his staff, because he can hold it himself. Therefore it is lost. As these have done, so do all.

Therefore no one keeps this and other commandments, nor can anyone keep them. For if we could keep it, God would not have commanded it; but because he commands it, it is a sign that no one honors his father and mother. It is commanded, but father and mother are well aware of how the children keep it. Therefore remain unsworn, keep your goods, and do not look the children in the mouth 2c. One can find children who honor their father and mother because they do not need help, but if they have to help them, they do not do so.

If there is no one at home, the honor is already over. Know then that by nature all children disobey their father and mother. Now if a child is to honor his father and mother from the bottom of his heart, as this commandment requires, it must be by the grace of the Holy Spirit; nature cannot do it.

Now parents deserve so much ingratitude for their disobedient children that some say they are doing well: "The devil should take a wife and beget children, if it happens that way. For if father and mother work and make it sour for them, and bring up their children in toil and labor, and risk life and limb for them, what do they earn thereby? Nothing else but, when they grow old, that the children do not grant them life, would rather that they were dead, that they came into the goods. Is this not a shameful, annoying thing, that the children do not grant their parents life? O world, you noble child! You should be crowned for being so grateful. Canst thou not do good to those from whom thou hast all good, yea, life? Whom should you do good to? They have served you and fed you for twenty, thirty, forty years, and you cannot serve them and feed them for two weeks? Fie on you, you shameful world, can't you do anything good to your father and mother who raised you from the dirt, who are you going to do it to?

209] So it is with other commandments, Thou shalt not kill. 2c. But if thou sayest, I will not slay any man. Yea, because thou canst enjoy thy neighbor, do not thou against him: but if he touch thee, tell how thou art disposed against him; then search thine own heart, and thou shalt find that thou art a murderer and a slayer. For if thou hate thy brother, thou art a murderer, as John saith, 1 Ep. 3:15: And though thou kill him not with thy fist, yet thou grudge him life; and if it be evil in his sight, thou laughest with thy fist. This is innate in us; nature, reason and free will can do nothing but kill 2c. There is a murderer, a bloodhound, in all men; in you as well as in me, that thus

No one is found righteous in the sight of God; indeed, we are all like evil-doers, and though our fist be still, yet the fault is in our heart. For that which is born of the flesh is flesh [John 3:6]. Therefore we see clearly in the ten commandments, as in a mirror, what God would have of us, namely, that we are knaves in the flesh, and his judgment is not lacking.

We have now heard enough in the fourth commandment about how to honor father and mother, and what this commandment contains and teaches, so that it is clear that God is very concerned that this obedience to father and mother should continue. And where this does not happen, there are no good customs, nor good government. For where obedience is not kept in the home, it will never be possible for a whole city, country, principality or kingdom to be well governed. For there is the first regiment, from which all other regiments and dominions have their origin. Where the root is not good, neither stem nor good fruit can follow.

For what is a city but a heap of houses? How could a whole city be governed, where there is no rule in the houses, where neither child, servant nor maid is obedient? Item, a whole country, what is it but a heap of cities, markets and villages? Now, where the houses are evil governed, how can a whole country be well governed? Yes, there must be nothing else out of it but vain tyranny, sorcery, murder, thievery, disobedience. For a principality is a heap of countries and counties, a kingdom a heap of principalities, an empire a heap of kingdoms. These are all spun out of single houses. Where father and mother rule badly, they leave their children to their will of courage, and there neither city, market, village, country, principality, kingdom nor empire can be ruled well and peacefully. For the son becomes a householder, a judge, mayor, prince, king, emperor, preacher, schoolmaster 2c.; where he has been brought up badly, the subjects become like the lord, the limbs like the head.

For this reason, God has made it most necessary to rule well in the house. For where the rule of the house is good and

The one who walks righteously is well advised to the other. Cause, because we see that the whole human race comes from it. For it pleased God that the whole race should come from father and mother. He could well make men out of stone and wood, yes, children of Abrahama, as St. John the Baptist says, Matth. 3, 9; but he does not want to do it, but he wants one to come from the other. Therefore he also creates children for us, and gives them to be obedient to their parents, and us to bring them up and keep them for the best. For what good would we be to God if we did not do this? For this reason he has implanted children in us so closely that he does not spin them out of stone or wood, but out of our own flesh and blood; so that the honor and obedience of the children toward their parents, and the care, effort and great diligence of the parents toward the children, may be the more heartfelt and willing. If we do not govern, train and teach children well who come from our flesh and blood, how would we take care of them if they were made of stone or wood?

For this reason, parents see to it that, according to God's command, they preside over their children well, and do so promptly in the first place, because they still allow themselves to be pulled, bent and guided, and do not wait until they grow up and become hardened in their will, or wait 2) until they come into the hands of other people. For one must not think that other people's children are as close to one's heart as one's own; and even if it happens at times, it still happens very seldom, so that among a hundred children there is hardly one that one takes as warmly as if it were one's own, physical child. If the children cannot govern themselves (as we see when father and mother are absent from the children, how they walk around so miserable and without 3) knowledge, and no one takes care of them properly), then God had to put such a hard commandment 4) on them.

1) "not" is missing in the Wittenberger.
2) "oder erharren" is missing in the Wittenberg and in the Jena.
3) In the Jena: "weislos" - without instruction, "waislos" will probably be as much as: orphaned. The former reading seems to us to deserve preference. (See § 214: "no one to instruct them properly.")
4) Erlanger: also vonnöthen.

214. We also see that a greater fault and defect in parents than in children is that they are disobedient and ill-bred. For parents are neglectful, and do not give diligence to their children; and such parents are not worthy that their children should prosper. Now the commandment is there that parents should bring up their children in the fear of God, but where are the parents who do this? They do this, that they love and bring up their children according to the course of this world, as they should send themselves into the world; but according to the soul, in the fear of God, there is no one who instructs and teaches them rightly. Just look at the way they are taught, what schools are thought to be throughout the country. There is no one who teaches his children to pray properly and to do the things that belong to salvation. So no one wants to dare so much that his children would be educated, taught and instructed by other people.

There are some animals that eat their own young and spoil their own fruit. So are such men who do not teach and instruct their children. Indeed, there is no animal on earth that is so hard on its young as a human being, if we look at it in terms of the soul. Therefore, they would be worthy if God were not so pious and defended the parents from the children, so that the children would throw the parents over their heads, even beat them to death, because they have so little respect for them and do not teach and instruct them well.

The fact that the parents' rule still goes on a little, and the children are still a little obedient to them, does not come from our merit, but is the grace of God, who gives them this for abundance, and, like other gifts, throws it into the rapture; otherwise it should all go to ruin, as the devil takes pleasure in throwing it all into a heap and beating it into a lump.

The children grow up, they are not powerful of themselves, but are under the hand of the parents; if they do not do the best with them, nothing good comes out of them. What then is the fault? Is it the children? What can they do about it! That is why father and mother should think about

To keep them, to train, instruct and teach them diligently, not only in the worldly way, but also in spiritual things that pertain to the salvation of souls.

But what shall I say much? How shall they teach and instruct the children much 1) in spiritual things, if they do not teach them 2) how to live outwardly in the presence of the wager, how to keep house 2c. It does not happen, because it is a commandment of God. The devil has captured the hearts and leads them as he pleases; therefore the world remains full of wolves, bears, lions and unreasonable, wild animals.

219. But righteous men see well what God wants indicated by the rule and obedience of parents, namely, that father and mother are bishops, popes, doctors, emperors, princes and lords in their houses. Therefore a father should punish his child like a judge, teach like a doctor, preach to him like a priest or bishop. If a father does this, he can stand before God; if he does not, he will receive his reward from God in due time. For, as was said above [§ 184], father and mother can earn the kingdom of heaven from their children. So again, may parents not earn hell more easily than by their own children, in their own house, where they neglect them and do not teach the things as has been said. What good would it do if they fasted to death, prayed, and did all the works, and yet failed to do what they were commanded by God? God will not ask them about these things on Judgment Day, but about the children He has commanded them.

220. But it should be noted, as is said in other commandments, that this work must also be done in the main work, namely, in faith. For discipline and teaching to keep children is nothing in itself before God, unless it is done in faith, so that the person does not doubt that it pleases God that the parents had the children for the best, and let such a work be no other than an admonition and training of his faith to trust God and to do everything in his power.

1) "much" is missing from Erlanger.

2) "they" is missing in the Wittenberg and in the Jena.

To provide good things for him, without which faith no work is living, good and pleasant. For many pagans have brought up their children nicely and honestly before the world, but all was lost because of unbelief, as Paul says Rom. 14, 23: "What does not come from faith is sin"; and again: "To those who love God, all is well", Rom. 8, 28.

Now this is a glorious commandment. Though it is small in words, it is powerful in deed, for the whole world is governed by the commandment. For if this regiment of parents were taken away, 1) it would be done with the whole world; for without the regiment it cannot stand. Whoever then is in this regiment is commanded a great office. This St. Paul can finely emphasize and exalt, since he says [1 Cor. 11:7], "The woman is the man's honor." For God has commanded a man to rule his wife and children, not that a man should exalt himself and take pleasure in it, but that it is a good command from the divine majesty, therefore the man is honorable. 2) For the man is honorable, not that he should exalt himself and take pleasure in it, but that it is a good command from the divine majesty, therefore the man is honorable. 3) He who does not have a wife and child does not have this honor and office. Thus he also speaks of the man as having the honor of God, that is, as being under the authority of God, and is ruled by God. As the man is under God, so the woman is under the man. Thus the Scriptures everywhere praise and extol the conjugal state; but with us it is contemptible. Therefore we are swine, and remain swine, and do not see what God wants and commands. This is how parents should behave towards their children, and children towards their parents.

From the parents the rule comes to the secular authorities. For as parents have power over their children and household at home, so the authorities have power over a whole community. The parents establish justice and peace in the home; the authorities establish peace and justice in a whole community and in all places. Therefore

It is also the office of the authorities to be a father, to do good to all men, to show kindness, and to do neither violence nor injustice to anyone. Therefore they have also in the Hebrew language the name Nedibim [XXXXX] of beneficence; and in the 51st Psalm, v. 14, the Holy Spirit is called a princely spirit, that is, which can do nothing but beneficence, as should be the office of princes; and Christ [Luc. 22, 25] calls them beneficos, gracious lords, also of beneficence. But how secular authorities should behave toward their subjects, and the subjects toward their authorities, is sufficiently indicated in the booklet of secular authorities, 4).

223 This also includes the obedience of the spirit, the workers and day laborers to their masters, wives, masters and mistresses, of which Paul tells Titum Cap. 2, 9. Col. 3, 22. and St. Peter 1. Ep. 2, 18.

The fifth commandment, or the other commandment 5) of the other tablet.

V. 13. You shall not kill.

Summa of this commandment.

The other commandment of the other tablet teaches how one should behave toward one's equal or neighbor, for the sake of one's own person, so that one does not offend it, but rather, where it is allowed, promotes and helps it.

You shall not kill.

The first commandment in the other table is to honor father and mother, and is therefore the closest to the commandments concerning God; and therefore goes to the first table, because in the fourth commandment is understood the authority, which is in God's stead, as Paul Rom. 13, 2. indicates: "Whoever resists the authority, resists God's order. In the first three commandments one sins against God; in the first commandment of the other table one sins against the authorities, which God Himself ordered and instituted, Gen. 9:6, and Christ and Paul did not abolish them, but confirmed them.

4) St. Louis edition, vol. X, 374.

5) "Commandment" is missing in the Erlanger.

1) Erlanger: away is.

2) In the Jenaer and in the Erlanger: "sichs" -----sich deß. Wittenberg: sich.

3) In the Wittenberg and in the Jena: ehereich.

Now, the commandments that follow do not apply to the authorities, but to our equals and to our neighbors. We all lack and despise this, like other commandments, and do not believe that God speaks it, and that God is serious; we regard it as if a loose talker had said it. Therefore they remain commandments, because the natural man does not understand the things concerning the spirit [1 Cor. 2:14]. Therefore no man keeps the commandments unless he is a Christian and enlightened by the Spirit of God.

227 Thus the fifth commandment reads: "Thou shalt not kill," and applies to our neighbor's person. There we see once what God thinks of us, how much good he has in mind for us, what he has in mind with this commandment: "Thou shalt not kill. He thus remembers: I have wild, unreasonable, mad, raging beasts in the world, wolves, bears, lions, 2c., therein I must shut them up, bar them, grate them with iron bars, and close them with strong walls, lest they choke one another and do great harm. For if God did not have the care, what would He have the commandments to give? God knows our heart and nature well, that murder is innate in our flesh; therefore He also gives this commandment that we should know ourselves; He is concerned that we strangle one another like mad, raging dogs, wolves and bears; He therefore considers us to be desperate boys who strangle and murder one another. And the history, which Moses describes after Adam, is about murder and death, how one brother strangles the other.

228. Now go, dear man, boast, we want to be holy. [We boast of our reason, wisdom and free will; but what does God think of us? This is what He thinks of us, that we are all murderers and slayers, none excepted. And if God acts like a mayor or a prince, when he hears that some threatening words pretend that they want to do harm, to break in at night, then he lets watch and guard, so that they are resisted. So God does not do us any good, but considers us all to be murderers; therefore he commands us not to kill.

229. But it is annoying that God speaks into the community and excludes no one, lets the judgment go over all people, over pious and evil, poor and rich, high and low class, be it prince, lord or servant [Rom. 11, 32. Gal. 3, 22.]. He would have spared the holy people, the Pharisees. But he spares no one, he exempts no man, he strikes them all, and throws them all into one heap. As if he wanted to say: They are all boys, murderers and death thrower, it is none, he has a bloodhound in his bosom. This is now a short decision: as we are all at once disobedient father and mother, so we are also all at once murderers. Now learn what the world is like for a child; which the ten commandments show very well, in which you see, as in a mirror, what we are like outside and inside.

But you say: 2) I do not want to kill, murder, or strike anyone dead; I would also not like to harm a child. Well, my dear, if one does what you would like, because one smiles at you kindly and calls you dear friend, then you are well pious; but if one does you wrong, if one takes you by surprise, if one is angry with you, then it is found, then one will see your patience well, you should soon hit one in the mouth, yes, strangle, if it would be without danger for you. What is the cause? Your evil nature, in which you were born, God sees it in you, who is a searcher of hearts [1 Chron. 29:9], therefore he has given this commandment. But if thou couldst have a sweet heart toward thine enemy, and grant him all good, and no evil, if he enrage and provoke thine heart to anger, thou mayest boast: I do not kill. But where is one who does? No one does. For you can be kind to your neighbor so far as he does you no harm. If he does you harm, your friendship toward him is already over, and you cannot refrain from sinning against this commandment. You kill him; if you do not do it with your fist, you do it with your heart.

1) Erlanger: er.

2) The words: "I will ... todtschlagen" are missing in the Wittenberger.

Therefore it is not enough that you are not a murderer outwardly. For even if the hand remains still, the reason of the heart is poisoned, because you do not begrudge your enemy anything good, you laugh into your fist when he is bad, when he is ill, corrupt or dies; and when he is well, you do not begrudge him. All this is called murdering and killing. And this beautiful virtue is in the heart of all people by nature.

Therefore, as I have said, the Ten Commandments are given to us, that we may learn to know ourselves, what pious children we are, and what herbs our hearts are, and what God thinks of us, that we may be ashamed in our hearts and afraid of ourselves, when we see in the Ten Commandments, as in a mirror, that we are all idolaters, blasphemers of God's name, disobedient to our parents, murderers and bloodhounds.

233 Christ interprets this commandment, Matth. 5, 21. 22. when he says: "You have heard that it was said to the ancients: You shall not kill. But whosoever killeth shall be guilty of judgment. But I say unto you: Whosoever is angry with his brother is guilty of judgment." There Christ shows that you sin against this commandment, not only if you kill someone with your fist, but also if you are angry with your neighbor. And Christ makes several degrees and distinctions of anger. First, do not be angry in heart; second, do not show anger with signs or gestures; third, do not rebuke with words; and fourth, keep silent with your fist.

No one is exempt, but we all become guilty. For although the fist, the mouth and other limbs keep still, the heart is full of anger, envy and hatred. All these are found among us. If each one looks into his heart, he must not be shown much scripture; his own conscience will tell him and convince him that he is guilty in this. It is evident from our outward fruits and conduct what kind of companions we are; no one can ignore another's word; how then can he be kind to his enemy with all his heart?

The third commandment of the other tablet.

V. 14. You shall not commit adultery.

Summa.

The third commandment of the second tablet teaches how to treat one's neighbor's most valuable possession as one's own person, that is, one's legitimate spouse, child or friend, so that one does not disgrace them but keeps them in honor.

You shall not commit adultery.

This is a great and beautiful honor that God bestows upon the world, namely, that it is a stable full of adulterers and adulteresses! God deserves it from us that we should become enemies of Him, because He thus disgraces us, scorns us and reviles us, and does not exempt anyone from this, not even our monks, even if they had vowed chastity once again. There you see that God does not trust us to have a husband who would let himself be pleased with his wife 1) and again, a wife who would let herself be pleased with her husband. It should still annoy one, if one peeled him an adulterer, and said to him: Dear, keep your marriage, don't go to another man's wife, don't disgrace his daughter, and so on; 2) if it would be a pious man. He should soon speak: What do you consider me to be, do you consider me to be such? But God does not spare any of us; in this commandment he scolds all of us as adulterers and adulteresses at the same time; he wants to show what kind of companions we are.

So this commandment is also a book of blasphemy and a title of shame; reproach us all, no one excepted, that we are whoremongers; though we are not so publicly before the world, yet we are so in our hearts, and if we had space, time, place and opportunity, we would all break the marriage. The species is implanted in all people; none is exempt, whether man or woman, old or young, they all lie ill in this spital. And this plague does not cling to us like a red skirt, so that we could get rid of it.

1) Erlanger: Weibe.

2) Wittenberger: and so on. Erlanger: forthrightly from. Jenaer: before from.

1) or put away, but we brought it from our mother's womb, and it has passed through our skin and flesh, marrow and bone, and through and through all our veins. Are there not many who do not fornicate, but lead a good life? Well, my dear, I do not say of the doing, but of the kind. God does not allow Himself to be mimicked by works; the Scriptures call Him a knower of the heart [1 Kings 8:39], He sees deeper than we do.

That some are pious and do not sin against this commandment is judged by his divine grace, or by Master Hans with the sword and the whisk, 2) who 3) puts a fear into them, so that they publicly avoid such sin; if this were not the case, we would probably reveal what is in our hearts, and thus live like some pagans who have not punished fornication outside of marriage. Thus God says: "You shall not commit adultery," but you shall be chaste; as if he wanted to speak: You are all of the kind that are fornicators and adulterers, one as the other.

Because the species is in us, God has permitted every man to take a wife, and every woman to have her husband, so that fornication and adultery may be avoided [1 Cor. 7:2.]. For this vice is very widespread in the whole world, like a great fire, neither sword nor spirit helps. Therefore it is very necessary to punish such sin externally and not to allow it to be a warning to others. And the rulers should diligently strive for this and not be negligent in this.

(240) Our reason tells us that fornication, adultery and other sins are wrong. For every man's own heart tells him to honor his father and mother, because we come from them, and have flesh and blood from them; [they] risk life and limb for our sake, lay up all their goods and chattels for us. So also nature teaches us 4) that we should murder no one, not be our own judges. And summa, in nature all these commandments are written; but we are so mad and so 5) full of blindness that we do not obey them.

not see nor recognize. So also nature teaches us that we should not defile anyone's wife or children. For nature says, Do not do to others what you would not have done to you [Matt. 7:12]. Now no one wants his wife and child to be violated, so let your neighbor's wife and child be unviolated.

But when one comes into the heat, one forgets everything, law, nature, scripture, books, God and His commandment, there is only a pure request to atone for evil desire.

The fourth commandment [of the other tablet].

V. 15. You shall not steal.

Summa.

The fourth commandment of the second tablet teaches how to treat one's neighbor's temporal goods, so that one does not take away or hinder them, but promotes them.

You shall not steal.

243 There comes another large register, from which no one is exempt; the smallest part of the thieves is hanged with the rope. For if all thieves in the world were to be hanged, where would one get enough ropes? One could not get enough of them; all belts and straps would have to be made into ropes.

The order of the commandments of the outer table.

Now notice the order of the commandments of the other table. The first concerns the authorities. The other concerns the person of the neighbor: Thou shalt not injure thy neighbor in his own person. The third concerns the persons belonging to your neighbor, as: Thou shalt not ravish thy neighbor's housewife, daughter, sister, maid 2c. The fourth concerns the goods of your neighbor, that you do not steal them from him, nor do you destroy them.

This commandment shows us once again what God thinks of us, namely, that we are all thieves, none excepted, before God and before the world. But since the theft remains to a certain extent, this is the reason that one has to be careful before the executioner and the

2) Wittenberger: stäupe und besem.
3) "the" is missing in the Erlanger.
4) In the editions: lernet.
5) "so" is missing in the Jena.

The thief fears the gallows; also, where God's grace and the Holy Spirit dwells, there is no sin against this commandment; otherwise the thief lies buried in the heart, and where God does not hold, or the executioner does not shrink, then the thief goes out into the work, to the utmost.

246 But thou shalt not think that it is only stealing when thou doest thy neighbor his own; but when thou seest thy neighbor in need, hungry, thirsty, without lodging, shoes, or raiment, and dost not help him, thou stealest as well as when one stealeth money out of another's purse or casket; for thou owest to help him in his need. For your goods are not yours; you alone are appointed as a guardian to distribute them to those who need them. Therefore those who have goods belong to the round table and to this great register, in which thieves are written, and they do not give to those who need it; 2) they do not take care of their neighbor's need, they pass by.

Therefore there is seldom a rich man who is not a thief in this case, even a great thief; there would have to be a great rope to hang such great thieves. But there are not too many such thieves, for the common man does not have such great goods as the rich, great merchants, who only scrape, scrape, and scrape the poor, collecting great treasures. These are the right and greatest highwaymen, they are not hanged on gallows, but are honored by everyone, they sit on top; but they will not escape the gallows, the devil himself will become master of them, he will tie them up in hell so that they will not escape him.

But the petty thieves who steal scarcely ten pennies must flutter. The Romans, who were wise and prudent people, were well aware of this. For one of them, called Cato, said: "The petty thieves are hanged on gallows, but the great thieves go in in handcuffs. Another wise man said: "The law is like a spider's web; if the petty thieves are hanged, they are hanged.

- 1) Thus the Jenaer. Wittenberg: reien; Erlangen: Reihen.
- 2) Erlanger: they.

If flies get into it, they have to hold out, but if the large bumblebees get into it, they drive through it and tear the spider's web with force. And it is truly so; for if a poor man has stolen barely five pennies, he must hang. Only to the gallows with him, there no pleading helps, 3) there the law is strict. But those who toil and scrape day and night, as usurers, deceive and lie, sell wicked goods, give false measurements, are called mercy junkies, who would have deserved thirty times more to be hanged on the gallows than the petty thieves. But they will be hanged more shamefully than if they were hanged by the executioner.

He gives false measures, the other has false weights, cubits 2c., 4) he cheats his neighbor otherwise, the other so. With his false, small goods, each one does as he pleases. And even if some abstain, 5) the way is there; where they could or might, they also lead out. It is the same with the merchants. There is not one of them who could escape from the thief. Behold, whether any of them have conscience or reason? They sell their goods according to their liking, and still want it to be right; they also say: It is my property, I may deal with it as I please. Praise yourself, cuckoo, with your song; one can hear by your cry what kind of bird you are.

The farmers who come to the market can do it well. If someone brings rotten, stinking eggs or nasty cheese to the market, he is more proud of it than someone with stuff worth several hundred guilders. Another comes with other humbug, and cannot make himself disgusted enough with it. No one thinks that such is thievery; indeed, one thinks that it is an art to handle with knowledge of advantage in our dealings, and thus to deceive our neighbor. But thou shalt not be a-think that you would be excused by this; you are both a thief, where you use such trickery, as if you had stolen it from someone's bag. You know that you do not act right, because your conscience punishes you. And yet you do not want to be a thief; yes, you let other people call you a pious, honest and upright man, sometimes you give a penny to a poor person for the sake of God, so that it shall be paid. But it will be otherwise. You may have a good praise and name before the world, but see how you are before God. Let princes and their rulers see to it that a remedy is found for it. 2c.

251 We can see how it was done in those days, how they traded with the grain; everyone gave it only as he pleased, so the poor had to buy it as much as they offered, because they had to eat. This is not considered theft. Yes, such sellers boast 1) even more, and say: I have now gained so much. Rather, what you gain from it, grease your shoes with it. Item, such fellows, when one leads a thief to the gallows, laugh into their fist and say: It serves him right; forgetting themselves that they are greater thieves than he, and deserve to hang better than he.

252 This is what is said about gross, outward theft, which can be grasped and is seen daily before one's eyes; that is, that there is seldom a man 2) who does not carry a thief in his bosom and is a thief in the eyes of the world. And this vice is more common and more running in the world than adultery or murder. For because murder and adultery are punished, they are not so much more prevalent than such usury and petty thievery. For every man may sell his own as he pleases, without any penalty; so it goes on and on, and there is no end of cheating. But the authorities should see to it that this is done properly, and punish those who deceive the poor in this way. But those who should punish are themselves criminal in this; that is why no crow scratches out the eye of another.

1) Erlanger: they.
2) Wittenberger and Erlanger: be.

Now God allows this to happen, but he can bring it back again, namely, he can delight those who have been deceived, and punish those who have wrongfully obtained it, with their neighbor's harm. For when one has long plowed and gathered, another comes and consumes it, and kills it uselessly. It also happens as one sees and experiences before one's eyes. How often does it happen that someone is so rich that he does not know the end of his wealth, and yet it is so soon dispersed and flies away that one does not know where it goes. Hence a common saying has come from such daily experience: De male quaesitis non gaudet tertius haeres, evil gained good does not come to the third heir; and: Male partum male disperit, 3) evil gained, evil devoured.

So you see that God considers us all to be thieves; if we are not all thieves outwardly, we are not thieves at heart. For he who covets his neighbor's goods is a thief in the sight of God, as the last two commandments show. But that we do not all go out with the deed and steal, that Junker Henker repels with the rope; he is a fine man, makes many pious children. For many more do not steal for fear of the gallows than for love and piety.

255 So this is not only theft, when one breaks into houses at night and secretly takes one's possessions by night, but also any damage or loss that is done to one's neighbor's good, whether by buying, selling, working, or unlawful trade, so that theft is a common vice in the whole world, and those who cannot accomplish it by deed do it with their thoughts; but those who have room do it with their fists. Today there is a great deal of fraud in buying and selling by all craftsmen, all of whom are engaged in great thievery. We can do no more than preach against it, but the secular authorities must prevent it and do so in earnest. But the heart remains full of thievery, unless God enlightens the heart in a special way. The judge will not force it; God, however, who is is a right judge [Ps. 7:12], can repay finely, as said above.

But how is one to resist it? No one can resist the heart, but God alone through His grace. But outwardly it would be good, and indeed necessary, that a proper order be established in a city, and that such racketeering and scraping be stopped, so that the poor man could come to it. Where the merchants or craftsmen would not allow themselves to be instructed, I would give such advice that a mayor would summon the butchers, bakers, brewers, taverns, etc. before him and admonish them to handle the matter properly and to sell their goods without falseness, and to do so in such a way that it would not end up with their children. For if they would thus toil and scrape, let them know that God will not allow such unrighteous, wickedly obtained goods to prosper, nor to benefit their descendants, as is said above. For as it comes, so it goes again.

257. Where such counsel and faithful exhortation would not help, but the people would strut and defy according to their pleasure, it should be done, as is the custom and usage in some cities, that an honest, pious man be charged, to whom a council would advance two or three hundred guilders, so that he would provide a whole city with meat or bread, and the council would allow him to slaughter alone in the city, so that such proud fellows would be humiliated and not strut like that, as we have to hear and experience. One could teach them mores in this way, so that they would not say so defiantly: If you do not want it, leave it.

258 So if one had to go along with other craftsmen, who wanted to strut in the same way and thump a whole community, then others would be careful and not say so defiantly: One must have it well. Because they are allowed their courage, 1) they do it with their craft according to all their liking, toil and scrape without any shyness, and still think that they are in the right. I ask you: Are you not a worse thief, if you do your will with your selling, than a public highwayman?

1) Erlanger: lets her courage.

Yes, of course; one can beware of such a one and flee him, or defend oneself against him; in addition, the same highwayman stands all hours in danger of his life, because if he is seized, he must be held up; but no one can beware of you. For this you are in no danger, but live, grow and steal without fear, and on top of that you want to be called an honest man. Therefore you are a thief and robber, yes, much worse than a tramp. Remember your conscience and your soul's salvation. 2)

259 This, then, is a broad commandment, to which all men are guilty. Therefore let every man take heed how he acts. For even if one does not steal by pointing fingers at him, it is sufficiently said how broad this commandment is, and how the whole world sins against it.

The fifth commandment [of the other panel].

V. 16. You shall not bear false witness against your neighbor.

Summa of this commandment.

The fifth commandment of the other tablet teaches how to behave toward one's neighbor's temporal honor and good report, so that one does not weaken them, but rather protects and preserves them.

You shall not bear false witness against your neighbor.

This commandment is to be understood primarily from the way things are done in court, and springs from theft. And just as the other commandment of the other tablet forbids harm to the body, the third to the person belonging to your neighbor, the fourth to the good of your neighbor, that you do not translate it or preach it: so this fifth commandment forbids harm to the honor and name of your neighbor, that 3) no one should injure or damage his name.

This commandment springs from the previous three. For if a man is wounded in his body, in his persons belonging to him, he is wounded in his body.

2) "und Seelen Seligkeit" is missing in the Erlanger.
3) "man" is missing in the Wittenberger.

and his good, then quarrels and disputes arise, and most of all about the good. And this happens in the whole world where the Holy Spirit does not dwell.

As all men are thieves and adulterers, so are they guilty of this commandment. Because the transgression of this commandment is so great, public courts must be held to prevent it from becoming worse. Therefore this commandment is good for the innocent, lest violence and injustice be done to him in the courts.

Therefore, in such a case, both parties should be questioned publicly, and the innocent should not be wronged or allowed to be wronged, neither should gifts be taken, nor should friendship or favor be considered. But vice is common in the world, and is in full swing. People take goods and money and turn right into wrong. It is also rare to find a pious prince, judge or jurist who does not stumble in it, indeed, who does not become a knave over it. For more attention is paid to the great, mighty merchants than to the poor people.

It requires great courage and a bold man who, in this case, can rightly 1) execute his office. For where God's grace does not dwell in a judge, he never does his office sufficiently, falls to his friend and good patron, or otherwise to a great man; thus sees through the fingers, and pronounces a wrong judgment against the other party, where there is no reputation, power and friendship. As when a poor man comes, one must not be afraid of him, wait for no harm, he must be held out. The pagans have finely illustrated this by a likeness of a spider's web: When the small flies come in, they remain covered in it, but the large bumblebees pass through and tear the web. It is the same in a court of law: If a poor man comes in, and no harm is done, he must suffer himself; but if someone is concerned that he will be avenged, he passes through, even if he is seven times wrong.

So it is with false witness, which is a common vice in the world. For

A man who does not have the Holy Spirit clings to what is good and does not want to lose it; so there is strife, and a man will swear ten oaths before he leaves. God has seen in all of us that we are false witnesses.

266 Therefore the regents shall not judge a case and bring it to an end, because they have heard both parts. Let the plaintiff, however powerful he may be, adorn his cause as high as he can, and a judge shall speak: I have two ears, and you have one mouth. What you say, I take with one ear; but what the mouth of him whom you accuse says, I take with the other ear.

God knows who we are and does not consider us better than when we come to court, that we should make our cause beautiful, adorn it and defend it, so that it is right, but the other's must stink. In sum, no one is so pious as to disgrace his cause. Since we are by nature so minded that each seeks his own, and no one inquires of the other, we should not believe one part to have heard the other part also. So every one, as far as he is a man, is a false witness, a traitor, a liar, and no true word comes out of his mouth, that is, when it comes to a meeting. It may well happen that you do not bear false witness against your neighbor, because he laughs with you and is in good spirits; but when it comes to the serious matter, that your neighbor has a promise to you, or to your good 2c., then you will not be without lies, unless God puts them into your heart; otherwise you make yourself pious and righteous, and adorn your cause to the very best, let the other party be as pious and righteous 2) as he always wants, and let your cause be as rotten and evil as it always can.

Now this is a beautiful title and glory, so that God will mark us and call us liars, false witnesses, traitors and evil-doers. Therefore, we should be justly terrified before him that he thinks nothing better of us than that we are all liars and false witnesses. For if he did not think us so, he would not have given such a commandment. So

1) "recht" is missing in the Wittenberg.

2) Erlanger: like.

267 here we learn what God thinks of us; indeed, each one feels it in his heart.

269 Therefore the common saying is also true, which goes everywhere in the world: There is no faithfulness in the world. Item: Faithfulness is miserable. The father must not trust the son, the son the father, the daughter the mother, the mother the daughter. And as a heathen says: The brothers are seldom one. Therefore it is not new that one is deceived and lied to, it has always been so, we bring it from mother's womb. That is certain. Therefore, if you deal with a man, whether buying or selling, if God is with him, he is pious and deals honestly with you; but if God leaves him, and there is only man, without God's grace, he is deceitful and deceives you wherever he can. If then thou wilt deal with him, remember this: God will give him grace, so that he will keep faith with me. For love keeps the best of the neighbor. But nevertheless, beware; faithfulness is evil, as a Greek prince, 1) Epicharmus, said: Remember that you believe no one. This 2) saw what the man, what the world was for a pious child, namely, therein is no faithfulness and faith.

270. Summa Summarum: We must trust, and also not trust, and know, first of all, that the world is full of devils, bad boys and husks, and we live among wolves and wild, unreasonable animals, who deceive us and lie to us falsely. If anyone does not want to suffer this, let him go to another place where there is no world, for he will find this everywhere in the world, as Paul also says in 1 Cor. 5:10: "If you did not want to live among evil men, you would have to leave the world. We must not provide ourselves with anything else or better; man remains man, the world remains world, the devil remains devil. Whoever can send himself into it, that is a great grace; but whoever cannot, there is misery and distress. Secondly, that we know that one may freely trust one's neighbor, and that one may hit him in the redoubt or not. Hit it that he keeps faith with you, it is a grace from God; if it does not happen that he does not keep faith with you, and deceives you, you knew beforehand that [it] would not be better by nature with him.

271 This commandment, Thou shalt not bear false witness, speaks primarily of the fact that when one has to deal with one's neighbor in court, if it is a matter of property, honor, or whatever, one must act righteously. 3) This also includes all lies that cause harm to one's neighbor. This is also the place of all lies that cause harm to one's neighbor. But lies to joke and fool are not true lies, for one knows that no harm will come to his neighbor. But if I want to harm my neighbor with lies, be it to his body, property, honor or name, these are called right lies.

Item 272: Therefore also belong the useless, washy mouths, which people like to hit the bank and carry out, if it does not happen in court, but against other people in secret, or in collusion, 4) As those do, so one calls afterreder, who have a desire to talk evil to other people, have nothing else to send, but that they align the people, and no one is prettier than they; they are pure, and everyone stinks before them. If another fills in sin, everyone must know it, carry it back and forth, thus slandering their neighbor, defiling and blaspheming in the very worst way.

273. Where one would speak of other people's vices, if it were right, this should be done for the neighbor's correction, not for harm and damage; but if I cannot correct it, I should keep silent and cover up my neighbor's infirmity; but if I can correct it, I should deal with it alone with him, as Christ teaches Matth. 18:15: "Punish your brother between you and him alone"; this is then a secret correction. The other correction is public; if you know anything about your neighbor, go to the place where it can be corrected. So, if your neighbor's child, son or daughter sins, punish him first; then, if you do nothing, tell his parents, or the priest, the mayor, the judge, or those who have

4) Thus the Jenaer: Collation - Society, Gasterei. Wittenberg" and Erlanger: Collation.

1) "a Greek prince" is missing in the Wittenberg.

2) Erlanger: The Prince.

If you have the power to punish, it is not wrong; indeed, you do right when you report your neighbor's sin in this way; not that you take pleasure in it, but only for his correction. But the wicked mouths do the contrary, not speaking of their neighbor's faults and infirmities, that he should be corrected thereby, but that they tickle themselves with it, have pleasure and joy in it, not even thinking that they would punish or correct their neighbor's sin with it.

Such people are real swine and filth eaters. For the neighbor's sin is no different than dung and dirt. So those who delight in other people's sin are like sows, waiting for the dirt to run through their teeth and mouths. For they take pleasure in other people's sins and wash their mouths with them, as swine do in the street, picking up dirt; they take pleasure in it and are not sorry that their neighbor falls into sin or disgrace; they talk about it and then paint the sin in the sharpest way, and can help the matter finely and make it much worse than it is in itself. They would also be sorry that their neighbor remained pious, for they could not atone for their lust and wash their mouths. Such people alone are beautiful and pure; the others are all unclean. Their thing must be right and pure balm, but other people's thing is all devil's filth with them.

Now there are few of them who are not guilty of this commandment, for it is widespread, and vice is common everywhere. And even if one does not speak of other people's sins, he least of all likes to hear it, or does not prevent it when he hears it.

276 So you have recently understood the concept of this commandment. It forbids all harm done to one's neighbor with the mouth, or with the tongue, so that one harms him in his honor or good report. On this commandment they also drew the forgery of letters, but it belongs more to the other commandment. This commandment is so broad that all the world is drowned in it.

The Ten Commandments are a mirror in which we see that the world is nothing but a wicked, desperate multitude that does not trust in God, does not believe, has little faith in God, and does not know Him.

He strives against him day and night with all his might, blasphemes God and reviles his holy name, does not respect the works of God, but rather reproaches his own work, despises father and mother and all authorities, is full of murder and strangulation, full of thievery and adultery, full of false witness and lies. This is what God makes us sing and say. Therefore, our hearts should tremble and our bodies shake when we hear that God, the highest Majesty, passes such a judgment on us.

Decision.

278 Thus it is forbidden to harm all the goods of one's neighbor, and commanded to pity him. If we now look at the natural law, we find how just and equal all these commandments are. For nothing is commanded here to be kept against God and neighbor that each would not have kept if he were in God's and his neighbor's stead.

The sixth and seventh commandments of the other tablet.

V. 17: Thou shalt not lust after thy neighbor's husband. Thou shalt not lust after thy neighbor's wife, nor his manservant, nor his maidservant, nor his ox, nor his ass, nor anything that thy neighbor has.

Summa.

The last two commandments teach how evil nature is, and how pure we should be from all desires of the flesh and foreign 1) goods. But there remains war and labor while we live.

Thou shalt not let thyself lust 2c.

Some divide the two commandments. There is not much in the division, St. Paul summarizes it in one commandment (Rom. Cap. 7,<sup>2</sup>) 7. where he says: "Thou shalt not let thyself lust. Thus lust is forbidden.

The Jews have thus glossed and interpreted the commandment: The thoughts, as one is wont to

1) "der fremde" is missing in the Erlanger.

2) Erlanger: "Rom. on the 17th."

in a proverb, are duty-free. As when one thus wishes: If the ox, the cow, the donkey, the house, the field, the property were mine. These thoughts they counted for no sin; the other sins of the other commandments they interpreted 1) as being done outwardly by works and by deeds. As when a man sets up an idol or makes an image, blasphemes the name of God, does a bodily work on the Sabbath, strikes his father and mother, slays his neighbor with the sword, breaks into his house by night and takes away his goods, sleeps with his wife, and gives false testimony against him in court.

But the last two commandments they have interpreted thus, If a man show himself with an outward sign, and yet perform it not. As if a man were not obedient to his father and mother, though he did not curse them, or strike them, or lift up a club, or take hold of a stone, or lift up his fist against them, and strike them not, yet do such things as if he would strike or throw them; the sign would be contrary to the commandment, according to the interpretation of the Jews. Thus, to violate one's neighbor's wife is against the sixth commandment; but if it is not carried out, but is only done with a sign, as if one were seized from another's wife in a chamber, sitting with her on the bed, the commandment and sign have led them to this commandment, even though the work is not done. So stealing with the fist is against the seventh commandment; but if a man is seized on a floor, in the cellar, in the chamber, by the chest, and lets himself be marked with a sign, as if he would steal, and take away his neighbor's goods, and yet has not taken them away, he sins against this commandment.

The Jews interpreted it this way, but they were far wrong and glossed it wrongly. For it is not so interpreted here, nor shall it be so interpreted. Moses was not so unlearned that he did not know how to speak. Therefore the gloss is not valid at all. So we also know well what lust and desire mean. It is not written in the fist or in the outward spirits.

1) "for no sin.... they have" is missing in dT<sup>W</sup>Wittenberger.

The words of the Bible do not refer to the fist or other parts of the body, but to the heart; as now and then the Scriptures refer to lust or desire not in the fist or other parts, but in the heart. As when it is written, the desire of their heart. So Christ also rightly interprets Matth. 5, 28: "Whoever looks at another man's wife and covets her (not with his mouth, eyes, hand or feet, but in his heart) is an adulterer," even though he gives no outward sign of lust. So the commandment is in the heart, though it does not break out with signs and works. For this lust is in our hearts, marrow and legs.

When he says, "You shall not let your neighbor's wife lie with you," it is to be understood that if a man desires to have it for himself, God will give him what his neighbor has; do not allow his neighbor to have a pious, honorable wife, honorable and disciplined children. So it is to be understood with other things, as with servants and maids, house and farm, oxen, cows, donkeys and other goods; if one is sorry that his neighbor has such a pious servant, such a beautiful house, such good fields and meadows, fat oxen and sheep; he would that he alone had it, although his neighbor had nothing. So that it is not only that one is sorry that his neighbor has such a delicious thing, but that he also wants to have it himself and possess it, where he can easily get it.

Thus we have the Ten Commandments, which make us all scoundrels and knaves before God. And although the worldly sword outwardly defends, and makes a difference in the world, that one says: He is pious, he is a rogue, nevertheless all men are sinners in heart with one another. Therefore no one may boast that he is pious before God, but must confess that he is guilty of all the commandments as they read. Let every man take hold of his own bosom, and he shall find it so. Therefore we should cry and howl to God, that He may give us the Spirit, that we may not only be outwardly pious before the world, but also 2) before God in our hearts. Amen.

C. The Ten Commandments

preached to the people of Wittenberg by Father Martin Luther, Augustinian. *)

Preached from the end of June 1516 to February 24, 1517. Printed in 1518.

Newly translated from the Latin.

Preface [of] B[ruder] S(ebastian) M[ünster]. **)

Many books, both Latin and German, are printed daily, many of which are almost beneficial and useful to the common man; as one finds people who are so hungry and eager for the word of God that they also spend all the remaining time they may have in beneficial books, to draw comfort and instruction from them. For their love, this book is described by the pious, spiritual and highly learned man, D. Martin Luther, who explains the Ten Commandments in such a spiritual, Christian and evangelical way that one does not find anything like it; although many teachers have written about it. There, the spiritual and the secular, the good and the bad, the afflicted and the challenged, the young and the old, the superior and the deaf, all find the ten commandments.

and subject, in short, everyone, how he should go the way (which is the ten commandments), which leads to eternal life. There we find how each commandment is kept according to the letter and according to the spirit. In addition, how each commandment has several degrees and scales 2c. Why is it necessary to write much about this here? If you read through the book, you will find a true Christian and evangelical teacher. And do not be hindered by the fact that it has not been Germanized with flowery and highbrow words; for it has been transferred more for the sake of the simple than for the sake of the polite, and transferred in such a way that the subtleties that the above-mentioned doctor has let run in it have been left to Latin. God be with you.

*Luther preached on the Ten Commandments to a large audience (St. Louis Edition, Vol. XXII, 1716, No. ISO) of the people in Wittenberg from the end of June 1516 to February 24 1517. At the beginning of the last century, a complete Latin manuscript of these sermons by Luther (Weim. Ausg., vol. I, p. 19. Köstlin, Mart. Luther, 3rd ed., vol. I, p. 123) was still available, which was in the possession of Valentin Ernst Löscher. From this manuscript he printed a number of sermons in his "Reformation-Acta," Vol. I, pp. 277-2H9 and pp. 729-795, of which he notes: "These klemm Sermons have only been Exordia to Luther's sermons on the Ten Commandments, "which he held on feast days and Sundays." In the St. Louis edition these exordia are found Vol. XII, 1266-1271; 1724-1829; Vol.X, 198-209; 976-981; 1212-1219; 1276-1297; Vol. XIX, 736-761. It is these exordia which give us a firm guide to the exact timing. Luther's sermon on St. Matthew's Day (February 24) 1517 was, as already noted in our edition, vol. XIX, 754, the last introductory sermon to Luther's lectures on the Ten Commandments. Nothing is known about the whereabouts of the Latin manuscript. But also of the German translation, which Luther mentions in his letter to Johann Lang of November 4, 1517: "I have therefore sent you the interpretation of the Ten Commandments in both languages, so that you, if you wanted, could preach about it to the people" (Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. X VIII, 28), we no longer have any trace. The later German translation is, as can be seen from Münster's preface, not by Luther, but by someone else. Luther then took the sermon form from the sermons, and put his treatment into print in 1518. The first Latin edition was published on July 20, 1518 by Johannes Grünenberg (Virickivaontunulll) in Wittmberg under the title: Vsosm prusesptn IVittsnksrMnsi prusäiontn popuio psr U.MarUmim lmtüs XuAustininnum. In the same year, two reprints were published by Valentin Schumann in Leipzig, and by the same printer in 1519. In the latter year, Melchior Lotther in Leipzig also printed

**This preface is on the back of the title page of the two German translations published by Adam Petri in Basel in 1520. Münster, who belonged to the Franciscan order (Vlinorum cis okssrvuntiu), was at that time Corrector at Petri. The following is reported about him in the Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. II, p. 360: "He was born in 1489 at Jngelheim in the Palatinate, studied at Heidelberg and Tübingen, hence known to Melanchthon, belonged to the Franciscan order, which he left in 1529, and died May 23, 1552 in Basel, where he had worked for a long time at the university as a teacher of the Hebrew language." - Münster as well as Conrad Pellicanus, Guardian of the monastery at Pforzheim, were students of the learned Rabbi Elias Levita at Neustadt an der Aisch in Baireuth in the Hebrew language in 1514. # The first commandment. *)

You will not have other gods. 1)

First, the question arises, why does he not command in an affirmative manner, namely: You shall have the right (proprium) or the One God, or: Worship me, the one God? Second, why does he not rather speak in imperative: You shall not have other gods, than in indicative?

To both I answer at the same time that every commandment of God is given more for the sake of indicating past and present sin than for the sake of preventing future sin, for, as the apostle says [Rom. 3:20], "Through the law comes only knowledge of sin," and again [Rom. 11:32], "God has decreed all things under sin."

that he may have mercy on all." Therefore the commandment of God, when it comes, finds sinners, and makes more of them, "that sin might become more powerful," Rom. 5:20. But the laws of men are given for the sake of future sins. Therefore the [Holy] Spirit, as he is an exceedingly kind teacher, speaks more in an indicative manner, as if to say, O poor man, behold, I show thee thy corruption. You should be like this, so that you would have no gods, would not use the name of your God uselessly, would sanctify the holiday, would not kill, would not let yourself be lusted after 2c. But now you are completely different and wrong. Therefore he finally commands in a negative way, because a negative is stronger than an affirmative. For even the Samaritans of old worshipped the One God, but also their gods at the same time, and so do the Jews and pagans, the heretics and the wicked. Yes, every

I, p. 578; in the Erlanger, sxsMtioa opsra laftna, Dorn. XII, p. 1, and in the Weimar, vol. I, p. 398. A German translation of our writing first appeared in Basel in 1520 with Adam Petri izpter the title: "Der zehn Gebote eine nützliche Erklärung durch den hochgelehrten D. Martinum Luther Augustinerordens beschrieben und gepredigt, Geistlichen und Weltlichen dienende. Item a beautiful sermon of the seven deadly sins, also described by him." In the same year, a new edition of this translation was published by the same publisher. The former was printed by Silvanus Ottmar in Augsburg in the same year, the latter in Basel in 1523, perhaps by A. Cratander. In the collections, first in the Hallische Theil, p. 2, edited by Zeidler, "newly prepared with diligence, conferring with Latin and improved according to Luther's manner of speaking". From this, the text is taken over into the Leipzig edition, Vol. I V, p. 1, and from this into Walch's old edition. The beginning of the German translation is also found in Löscher I. o. p. 580-586, "the continuation of the German edition obgedachter explanation of the ten commandments and much from the manuscript has had to be left out because the space became too tight". (Ibick. S. 728.) The conclusion of the explanation of the ten commandments has also appeared in a single edition (without year, place, or printer) under the title: "A pretty sermon, how the ten commandments are drawn on the seven deadly sins." - This explanation of the ten commandments is also translated into Bohemian. The printing of this translation was completed at Prague on November 3, 1520. Luther mentions it in a letter to Spalatin of February 3, 1521 (Walch, old edition, vol. XXI, 746, § 5). In the Baseler Sammlung voin October 1518 and thereafter in the luoubnticmss of Adam Petri, in the Wittenberg and in the Jenaer Gesammtausgabe, the Latin explanation is preceded by a short note to the reader. It is also printed in Löscher's "Reformation Acta". From it Walch has taken by misunderstanding, "that Luther had neither made the Latin copy himself, nor had he arranged for the first printing, whether it had been done, since it came out in Wittenberg, with his approval". This statement of Walch's has also been appropriated by the Erlangen edition, and reproduced in the 12th volume of the ox<^ opsra, p. III. With reference to this, the Weimar edition rightly says: "Rather, from the list of printing errors in the first edition, one can safely conclude that Luther was the editor, since, as here, only the author himself was allowed to make changes." The Weimar edition bases its text on the first edition, but also takes Löscher into account for the sake of his handwritten source, although his work is not very critical. We give a new translation according to the Weimar edition and add the time determinations for the individual sermons according to Löscher, which was not done in the Erlangen edition.

*) Luther probably began on Peter Pa "Is Day (June 29) 1516. (Weim. ed.)

Man in the whole world worships the One God, "who is manifest to all", as the apostle says Rom. 1, 19. But in this they sin, that they honor him in such a way that they also honor their idols at the same time. Thus there is no man in the world who does not to a certain extent keep (faciat) every commandment, for there is no one who does not at times uselessly use the name of God, who does not at times kill, commit adultery, or steal, but at the same time also does the contradiction in himself, as we will see later.

Corollary (Corollarium).

All the children of Adam are idolaters and guilty of this first commandment. 2) But one must know that there are two kinds of idolatry, one external, the other internal. The external one is when man worships wood, stone, animals, stars, as is known from the Old Testament and the books of the pagans. The latter, however, came out of the inward one. The inward one is when man, moved either by the fear of punishment or by the desire (amore) of his benefit, leaves the worship of the creature by heart, but inwardly remains the love for the creature and the trust in it. For what kind of service is it if one does not bow the knee before riches and testimonies of honor, and yet sacrifices to them the noblest thing one has, namely one's heart and mind? This means worshipping God according to the body and the flesh, but inwardly worshipping the creature in the spirit. This idolatry reigns in every man until he is healed by grace through faith in Jesus Christ, as the 81st Psalm, v. 9, 10, says: "Hear, my people, I will testify among you; Israel, you shall hear me, that there is no other god among you, and that you worship no strange god," which means: By your efforts and powers you will never reach the point that you do not worship a strange god. For though thou worshipest no images, yet in the hearts prefer the creature to me. But then you will not worship a foreign god when you hear me, that is, the faith in my word will make you free from foreign gods and a true worshipper of God. For this will turn you away from desiring things and trusting in them, and draw you to the Creator. 3)

It happens like this: Faith in Christ takes away all confidence in one's own wisdom, righteousness, and virtue, teaching that if he had not died for thee and saved thee, neither thou nor all creatures could help thee, and thus arises the contempt of all things. But since you hear that he suffered for you and believe, confidence in him and a sweet love immediately arise, and in this way all inclination to all things, as to something useless, is gone, and the esteem of Christ alone arises, as an exceedingly necessary thing, and nothing else is left to you but Jesus alone, in whom alone you have enough and full satisfaction, so that you despair of all things and have him alone, in whom all your hope stands, and love him above all things for his sake. But Jesus is the true, one, only God. If you have him, you do not have a foreign God. The Jews, however, who fear that they will have a foreign god if they worship the man Christ, worship a foreign god in an even worse way, namely the idols of their heart, which they invent for themselves from God. God thus rightly says [Ps. 81:9]: "You shall hear me," as if he wanted to say: "It is impossible that you should not worship a foreign god if you do not hear me; because you are not humbled, your trust in the creature is not torn away from you. But if you are not humbled, you will not worship me, but you and yours. It is clear, then, that no one can obey this commandment.

1) The Erlangen edition omitted non here, although Luther himself inserted it in the corrections of the first edition.
2) In the manuscript it is added: "It is sufficiently evident that they are turned away from God to themselves".

3) In the manuscript it is added here: "So it is said in the 45th Psalm, v. 11. ff: .Hear, daughter, look from it' 2c. Not by your works will you be beautiful, but by faith in Christ; yet you will not be without sin, but also adorned by Christ, whose adornment is yours through faith in Him."

The Lord fills a person's life as one who believes in Christ, hopes in Him, loves Him, and is free from the inclination to all things, which is impossible without the grace of God. But there are many people who give a definite answer to the question whether they have a foreign God and are idolaters: No, not at all. In order to catch them in their obvious lie, pay attention to it: Whether they are so dead to things, and so confident in Christ, that they are neither puffed up by riches, nor fainthearted by poverty; neither flourish by honor, nor let their courage be slackened by dishonor; neither delight in life, nor be dismayed by death, neither to delight in pleasure nor to be afflicted by suffering, and whether they are completely immovable and calm on both sides, so that, whatever their lot may be, they may be satisfied that they have Jesus Christ; They love and desire poverty, shame, suffering, death, and spurn riches, honor, pleasure, and life, because they desire their God Jesus Christ, as it says in the 42nd Psalm, v. 2. Psalm, v. 2: "As the deer cries for fresh water" 2c., and the bride in the Song of Songs [Cap. 5, 8.], "Ye daughters of Jerusalem, tell my friend that I lie sick of love," and Paul [Phil. 1, 23.], "I delight to depart and be with Christ." But let him who is not yet of this disposition confess that he is not yet a pure worshipper of God, but that much idolatry still clings to him, for he is sorry, he desires, he loves, he hates, not as he ought, nor that which he ought. But here it is said: This comes to the perfect, not to all; such perfection is not necessary. I answer: We also know that this concerns the perfect (that is, not the Jews, but the Christians), 1) not as if all those were condemned who are not so perfect, but this goal and end is set before us. No one who does not attain it will be excused, unless he recognizes and confesses with sighs that he is not of such a nature, and strives daily to become such a man, and humbly asks that he may be forgiven for it.

which he does too little, saying [Matth. 6, 12.]: "Forgive us our debts", and [Ps. 51, 12.]: "Create in me, God, a clean heart." To these, I say, who stand in fear and confess, who seek and ask, this idolatry (idolatriae suae mixtura) still clinging to them is not imputed for the sake of Christ in whom they believe. But to those who snore in safety without fear, without caring that they become better, it is completely imputed, and they are in truth idolaters. Even the excuse that it is not necessary to be perfect will not help them, as if this commandment was given to stones or wood and not rather to men, and had to be fulfilled so completely and perfectly that not even the smallest letter nor one tittle will be lost [Matth. 5, 18.]].

For the sake of clearer understanding, so that even weaker people can grasp who and how one sins against this commandment, I will give examples in a very detailed way, but not all of them (then I would have to list countless), but many, so that by comparing them with the others, they can be understood more easily.

First. There are some who are so unintelligent that it seems that the devil is not mocking them in earnest but, as it were, as his fools in jest. Among these are the soothsayers, the interpreters of signs, the sorcerers, the blessers, the superstitious, 2) and of these there are many kinds; but I will group them together and distinguish them according to the different ages, so that it may be easier to remember.

The first age is youth, which in itself is inclined to be seduced by the devil.

First of all, there are those people who, with certain formulas (conceptis verbis) and certain signs, know how to bless swords, bullets, rifles, 3) and all iron weapons, that is, to conjure them so that they cannot be wounded by them, be it in the

2) In the Weimar edition, the comma before supsrstitiosi is omitted (not well, we think).
3) Weimar and other editions: boarttas, Wittenberg, Jena and Löscher: tionitüsriäa".

Wars or else. I myself have seen a youth who put a drawn sword on his bare body (ventrem) and pressed it against himself with such force that the sword bent and on his body the hilt struck the point (donec capulus reflexus copularetur acumini etc.), and he let the sword go back [to its original position], but was not wounded.

Second, [there are people] who can invalidate this [invocation] by describing a circle and drawing figures in the sand, and by thus invalidating each other's invocations, they kill each other.

Thirdly, there are people who write letters or signs on glass and put them on the fire, and by doing this (machina) they force the girls to love them. But they also do it this way. Some can call their beloved (Adonides) for many miles by putting a pot on the fire. Others take the head of an ass and put it in the middle of the fire 1) and force as many of those who are attached to their art (mysterii) or are partakers of it as they want to come to them. And marvelous it is to say that those who are forced to come [in this way] cannot help nor save themselves [from it] until it is granted to them to seize the fire where the head of the ass is exposed to the fire (coctore).

Fourthly, one has letters full of many sacred words and signs that are said to have been sent by Pope Leo to [Emperor] Carl in the war. Besides being a vain pretense, it is also a lie, as is evident from the chronicles, since Leo and Carl were not contemporaries. Nevertheless, they ascribe to them so much that the one who carries them can neither be killed nor wounded nor suffer any damage, so that they presume to win in court even in unjust matters.

Fifth, they choose certain months for marriage. Some do this so that no children are born to them, others, however, in order to have many children. Thus, in an unfortunate folly, they do not write GÖtte the creation of man, but to the months, and yet there are books full of these antics.

Sixth. The consecrated wax of the Easter candle is furtively torn off by many, I do not know how many and how great sorceries and superstitious acts.

Seventh. There are people who take holy water and hope to find an egg in an anthill with their prayers, which is supposed to make them invisible when they carry it with them.

Eighth. They seek [to discover] a thief by writing the names of suspicious people on slips of paper and throwing them into holy water, so that the one whose name falls to the ground is said to be the thief they are looking for.

Ninth. At the wedding they want to find out by observing foolish things which of the two will survive the other, as whoever falls asleep first on the first night must die first. Similarly, when the woman enters the man's house for the first time, she shall touch the upper threshold of the door with her hand and speak words by which she prophesies that she will be the man's mistress.

According to this, similar things can be judged. Although these things are more foolish than evil, and it seems, as I have said, that the devil is playing a joke with them, at last they become quite serious, because people get used to putting their trust in the creature in small things, and therefore do not trust in God in great things either. They excuse themselves, of course, by saying that they are holy signs and holy words, as if for that reason they were not to be accused all the more of using the holy things, signs and words of God for unholy and devilish things. 3)

1) or: in the middle of the hearth of fire (in E<Iio kooo).

The affectionate love for children and the attachment to earthly goods make it wonderfully easy for women to be seduced into this work of the devil.

First. They undertake to make the children healthy by certain superstitious customs. For there are people who heal the bewitched children (for this evil is very common in our country, so there are also many malicious (pestilent) old hags and devil's servants who do this) from an unknown disease, which is called "the Elbe" 1) in German. For these, some village priests and sextons, who have learned this from the magic whores, write letters that are hung on the neck, but not with ordinary ink, nor on paper, nor on any day; I do not know, maybe not even with a pen, and at a writing desk and in an ordinary place. For this thing has its hidden secrets, and yet what they do is done because they believe. Others [expel] another disease, which is called in German "das Herzgespanst", that is, an expansion of the chest. They prove the presence of this disease by this reason, namely when the child's measurement from one elbow to the other is not equal to the measurement from the knee to the neck. They also relieve headaches by I don't know how many kinds of murmuring and measuring with the belt, as well as other pains in all limbs. Here I wish the children had sense and could talk, so that they could punish their mothers for their exceedingly great foolishness. For there is no doubt that they would resist and show that they have more understanding than their mothers.

But they say: Who should not have mercy on his little child and the fruit of his womb? I answer: Yes, one should have mercy on them, but not so far that one enters into the service of the devil; either seek natural medicine, or ask God in simple faith. Why do you sacrifice the child that God created to the devil, so that he may preserve it and make it healthy? But God allows such things to be done to children by sorcerers, in order to tempt the unbelievers, so that those who have abandoned God may seek the devil. For it is not to be doubted that such plagues of children are sometimes not natural, but the devils, summoned by the sorcerers, torment the parents of the same in such a way out of a hidden but quite just judgment of God, in order to test their faith or the faith of others, or to punish both.

Secondly, the fathers blow against the palate or into the throat of the little children who are suffering from I don't know what kind of disease; but they speak the words that are used for incantation seven times.

Thirdly, [there are people] who draw their cattle and thus protect them from wolves, pestilence, water and fire; indeed, in this way they can protect a whole city or a house from conflagration. The unfortunate wolf can justifiably complain that the portion God had given him was snatched away by the devil's allies. If Job had acted this way, he would have kept his cattle, but God would not have praised him.

Fourth. Out of the same devotion they put signs on the fruits of the fields and gardens, and are so foolish that they, who have received rain and prosperity from God, ask the devil for his guard, fighting, as it were, against God so that he will not take away what he has given them.

Fifth. They know how to conjure fire and water, even snakes, so that they do not harm the cattle in any way, that is, so that their cause is not subject to God.

Sixth. When sick people make vows to the saints, they then consider it a sin to use medicines, of course, in order to tempt God with their foolish vows. And if a woman has received the sacrament of the last rites, she may only wear black clothes during the year, not dance in the round dance, not sleep with her husband. The devil has such a familiar tool in the female sex that he accepts it for the orientation of his service (in sua sacra), through which he prescribes laws.

1) The Elbe or "the heart-ache". This disease is described in more detail in the third chapter of the shorter interpretation of the letter to the Galatians, Walch, St. Louis edition, Vol. VIII, 1462, 8 3. - Here "Elbe" and "Herzgespanst" are distinguished as two diseases.

writes, sows his superstition; in all things contrary to God, who lays out his worship (sacra) and his priesthood and his word to men. But this priesthood of women is much more prevalent, and has filled these lands with countless superstitions, blessings and useless doctrines, of which they are far more afraid than of the laws and services of the priesthood of men and of God.

Seventh. Here belong those who pay attention to ominations, birdcalls, as the cawing of ravens, and the remnants or examples of other pagan divinations (portentorum).

Eighth. Those who observe special days (this Aegyptios) for their journeys, for their return, for building, for business, for putting on new clothes. If these had the faith that the fire is more pleasant in winter than in summer, likewise that in summer is the right time to make hay, to gather the fruits 2c., then they would have a right faith; or that it is good for every man to go out early when he is healthy and it is necessary for him, but not good when he is ill. For what does this mocker, the devil, deserve but that we should also mock him in turn? Close to them are those who teach us that bloodletting, the weaning of children, the healing properties of baths, the right time for sowing are not to be determined according to the opportunity of moisture and warmth or the need of the body, but according to the influence of the planets and the stars, although the best physicians teach that necessity is the only rule here. But perhaps they intend to kill us by hunger, since they allow us to sow only on a few days. But it is good that these antics are heeded by no one or very few (since God takes better care of us).

Ninth. The following is the magnificent astrology or mathematics, which would like to be a science, but cannot take off its inherent foolishness. It is this that teaches us who, what kind of person, or how great a person will be who is born in a certain position of the celestial signs (in horoscopia signorum), namely, they are advisors in the divine mystery, which is not known even to the angels.

is known. Only about one thing I wonder, what may have happened to them, that they have not found the star, which indicates who will be born as a righteous and who as a sinner. For they want the position of the celestial signs (suos horoscopus) observed by them to exert an exceedingly great influence on people; then righteousness, sin, truth, lie is not a thing of so little importance, but also not so rare as a barber, a singer, a money-changer, a fisherman, a speaker, a wooer, who have their own nativities (horoscopus). Why is there no sign of justice and truth? Or if it is there, why does it never make its effect felt? For every man is born a sinner, a liar, a fool, though no star is set to bring about this fate (ad hoc fatum); nor is he 1) changed unless he is visited by the grace that is above heaven. Or is heaven so hostile and indifferent to justice and truth that it exerts its influence on quite trivial things, baths and games and love affairs, but knows nothing at all of justice? Or is the Creator so envious that he has decreed no sign for good, but only for evil? For no man is born good and will remain evil according to his nature with the influences. These I would have counted among the fine (subtle) fools, if they were not coarser than the coarse.

But very nicely they resolve the objections by saying: The influences do not force (necessitant) to sin, but only make inclined to it 2c., as if this were not an exceedingly ungodly opinion, that God made the creature in order to make it inclined to sin, and not rather in order that he might establish righteousness, so that everything works for man for good, not for evil; or as if any man sins, compelled by necessity, and not rather always by inclination. Who would say that a man sins against his will? All evil inclination is not apart from us, but in us, as Christ says [Matth. 15, 19. 11.]: "Out of the heart come evil thoughts", "what enters the mouth does not defile the man" 2c. And St. Jacob [Cap. 1, 14.]: "Every man is tempted when he is provoked and enticed by his own lust", which does not come from fate, but from original sin (origine peccati)). For everything that God has made is good [Gen. 1, 31.], therefore all things by their nature can only cause an inclination to good. As every thing is constituted, so it also works. But that things serve for evil is not by their nature, but by their abuse (injuria), as Paul says [Rom. 8:20.]: "All creatures are subject to vanity without their will." But they make the nature of them vanity by willing that these things by God's order (institutione) have that in themselves, that they give a tendency to sin. Why did they not instill this inclination in Adam and Eve before the serpent came to them? Why not Christ? Why not the holy virgin? Away with this blasphemous godlessness! That word which the astrologers use for their excuse is the word of our father Adam, who also put his inclination [to sin] on the woman, that is, on the creature of God, and said [Gen. 3, 12]: "The woman you have given me" 2c. But how mightily would they oppose me if they could prove that any saint or martyr had made use of these things, or written about them, or approved of them! But now they have not only not approved of them, but also rejected them, especially St. Augustine in many places, then also St. Gregory. And yet this insipid foolishness finds even more insipid people who believe it.

Abraham, they say, taught the Egyptians astrology, as Josephus testifies, 1) as if Josephus has nowhere deviated from the truth, especially since he is so eager to chase glory for the Jews. Abraham undoubtedly taught the Egyptians to worship GOD, and the right wisdom of GOD, as also of Joseph is said, Ps. 105, 22.: "That he instructed his princes after his manner, and taught his elders wisdom." Nor is it to be believed that those holy men laid themselves upon astronomy, much less astrology, for these are superfluous (otiosa) studies of young men. But since Josephus saw that the Greeks had a high opinion of this science, and the same stood in honor, it seems that he wanted to invent, how the Jews also in this matter not lower, but higher stood than the Greeks, what he also in all other things to do has endeavored to serve the vain honor.

Then it is marvelous that the evil spirits have not finally been changed, who have been subject to the influences [of the stars] for so many centuries, but then are also closer to them than we are, since they dwell in lust. But that the influence of the stars did not come over them, or that the stars should not have shone to them in the same way, that seems inconsistent. For they remain obstinate in their wrongness, and are not changed by any sign, while it is said that our souls are changed by the briefest influence.

To the last. What shall we say to Moses, who in the fifth book, Cap. 4, 19, 2) "Lest thou lift up thine eyes unto heaven, and behold the sun, and the moon, and the stars, and all the host of heaven, which the LORD thy God hath ordained to be a service unto all nations" 2c. If "to the service", how can it be to the dominion? But from very fine wise they make an evasion and say, supported by the reputation of their master Ptolemy: The wise man rules over the stars, therefore he can forestall and prevent the influence of the stars. So they are not for the wise to rule, but only for the unwise. 3) But what does Moses say? He says, "To all nations for service." If "all", then either all peoples are wise, and so all rule over the stars, or only some are wise, and then it will come so that they are not created for the service of all peoples. But Moses is true and you are a liar, 1) not to say anything about it, that even if the truly wise man were a lord over the heavenly bodies, Moses would nevertheless have said something false, since the heavenly bodies also do not serve the wise men, but rather prevent them, so that they could not escape the destiny of them, if they did not have the advantage of wisdom. Thus it should have been said that the stars were created, not for the service of the wise, but for war [against them], and for dominion and tyranny over the unwise. But this is to accuse Moses of lying and to accuse GOD of cruelty and downright blasphemy. But this has been treated more extensively by others. Let it be enough that we have indicated that this trivial matter is not permitted. In the prophet Jeremiah, Cap. 10, 2, [says the Lord]: "You shall not learn the ways of the heathen, 2) and you shall not be afraid of the signs of heaven." For GOD alone is to be feared in all things. All other things we are to regard as ordained for service, and as serving the elect for the best [Rom. 8:28].

3) The third age is that of the old witches (vetularum), or of those who indulge in things similar to these, who make an alliance with the devil, of whom one has news everywhere.

First. By sorceries they can damage the eyes and make them blind, make the bodies ill, paralyze the legs, 4) charm by apparitions (imaginibus), and, as they please, either kill or finally abort by a slow and incurable disease.

as I have seen several who suffered such.

Secondly. They can cause storms and thunder, spoil the fruits, kill livestock, likewise steal butter, milk and cheese from others, that is, milk them from a post or an axe or a towel.

Thirdly. Here belong those who seek to obtain knowledge (of secret things) through the notarial art, 5) about which much is said in the law books (in jure). Likewise, those who seek hidden things by means of a crystal, a fingernail or an ivory booklet, 6) which, however, must first be consecrated. But they cannot do this unless girls or boys who are still virgins are enclosed in a circle, so that this exceedingly evil work does not lack a good appearance. Nevertheless, it is said that this art of inspection very often fails. Here belong those who seek hidden treasures with a divining rod, but especially those who are commonly called wise men and women (that is, fortune-tellers and fortune-tellers), whose sayings (oracula) people fetch from various places and far across the country when someone has lost something or suffered something, and does not know who has caused this damage. It is astonishing that the bishops let it go unpunished that one publicly submits to such things.

Fourth. Many believe that they ride on brooms (7), others on a trestle, and others on other jugglery (nugas), to a certain place where those who participate in this hidden art (mysterii) come together to hold a vastery. It is not only forbidden to do this, but also to believe that this is true, as will be said more widely later, as well as that,

3) Löscher: "The following was added to a sermon which was held on the 7th Sunday after Trinity [July 6, 1516]." This introductory sermon is found in Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. XI, 1724, where the superscription should read, "On the seventh Sunday after Trinity," because Luther follows in these sermons the oogustuäc, "eolsmas Uoiuauas, according to which Matth. 7, 15. sf. is the Gospel for this Sunday (Weim. that the old witches turn into cats and tomcats and wander about by night, must not be believed to be true.

Fifth, it is said that throughout the year (per annum) a certain woman, whom some call Herodias, others Mrs. Hulde, still others Venus, travels around with some and holds, as it were, a regularly recurring Noigungssest (lustralem februum), who leaves with her hosts either coals or trifles from her chariot, which are later invented as gold and silver, as also in the Latin language there is a saying of coals and gold, 1) which perhaps originated from this.

Sixth. Some have a kind of Hansteufel, like the household gods of old, which sometimes appear during the day. These are called in the mouth of the people (vulgo) with some "Wichtlein", with others "Hehlkäpplein", 2) and one believes that in a house there is great luck, which is inhabited by such devil ghosts, and one fears more to offend these devils, than God and all the world.

Seventh. Some, in order to find the devil, go backward around a church, and just the opposite way, as one usually does, and when they find him going toward them, they surrender to him and make a covenant with him. Among these are also those who consider it an evil omen when they meet a priest early in the morning, for they mark themselves with the cross, so that nothing bad will happen to them on that day, as the devil teaches them that it will happen by the first meeting of the priest.

Eighth. There are people who keep company with the devils in the form of men (incubi) and women (succubi), 3) which I will deal with more extensively in a moment.

Ninth. This wickedness of Satan even goes so far as to desecrate the sacraments. Because there are people who give the children, who are to be baptized, verbena, cheese, and I don't know what other things. In fact, this verbena is what is most often used for superstitious acts. With whimsical ceremonies they dig it up, then have it consecrated, and with frightening sacrilegiousness they invoke many (dead) names of God and the saints over it, of course seduced by some Jew who goes with dazzle (praestigioso).

I do not want to say anything here about the purification (menstrua) of women, from which some [witches] make potions that cause a nonsensical love, but more often still cause death. Some mix them into the pig's feed so that they become fat more easily. I let it be known that they advise the children who suffer from wasting (tabe = emaciation) or leanness in such a way that they put the children in a cauldron, put fire under it, and cook moderately in warm water, while one woman stands by, but another runs around the house three times and asks through a [door or window] opening: What are you cooking? and she answers: I cook old meat, that it may become new. Likewise, that they are afraid to put the weaned children to the breast again, because of the danger that they may become cursers or speak shamefully. I say nothing of the abominable things they do when in need of birth. They read the legend of St. Margaret most devoutly and even prefer it to the suffering of Christ. Others hang the man's pants around the neck of the woman in childbirth and prove their madness with other antics.

Moreover, some women are so foolish that they take what is said in jest as serious: If you have lost something and want to find it again, give alms, namely a warm roll, and put consecrated salt on it, and you will soon find it. This is what he meant in jest: Put salt on it, namely on the lost thing, then you will find it. But you understand it: "on the bread roll". Not as if this were something great, but it is something unseemly that the devil should make such a mockery of alms and consecrated salt. Just such wisdom have the Women who, deceived by a similar joke, take the branches that were strewn on the way of the procession on the day of St. Marcus [April 25] and pull them over the sown peas and beans; namely, because it is said: If the seeds are swept with such branches, they will be safe from being taken away by the fowls or the birds of the air, they do not understand, "If (that is, at the time when) they sweep, the birds will not do so." And who could enumerate all the foolish, ridiculous, false, void, and superstitious things with which this easily seduced generation deals? From their mother (ex prima) Eve it is innate to them that they let themselves be deceived and made fools of. From this similar things may be judged. But because there are people who do not believe that such a thing is possible, and others believe too much, we must talk about it a little more.

Firstly. Some do not believe that these witches (magas) and soothsayers are capable of so much that they make thunderstorms, harm the body, do evil to cattle, goods, children, 2c., having this reason for their opinion, that they do not believe that the witches have such great power over the creatures of God, and [believe that] the devils are not allowed so much by God. And yet, even though they believe that everything is imposed by God, they do not take refuge in God when they suffer something of this kind. Therefore, they should be persuaded to know that the devils are very capable of such things under God's permission, which can be sufficiently proven from the Scriptures.

First. Job 1, 16. When fire came down from heaven and killed the cattle and the servants, and a wind arose and flowed around the house and struck his sons, and at last smote him in the body with the most grievous swarms; Finally, he also tempted him to despair in his soul with the most severe temptation; and yet the text there clearly expresses both, namely, that the devil worked this after he had received permission from God, and that God did the same, as it says there:

"The fire of God fell from heaven" 2c. And he himself says afterwards [Job 1, 21]: "The Lord has given, the Lord has taken away" 2c., although the Lord says there to the devil [Job 1, 12]: "Behold, all that he has is in your hand; without him alone do not lay your hand." So if Satan can throw fire and lightning from heaven and do such great evil where God allows him to, why should he not be able to do the same now when he is summoned to keep his covenant?

Second. That the plagues of the Egyptians were carried out by evil angels is testified by the 78th Psalm, v. 49: "He sent evil angels among them, and made them rage and rage and suffer. But those plagues were greater than those which any witches can do now.

Thirdly. How many possessed souls are told about in the Gospel! How many souls he still possesses daily with error and sin! Or is it less, if he corrupts an immortal soul, than if he damages a mortal limb or the air?

Fourth. Did he not persecute and kill all the holy martyrs himself? Yes, he took the Lord himself and led him from the desert to a mountain and from the mountain to the pinnacle of the temple [Matth. 4, 5. 8.]. Likewise he contends [Revelation 12:7] with Michael and his angels.

Fünstens. The suffering of Christ proves all this exceedingly. For if the Son of God suffered so much from the devils and their members, what wonder is it that He can destroy our scourings and damage our members by the same permission of God?

Sixth. See how God gives power to so many wicked men to abuse goods, wealth, power, dominion, to the destruction of others and to sin themselves. Much more does he allow the devils to abuse things against us, whether to punish us or to instruct us. But it is true that they cannot move a leaf on the tree without God's permission, because, as Christ says [Matth. 10, 29. f.], not even a leaf falls from the tree to the earth without the will of the Father. Therefore, we Christians must know, that these evils are indeed done by the devils and their witches, but that it is nevertheless so ordained by God. God does good by Himself, evil by evil. Therefore Job [Cap. 1, 21.] (as St. Augustine remarks) did not say: The Lord gave, the devil took away, but: "The Lord who gave, he also took away." But more of this hereafter.

Secondly. All too much is believed by those who believe that the old cripples can turn into hangovers or assume any other guises and go to their revels at night. And about this (spiritual rights) there is an explicit text Question 15, Cap. 6. And it is not surprising that no one believes it. For they are deceptions of the devil, but not a real thing, as beautifully illuminated from an example, which John of Kaisersberg 1) tells: that an old witch, in order to convict a preacher of lying, since he had taught that such things were not true (falsa), had him called late in the evening, smeared herself with ointment before his eyes, sat in a baking trough and now wanted to drive away: behold, she immediately fell asleep and made all kinds of violent movements, until she fell off the bench and received a wound on the head. At last she regained consciousness and was convinced by the wound and the fall that she had been mistaken, however much she had boasted of her miraculous faces.

The same can be seen in the descriptions of the lives of the fathers, where a virgin is told, whom her parents brought to St. Macarius. 2) In his eyes she was a girl, while to the others she seemed to be a cow. And such deceptions still happen today, as happened to the one who owed a Jew and suffered in his sleep that his whole leg was torn off his body, so that he should disgrace the Jew. It is also told of a monk who almost consumed a wagon full of hay 2c.

There are many reports of such things everywhere. For the devil can change from one person to another and miraculously deceive the senses, as is said in the legend of St. Martin, where one who had been given a certain garment by the devil under the name of Christ deceived the senses of all. A similar story is told of a certain nun who was seen by others sitting half-naked in her cell in a tattered cloak with a heap of cow dung on her head, but who nevertheless believed that she was sitting there in the most shining garment and adorned by Christ with a golden crown. Similarly, in the legend of St. Andrew, how the devil in the form of a beautiful woman deceived such a great man. The same is true of the knight who came to an inn late at night, thinking that he was in pleasant company among girls and dances and enjoying a delicious meal, but early in the morning he was lying in a deep cellar, and his horse was tied to a tree, unlined. But the strongest is the one in the legend of St. Germanus, the bishop of Altisiodorum. See the catalog of the saints, Book 6, Cap. 9. Once he had arrived, and since it was already bedtime, a table was prepared for the neighbors (as he was told when he asked) who would be there during the night: so he summoned those who were coming, woke up the father of the house with his own, and inquired whether they knew them. When they answered in the affirmative, he ordered them to go to the neighbors and see if they were at home, and they found them all asleep in their beds, and so it was clearly revealed that it was a haunting of the devils, and he disappeared at his command. 3)

But I also want to satisfy those who feel like quarreling about it. For they say that women were turned into tomcats is true because a certain Wagehals, who slept in an empty house, wounded several such tomcats; but when morning came, many old women were found so wounded. [This has no reason,] 1) because either it is fictitious, or the devils have wounded the right old women themselves, in order to give credence to a lying thing, as if he had wounded the right old women, who seemed to wound the tomcats (that is, the devils). It is possible, I say, that the old women in their sleep or in a swoon (extasi) thought that they were running around and were wounded, while they were lying quietly in bed and were wounded by the devils in reality, so that they believed afterwards that they had really been running around and had been wounded by another. It is the same with riding on the broom. It is sufficiently obvious that the Herodiad and the goblins (laribus) are devils.

3) The same narrative is more detailed and understandable in the Tischreden Cap. Walch, St. Louis edition, vol. XXII, 776.

1) Johannes Geiler von Kaisersberg, so called after the residence of his grandfather, who educated him, was born on March 16, 1445 in Schaffhausen. He died as a preacher at Strasbourg Cathedral on March 10, 1510 (König, Deutsche Literaturgeschichte, p. 194).

2) Cf. Walch, St. Louis edition, vol. VIII, 346, note 2.

Thirdly, excellent men write about the devils, who act as man (incubis) or woman (succubis), that Satan in the form of a woman can have dealings with a man (succumbere), and when he has received the seed, again lie with a woman (incumbere), and thus procreate. 2) For in such a way he sought to seduce a certain hermit, that he might bring him to fornication, and then disappeared, as St. John, the first hermit, relates in Jerome. Yes, it is said that the devil was once in the form of a child, and süns nurses could hardly have given him enough.

Fourth. I almost doubt those who ride on a coat. It is possible that they go a short distance, but whether they go far, I do not know, at least not in such a short time, as they say. I know that even if they don't really ride, the devil can ape all the senses in such a way that the one who rides is calm, and yet makes himself think that he rides to his beloved (dominam) and accomplishes everything with her, which, however, may be nothing but mere imaginations (phantasmata).

I make the same judgment about those who bring food and drink from afar; and this is not opposed to the fact that afterwards they really recognize the places where they have been, as they say, because the devil could form similar figures before their senses. Likewise, I also judge the servants he brings, for which it seems to me an indication that no one is allowed to address them, lest they disappear like smoke.

To the last of what is seen in the crystals or ivory or in a fingernail, it is certain that it is a deception of the devil, who fancies (fingentis) figures in the crystals, as much as is admitted to him. For he cannot always do this, nor above all, as one has experienced enough.

But from this other things may be judged. For the kinds of these juggleries (portentorum) are innumerable and still increase daily, because the workers in the vineyard of the Lord do not do their duty.

All this, however, is quite insignificant and small with the devil, for these are things by which he hears the bodily senses and imaginations, the lowest parts of man. But with much greater subtlety, as well as with greater danger, he intercepts the mind and the intellect. And though there are very many whose senses are open to his dazzling works, yet he listens to many more in the mind, namely, to the learned in the Scriptures, to the saints in works, so that he is called by the apostle [2 Cor. 11:3] by his proper title, a madman of the mind, even as he beguiled Eve with his mischievousness, so much so that he also disguises himself as the angel of light [v. 14.]. Therefore also St. Ambrose says in the sermon of the bishops: Hostile highwaymen 3) set ropes along all roads, which are to be greatly feared because of the innumerable danger of death (mortibus), small beasts with the great and innumerable creeping beasts, so that it is impossible for any man to be secure in any work, in his mind and intellect, unless he constantly distrusts himself and fears in all things, and with Job shuns all his works. But oh, that God would have mercy, how secure we are today, the lowliest as well as the highest, the learned as well as the unlearned, as if the devil had died, in such a

2) The Wittenbergers and the Jenaers add: "but mißgeburten (monstru), not a right human being".

3) supplantore", actually - who put someone "in leg to trap him.

Just that we fight the bloodiest wars for our delusion or quarrel and fight without end! Thus our godlessness deserves that we would be given over to a wrong sense.

Well, of the coarser and sensual things this is enough. There follows another kind of transgression, that is, those who are deceived by a beautiful appearance. There are again two kinds. One consists of those who deviate from the right path with regard to relics and the veneration of the saints, the other of those who are hopeful in wisdom and their own righteousness against God. First, let us deal with the first.

The saints are venerated and invoked by us in two ways. 1) First, only because of temporal and physical things. And these venerate the saints in a wrong way, yes, they honor themselves more in them, because they seek what is theirs, not what is God's, and therefore they make the saints almost idols to themselves. St. Augustine does not reject them completely, but only praises them in such a way that he says they are better than those who seek the temporal through alliance with the devil. For it is better to seek temporal things from God than from the devil. But by this they are not praised, not even Christians. It is a very small praise, yes, a great rebuke, that they are not good, if they are not compared with the most wicked. And yet, God, who also gives food to the young ravens, hears them also in this service (cultu), and gives them what they ask, as is proven from the Scriptures.

First. Through Naaman the Syrian, God gave salvation to all Syria, even though he was an idolater, yet held in high esteem by the king of Syria [2 Kings 5:1 ff].

Second. The people of Samaria, when they began to serve God, even though they also worshiped their gods (which could not possibly please God), were delivered from the lions that strangled them [2 Kings 17:24 ff].

Third. To Ahab and many idolatrous

1) Löscher remarks: Luther speaks soberly of the veneration of the saints, but still caught up in the Roman superstition, which he had not yet discarded.

and evil kings he gave many victories and benefits because of some works that have an outward appearance before men.

Fourth. St. Augustine, in his writing De civitate Dei, Book 1, Cap. 8, tells us that the Romans were given such an exceedingly great empire by God because of some excellent virtues that they had, while they could not please God, but only made themselves deserving of the Meys.

Fifth. He often spared the Jews, who avoided sin only out of fear of punishment, even though they were a people who always went astray in their hearts and did not please God.

Sixth. And even now God often averts pestilence, war and famine for the sake of an improvement that has come about only out of fear, although God cannot like a forced repentance that is less than half a repentance. This is quite obvious, because when the punishment subsides, they soon return to their former attitude and way of life, yes, they become even worse. All these, as they worship him as one God and live piously for the sake of temporal things, so they also receive their reward. We do the same with the saints of God, whom we honor no further than when our foot or head hurts or our purse is empty. And even though this is useless and foolish in the sight of God, and even though it does not please God and the saints, it still serves the glory of God, who is able to bring forth something good from all things, indeed, whose essence it is that He is good even to the foolish, even to His enemies and blasphemers, rains on the grateful and the unthankful, in order to teach us precisely by this that these are not the things for the sake of which he or a saint should be worshipped, since we see that he also gives these things abundantly to all bad boys without being asked or worshipped.

And so that this may be more clearly understood, let us enumerate some of the saints whose superstitious veneration is known to all.

The first is St. Anthony, who is venerated by many because of the "holy fire" 2) (because otherwise you would not look at him) is venerated and in sol-

2) ignis sacer - the rose, the red run, St. Anton's fire.

The saints of the world worship St. Anthony in such a way that they have almost gone so far in their godlessness that they believe that the holy man can perform these healings himself, by his own strength or through the gift that God has given him. So much so that they do not ask for what they desire from God through the intercession of St. Anthony, but, as it were, from Anthony himself alone, that they do not even think of his intercession. Then they seek this grace of healing from him alone in such a way that they either do not know or do not seem to believe that God could bestow it through anyone else. In the meantime, no one has ever heard of anyone who has called upon St. Anthony for the merit of succeeding Anthony in the joy of the spirit and in the other virtues mentioned in the legend of St. Anthony, but of the fire it says nothing at all.

The second is St. Sebastian, who is venerated above all because of the pestilence; only recently St. Martin was added to him as a companion, 1) [and St. Rochius, who led a very fine life and enjoyed a high reputation. The holy life and faith of these three men is not to be appropriated by anyone. And to also blurt out my suspicion, which admittedly may seem inconsistent, it appears that some saints have been called to this service before others only because of the sound (allusione) of their names. For the name S. Tonii has in Italian almost the sound (Italica allusione prope sonat), as if one said: sanctus ignis, that is, the holy fire, as if he was because of his name also the emergency helper (patronus), who could heal the holy fire, as also the pagan Romans the fever 2) and other things, which in their name an appeal Hal (allusiones rerum) to the gods. So also Sebastian "Sanct Pastian", as if he alone could help against the "plague", while in their biographies nothing is read about the plague. Therefore, even in Italy, these two are honored before others no differently than if you saw that among the pagans the evil-willed deities are pacified. Now the holy "Rochius" has a name, which in German is "Rache" (revenge) and Zorn (wrath), as if he were therefore useful to avert the wrath of God, because he is either called Rochius in truth, or only invented. But the legend of the same, if it is otherwise credible (si recipitur), tells something like that]. 3)

The third is Valentine, the patron (praefectus) of the falling sickness. Since we read nothing that he had to do with this disease, so I would almost swear that he has come through the consonance in the German language to the office that he must provide help here. For cadere means "to fall", which sounds quite similar to "Valentin". And one should not be surprised about this, since the superstitious women also employed St. Vincent to find lost things, guided by the same consonance; for in German invenire means "to find", and therefore they appointed Vincent a servant and guardian over the lost things.

It is not something great nor wonderful that God allows this to happen, and still accompanies these things with his constant benefits, and the church approves of it in the same way, especially as far as St. Anthony is concerned, because, as I have said, God cares little about distributing these things, which he also gives to his enemies. In the meantime, he lets both the foolish and the weak in faith enjoy these goods, as long as they are not worthy of better things, or until they become capable of better goods.

The fourth 4) is Christophorus, according to a

3) This last sentence is added by Luther in the misprint index.

4) Löscher: "The following was preached by Luther as a sermon on the feast day of St. Jacob [July 25, 1516], after he had sent a short preface on the words [Matth. 20, 22: 'Ye know not what ye ask.' - This introduction has not been preserved for us. (Weim. Ausg.)

ts The following passage, which we have put in brackets, is missing in the editions of Schumann and Lotther. The Weimar one has it only in the margin with the remark that this passage is found in the first edition, but Luther had preferred to see this passage deleted, as can be seen from the misprint. In the editions there are many different readings in it, depending on whether they used Luther's improvements more or less.

2) Isdris was worshipped as a goddess, As reported by Pliny.

Legend, which is not both apocryphal and suspicious, but who has such great honor that no apostle can be compared to him, even if his deeds are written in the middle of the Bible. However, he is not honored for the sake of obtaining forgiveness of sins and the faith or grace of God, but, as the verses say, for the sake of this service:

Saint Christopher, such great power is within you:

He who sees you early in the morning, his mouth is full of laughter at night.

Satan cannot strike him, cannot spoil him by sudden death.

First of all. See how here the wicked ascribes such great power not to God, but to a wooden and painted image; he does not even ascribe it to faith, which alone makes us receive it when the saints obtain something.

Secondly. I would like to be instructed by which scripture and by which miracles it has been proven that the image of Christophorus can accomplish this. Thus, under the pretense of godliness, a vast sea of superstition has broken in, since no one prevents it, as the priesthood sleeps and eagerly seeks gain.

Thirdly. Why does the one who saw him early in the morning laugh in the evening? How? if he saw him in the evening? Has he so bound his strength to the morning sight that he who has forgotten it early in the morning or has come too late, would have looked at him in vain if he had looked at him afterwards at any other time of the day?

Fourth. Why is it not said, "He who follows your faith will always laugh? Whoever suffers with you will rejoice with you? But far be it from them that would follow him, seeking those things. Far be it also that they who would follow him should seek those things, or seek them in such a way.

Fifth. Why does not the cross of Christ make those who look at it laugh, since it has the testimony of Scripture? Is then he image of Christophorus better than that of Christ, since Christ's cross alone is in truth a type of Christophorus [cross-bearer]?

Sixth. The worst thing is that in this way people love him more, revere him more, look at him more diligently and trust in him more than in Christ Himself, so that they show that they do not praise God in His saints but themselves, because they do not seek the glory of God but their own benefit, and publicly confess this clearly with an insolent forehead that they do it for the sake of diseases. It would be better to follow the saints, be taken away by a sudden death, and become blessed, than not to follow them, die a natural death, and become damned. Also this saint seems to be invented first by soldiers and noblemen and noblemen (generosis), since in the wars a sudden death, to German "the going death" is to be feared to them, especially after the shooting guns are invented. But they do not think of the fact that the people there die much more often stante morte, in German "of the standing death", and not only "of the going death".

Seventh. That men seek to be secure thereby, and to live without the fear of God, whereas all worship of the saints is instituted for the fear of God, that it may provoke men to repentance, make them remember death, and point them to the life to come. But they use the same only to flee these things, but to hold on to those. Therefore Christ should be said to take back his word, since he says [Matt. 25:13], "Watch, for ye know neither the day nor the hour," for we have found Christophorus to watch for us while we snore, and we can be sure of the whole day, much less that we should not know the hour. How? if now also Christophorus had found another Christophorus, whom he had looked at, and had himself become certain that God would not strike him: how then would he have come to his martyrdom? since it has now, not with weakness, but with wickedness finally come to such a point that God is deprived of his dominion, that he has to strike those who look at Christophorus, and that he has to strike those who do not look at Christophorus.

The fifth is St. Lawrence, whom they first honor with fasting, so that he may protect their house from fire, but then on his feast day they do not suffer a speck of fire in the house all day. However, in other houses they use fire to cook food. But in this way they do not fear and worship St. Lawrence, but rather fire. But perhaps they are so foolish as to believe that fire is abhorrent to St. Lawrence because he was burned and roasted in it, so that when he sees a fire he remembers the injustice he has suffered and is angry with those who have it. If it were so, no Christian should have fire on any day. Or did he become a lord of fire because of this, because he overcame the fire? That is certainly true (he overcame it), yes, he also became a lord of the devil, of sin, of the world and the flesh and all evil. So why is he worshipped for the fire alone? Or why do you not worship him, so that he may protect you from ungodliness and wrath, from anger and hope, by which he is roasted on the fire by Decius and his servants, who carried this out? These he finally overcame, and can still overcome in you through his intercession. But you would want to look for this elsewhere than in St. Laurence; therefore he must only be the protector against the fire. St. Florian was given to him as a comrade, whose life and name is also unknown, and is not known by them in any other way than that they see him painted on paper as he pours water on a burning house. For they are satisfied with this, because they also look for this only in him.

The rest we pass over in brevity. St. Vitus has his assigned position at the lamentable St. Vitus' Stanze. St. Erasmus is the protector of the miserly, but in such a way that he is venerated with a certain number of prayers and with wax candles: then he will surely flood them with wealth. For what else should he do, since he has nothing to do? But

St. Louis of the Order of Minorites, 1) because he once in his life made [bad] beer well, may now, since he is dead and blessed, do nothing else [than brew beer]. Saint Wendelin, a shepherd, is even more useful against all wolves than all dogs. And when he was alive, he tended only one man's cattle, namely his own; now that he is dead, he is forced to tend all people's cattle. We Christians are still not ashamed to divide the business of temporal things among the saints as if they were now servants and journeymen, so that almost the den of superstitious customs has returned, that we have again built the tangle (cabos) of Roman gods and a kind of pantheon anew, for no other reason than that we might have a good life only here.

Now we want to add some female saints. Among them, St. Anne, as she is both a newer and an older one, is rightly the first. Although her legend is exceedingly doubtful, nevertheless she was probably the most pleasant in this respect, and still is, that she came as a new one, because we begin to get tired of the old things and of those which have a quite certain proof. But it was even more pleasant because it did not come empty, but full of riches, since otherwise it could not have done anything at all if it had brought poverty. Secondly, that she is almost elevated above the Blessed Virgin. Thus, new festivals always detract from the old ones, and we elevate the new ones, guided more by the influx of the great crowd than by proper devotion. Thirdly, that it is clear and evident that they began to worship her because of wealth, according to the apocryphal and very suspicious legend, in which that impoverished gambler was helped (even from heaven) to become rich again. For this alone has the godless eye of avarice observed in this whole legend. And it is necessary that because of the feast of this holy mother, the feasts of all the saints are now somewhat obscured, especially those of the apostles, perhaps because they taught poverty. And yet God wanted them to

1) Barefoot, Franciscan.

They have been worshipping St. Anne so much for the sake of wealth that they have also sought other things that are of the spirit, as the church does, as the so-called collections of this day show. But they believe that they have enough festivals for this, which have long been celebrated to excess.

The second is St. Barbara, after whose legend many others have been invented, such as those of Catharine, Dorothea and Margaret. But those who honor her most devoutly seek that she may not die without the sacrament, which would not be so damnable; others desire that a pregnant woman may not be endangered in childbirth. For one reads that this holy martyr requested this and other things at her departure (transitu), that the one who keeps her memory should obtain this. First, according to the testimony of all, this legend is both apocryphal and suspicious, especially since it is written that she was a disciple of Origen, and Eusebius did not think of such a great virgin. Furthermore, that in the legend of St. Catharine a lot of things are mixed in, everyone who has only a nose notices that. But I take the liberty of wondering that the holy martyrs who die for the sake of Christ should have been so presumptuous, or should have placed themselves in such a position, that they should have wished to be venerated by men, or that they should have been certain that they would be venerated in the future. But see also this: since they are to die, they do not ask for those whom they worship that they may become righteous and blessed, but that they may obtain wealth, health, security (all of which they have despised by their death), perhaps not seeking to obtain the same goods for others to which they themselves have now gone. Hence it has undoubtedly come about that the memory of the suffering of Barbara and similar saints is kept more diligently than that of Christ Himself, which is the power of all the sufferings of the saints. But let us be blind, otherwise we could grasp it with our hands and recognize that nowadays in the church these saints have all the more honor, the more fables there are in their legends, or profit or benefit. So must

We also bear the weakness of these people until they are taught and a better mind is formed in them.

Thirdly. St. Juliana and St. Otilie are ophthalmologists, because they are venerated by none but those who suffer from the eyes, and certainly for no other cause than the eyes, making a natural right and an infallible inference from a miracle once performed, which, it seems to me, is not far from a trial of God.

Saint Apollonia is venerated without ceasing for her toothache and nothing else. Her long virginity and her extremely fervent faith are not remembered by anyone.

St. Scholastica is made mistress of thunder, and I know that this belief is completely prevalent among women, that when they hear that some saint has had something to do with some matter, they believe that he is very capable in this matter and is, as it were, made master of it. And some priests do not suppress this superstition, especially when it is felt that he will also bring something.

Now, as I have said, God allows this and gives what one asks, not because it is something great, but because He is good and gracious, that He both bears the weak in such a way, and gives gifts to the unworthy, whose slow heart does not know how to ask for better and eternal things, for which it is proper to ask the true God, and in which He is pleased when one asks Him for them and He can give them. For those who rightly revere God and His saints seek first the glory of God in the saints, and how they may follow them, as the Church does in its collections, therefore do not ask for such things; indeed, if they have them, they are taken away from them, so that they may direct their minds solely to the spiritual; nor can the true worshippers be recognized and distinguished from the false by any better sign than when the temporal goods are taken away from the latter, but given to the latter in abundance.

For just as God gives external goods to external righteousness, and internal goods to internal righteousness, so God gives external goods to external righteousness.

If God takes away the temporal goods, he gives the inward righteousness inward goods and takes away the outward goods. This is evident in all the saints; though God has not in fact (effectu) taken away their temporal goods, he has nevertheless (affectu) taken away their hearts. Even though such people do not deserve anything in heaven, they still have a reward on earth, and they are right in that they do not desire this from the devil. For in this way he also gives many priests and monks fat and sweet pasture, although they do nothing else in their whole life but always read their prescribed prayers (horas canonicas) with a cold and unwilling heart and never pray. Just as they make themselves believe that they have satisfied God with this, God also makes himself believe that he has done enough for them when he fattened them as cattle in this life.

But some quarrelsome ones charge that I am acting sacrilegiously in forbidding to call upon the saints for bodily distress, since the church also prays to be delivered from peril of soul and body through the intercession of the saints, as in the Collecte: "and that we may be delivered from adversities of the body, and cleansed from evil thoughts in the heart" and the like. Secondly, they adorn their good opinion (as they call it) that they do not seek the temporal any further than that they might thereby more conveniently seek the spiritual, and for this reason they want to live longer and be healthy, that they might repent and become better.

Thirdly. That some have the conviction (as John Gerson thinks) that the saints in heaven are given such gifts in such a way as they had different gifts of the Spirit on earth, according to the words 1 Cor. 12:9: "To make well one another's gift" 2c.

To this I reply:

First, I set this word of Christ against it [Matth. 6, 33.]: "Seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things will be added to you." And again [v. 32.], "After all these things seek the Gentiles." If Christ calls those Gentiles who seek after such things, I hope.

that I am permitted to call them weak Christians or at least sluggish people who have a low desire [for spiritual goods].

Secondly. Nor do I object to the saints being called upon for temporal things, but I do object to their doing so solely for the sake of temporal things, and to their virtues and examples being disregarded. Show me just one of the number of all saints who, for the sake of his humility or because of another virtue, would have such a large audience, veneration and name as St. Valentine has for the sake of the falling sickness.

Thirdly. I admit that the church in her litanies asks for protection from lightning and thunderstorms and other physical hardships, but she does this in the right order by first asking for mercy and forgiveness of sins. For Paul also commanded that we should pray, that we may have peace and quietness in this life [1 Tim. 2:2]. So do thou, and thou shalt live; and thou shalt not hear me speak evil against thee.

Fourth. I admit that the weak in faith may ask for health and life, so that they may lead a better life. But here I must say two things. Who knows, or who dares to say of himself, that he has so pure a heart as to desire this in so simple an opinion? Success proves that the greater part only pretends to want to improve his life. For almost always those who are freed from God's punishment or chastisement by their impetuous pleading become worse, so that it seems that God wants to convict us of our foolishness just by this, namely, that we do not understand that He makes us healthy when He chastises, and rather makes us quite ill when He withdraws His [punishing] hand according to our wish. Secondly. If you want to improve your life, you can never do it better than if you persevere under the chastisement you have begun (i.e., in the actual correction and healing of life) until death. For this improvement of life is all the more thorough and lasting, since it did not take its beginning from you, but from God, who will come before you before you ask. Or how can I now describe all the glory and dignity of the life that passes in suffering (passivae)? We are all foolish who presume to improve our life when we are in good health, since we do not realize that it has begun to improve in sickness, and that life in suffering is much more excellent than life in action (activa). Therefore, Christians should rather be advised not only to bear their illnesses gladly, but also to wish that death would come the sooner the better. Nothing is more useful to the Christian than to die as soon as possible, as St. Cyprian teaches. But we prefer to listen to Juvenal: "One must pray that a healthy spirit may be in a healthy body. Thus St. Augustine does not speak [but]: when we are healthy, then most [in us] is the vile (insanus) disease of evil desire; not [do I say] that one should seek bad health, but that if it is imposed by GOD, one should receive it as a very good messenger of GOD, because one should not seek good without the will of GOD.

Fifth. God has also provided this very well for the sake of the hardened and the hard-necked, that some saints are considered terrible and, as it were, avengers, like St. Anthony and some others. But we teach the Christians who have a good confidence that one day they will be added to the company of the saints as comrades.

Sixth. I know the new opinion of those who say that the saints, just as they were endowed with various gifts of the Spirit in life, so also now in heaven have various gifts of grace with which they can help. But I do not see how they can prove this, except by an inference taken from similitude (a simili). But this kind of proof (argumentum) is exceedingly harmful in matters concerning faith. For what does the devil do, when he disguises himself as an angel of light, but to make a proof out of a similitude? or how many errors have flooded over the church under the name of Christ and his saints, under the pretense of holiness, under the pretense of (like

How many truths are rejected as a nuisance, pretending that one's conscience is too tender to hear them!

I see that the Church does not say: Saint Paul, heal my wounds, but: Pray for me. Therefore, you must know that all the saints are capable of all things, and that through them you will be given by God as much as you think you will receive. Therefore, you should entrust all your affairs to the one to whom you have the greatest affection; first of all, your sins and the distress of your soul, as St. Cecilia did at her wedding, calling upon all the saints in turn to preserve her chastity before God.

Of course, I do not reject what St. Augustine also expresses as his opinion in a certain epistle: that God, through a saint, does in one place what he does not do in another. Who knows the counsel of God? If he himself distributes, then it is rightly distributed. But therefore it is not salutary for you if the business is divided among the saints according to your presupposition (sumptione). Therefore he did not say that the martyrs in glory always receive other and again other gifts, but he says: He did not want that in all the memorials of the saints should happen what happened in those 2c. Although, as I have said, God so sustains the weak who seek only such things from the saints, giving them according to His gracious will what they desire, it is incumbent upon us to instruct and guide Christians to perfection, and to teach them what is wholesome and meritorious, lest they fall into the error of inventing idols from the saints of God. For it is not a merit that the body is made healthy and the money is increased, but if you are sick and poor, that is something beautiful, if you tolerate this merit in the right way.

Let this be said of the first glory of the saints, that is, the bodily and outward.

<sup>1</sup> Secondly, the saints are worshipped in truth and inwardly. This worship consists first of all in the praise of the heart, then by heart in word and work, that is, when God is praised in His saints and the saints are praised in God, as it is written [Ps. 150, 1. 2. Vulg.]: "Praise the Lord in His saints, praise Him according to the greatness of His power." So Paul writes Gal. 1, 24. that the first Christians did, since he says, "And praised GOD above me." So does the 111th Psalm [v. 1. 2. Vulg.]: "I will give thee thanks, O Lord, with all my heart, in the counsel of the righteous, and in the congregation: great are the works of the Lord, and delicious according to all his will." For the LORD wills that his glory be told, and the work of his hands be declared, as he saith [Ps. 102:22], "That they may preach the name of the LORD in Zion, and his praise in Jerusalem." And again [Ps. 9:2], "I will tell all thy wonders;" likewise [v. 15], "That I may tell all thy praise in the gates of the daughter of Zion." And many other sayings in the Psalter. For for this cause he worketh so many and so great things in the saints, that he might be praised. Again it is said [Ps. 34:3.], "Let my soul glory in the LORD," and elsewhere [Ps. 105:3.], "Praise his holy name," and Ps. 20:6. [Vulg.], "Let us rejoice in thy salvation, and in the name of the LORD our God be we exalted." For thus the apostle teaches [1 Cor. 1, 31.], "He that boasteth, let him boast of the LORD." Therefore there is no doubt that the saints desire to be praised and glorified, not in themselves, but in the Lord, and the Lord in them. And this way of worship will not only be pleasant to God and pleasing to the saints, but it will also be beneficial to you and incomparably more useful than if you worship them for your own sake and your own affairs; indeed, only this way is beneficial, and any other is harmful.

Therefore, for the simple-minded, we want a way: Namely, he worships the saints of God rightly in God who looks at the works and grace of God and is moved by their contemplation and is filled with a sweet love toward God, that he has condescended to bestow upon them such great and glorious gifts, as if to say: I praise you and thank you, O pious GOD, for your mercy endures forever. For you have had mercy on this holy one and have prepared for yourself such a glorious vessel of honor out of the multitude of those who lie in sin and condemnation. Thus you have praised God in his holy one. Again, you will also praise the Holy One Himself in the Lord like this: O Holy One of God, N., blessed art thou among the children of men, that God hath counted thee worthy to be adorned with the gifts of such unspeakable grace and glory of God, as Saint Elisabeth beatified the holy virgin, saying [Luc. 1, 42. 45.]: "Blessed art thou among women, blessed art thou that hast believed; for that which is spoken unto thee of the Lord shall be accomplished." For you must perceive the odor of divine grace that he has poured out on his saints and taste the droplets of his goodness beforehand, so that you too may be inflamed with love for God. For what are the saints but, as it were, drops of dew or night drops in the locks and on the head of the bridegroom? As he says in the Song of Songs, Cap. 5, 2: "Open to me, dear friend, my sister, for my head is full of dew and my locks full of night drops." For thus he calls Micah 5, 6. the saints a dew, since he says: "There shall be the remnant of Jacob among many nations, as a dew from the Lord," for all that they are and do is dew and heavenly grace, which breathes the exceedingly sweet mercy of God upon the children of men. Thus, indeed, all glory must be brought home to the saints of God who gave them this power. Look at the Church, which sings of the Blessed Virgin: "You are a coward, O daughter, (but) from the Lord, because we, not from you but through you, share in the fruit of life; and on the feasts of all the saints, the Church addresses its prayer not to the saints, but to God, with the names of the saints by testifying that the merits of them have come from God, and then by these merits God commands their prayer. For only after this sacrifice of praise is accomplished in the right way can we attach our prayer to it, asking first for just such grace from God, and lastly for temporal things, if indeed a man can pray for temporal things who thirsts for the spiritual.

1) Löscher: "Luther said the following in a sermon on the day of St. Anne [July 26, 1516], after he had sent a few things about the precious pearl that was found in the field." - "We no longer possess the exordium." (Weim. ed.)

But this invocation and veneration of the saints is so completely neglected that not only do we not consider the works of God's mercy on His saints, but we do not even know their deeds, or even their names, like the one who called the Holy Trinity "three falcons. Thus, we do not consider what good God has done for the saints so that He might be glorified, but what good they do for us so that we might be pleased. But the Holy Spirit and the Church of Christ, in all the veneration and the feasts of the saints, certainly have this in mind, namely, that we should lift up our hearts to GOD and to the divine works, and that from the contemplation of the graces bestowed upon them we may attain a confidence [in GOD], as Christ says Matt. 5:16: "So let your good works shine forth." To what end? That my leg may not hurt me? No, but "that they may praise your Father in heaven." Here St. Augustine says: they should not despair; this can also happen to them, if they only want it. Of course, the saints have lived according to this rule and for the purpose of doing good, so that their light may shine for the glory of God, and it is through the effect of the devil that their lives and works are not preached or celebrated for this purpose. All their lives they have sought only what is God's, but we seek not only in our lives, but also in the lives of the saints, only what is ours, and do not care about the glory of God. And everywhere only what and how much they are able to do for our benefit is preached, but not how much mercy God has shown in them. Therefore, they stoop to the utmost sacrilege and bold argument as to which saint in heaven is the highest in the sight of God, as if they themselves had done something and had not done something.

rather GOD; we have sunk our eyes completely into the flesh and turned away from GOD.

Yes, in our time (which is even more abominable) the veneration of the saints has come to such a point that it would be better not to keep the feasts of the saints, nor to know their names. To see this, go through the superstitions of the foolish great crowd and see how different patron saints the different craftsmen have. The goldsmiths have St. Eligius, 1) the shoemakers Crispin and Crispinianus, the walkers St. Severus, the painters St. Lucas, the physicians Cosmas and Damianus, the jurists St. Ivo, those who deal with the liberal arts (artistae) St. Catharina and sometimes also Aristotle as patron saints; others have others again, and the Franks have their Kilian; every nation its saint. But now see how they honor them. First, they do not care about their works and examples. Secondly, when it comes to the highest honor, they hold a mass early in the morning and celebrate this whole day. But they show this by no other sign than their clothes and idleness, by feigning a celebration more than holding it, since otherwise they kill time in revelry, singing and jumping (since their heart is never so far from God as on this day). Yes, they mock the saints as if they were celebrating Bachanalia or Saturnalia, and they continue this into the next day with drinking, gambling and, to put it briefly, with such a frenzy that it sometimes comes to murder and death. For this is the glory of the feast days in these evil times, that even an Anubis 2) or some abomination of the pagan gods has not been more shamefully dishonored, yes, that even your pig would not tolerate being so honored. But God's wrath has become so great, and he has given them a hardened mind, that everything must be completely wrong.

1) Thus in the Weimar, Erlangen and Löschen. In the manuscript, in the Basel collection and in the Lotther edition: Dlo<sup>u</sup>iura; alone there is no such saint. Wittenberg and Jena: LutoNum.

2) Anubis, an Egyptian deity with a dog's head.

How much more right it would be if, with a humble and quiet heart and in a quiet house, one moderately refreshed oneself and brought the poor here and prepared a meal for them; indeed, it would be better if one worked and also did all the menial work than if one celebrated in this way. For it is not by this disorderly being with ostentation and indulgence, but by quiet conduct (therefore it is called celebrating the Sabbath [sabbatissare]) and love toward one's neighbor that one serves the saints. If you yourself would condemn it as something extremely shameful, if someone commits such things on Easter or on Christmas Day, why do you honor your patron saint, whom you have undertaken to honor most at that time? Or why is he, who all the year was calm and safe from your taunts and abuses, tormented with it just on this day, when it should be least? Why do we curse the Turks, of whom it is said that they shamefully defile the images of Christ and the saints? Or do we not yet understand that God shows us by their example (figura) how much it displeases Him that we Christians in truth defile His saints even more shamefully? What a beautiful service and piety this is! No one blasphemes the saints of God more shamefully than the very one whose patron he is, and on no other day more than on the one dedicated to his worship. Imagine if you could suffer such worship, that is, mockery, even from the least person.

Here, therefore, the bishops should be extremely vigilant; indeed, it would be very salutary if all feast days [of the saints] were abolished and only very few were kept, on which one heard the word of God early in the morning and read mass. For our feast days are nothing but a disgrace to the Church, and not a fear of God, but a godlessness against God, as experience teaches enough and more than enough. And God can say to us with much greater right than to the Jews (Amos 5, 21.): "I am disgusted with your holidays and despise them", and the word Is. 1, 14. 13.: "My soul is hostile to your new moons and seasons. The new moons and sabbaths, I do not like them."

The first consists in the presumption and abuse of vain honor, in which some also quarrel among themselves about the saints, since everyone strives to make the saint who has done his business (sui studii) or belongs to his order so famous that he prefers him 2) to all the others, not because they want the saints of God to be honored, but they themselves, who have such great people as patrons. Although this vanity (vanitas) is clearly evident and very many deal with it, I do not dare to go further into it, partly because they, adorned with the most beautiful appearance, would easily dare to cry me out as a sacrilegious judge and to excuse themselves in the purest way, partly because this matter also concerns (tangit) the nobles and great ones in the church, who can suffer much less [that they are touched] than heaven itself. For it is precisely because of this that such a great swarm of brotherhoods 3) has arisen, and I do not know whether through so many brotherhoods they will not finally bring it about that they keep neither brothers nor sisters. But others may judge about this. Appearances are good; one must not punish too harshly until this matter itself becomes clearer.

I would like to say that those belong here who want the feast of the Conception of the Blessed Virgin to be the first and highest of all, and those who fill their entire sermons with the worthiness, privileges and indulgences of new feasts. Posterity will see that we have not lived in vain, for we have established new feasts to make the old ones obsolete; if we have established nothing else, this one is worthy of eternal remembrance.

1) Löscher: "The following was preached by Luther in 1516 on the 10th Sunday after Trinity, July 27. - The Exordien Hiezu finden Walch, St. Louiser Ausg., Bd. XII, 1726. Bd. X, 1284 und Bd. XIX, 736.

2) Weimarsche: oun instead of sum (misprint).

3) Degenhard Pfeffinger, councilor of the Elector Frederick the Wise, belonged to six and thirty brotherhoods at the time of his death (1519). The list of them can be found in Kolde, Friedrich der Weise, p. 74.

I hope that it will come to this, that also a feast of Abraham will be celebrated, because in his faith was the beginning of salvation and the promised Christ. For if God had not given the promise to Abraham, Christ would not have been born. And perhaps it is provided that the day of Adam and Eve must also be celebrated. And so the days have come when we are very fond of teaching and hearing everything except what is old and established truth, as the apostle says [2 Tim. 4:4, 3.], "They will turn away their ears from the truth, but will turn to fables, charging themselves with teachers, after which their ears will prick." Not as if I reject a godly inclination to new festivals, but that I see that not a few of the same are held and exalted, that one even seeks to make others detestable. The saints do not need our hope and discord; indeed, not they, but we make idols of ourselves and honor ourselves under the name of the saints.

The other abuse comes from avarice. Churches are erected everywhere and have already been erected over images that are not consecrated, especially where the easily seduced crowd of the common people flows in. And even the churches themselves are not consecrated; nothing but profit is sought in them, only that the appearance and the name of godliness is there. For if the devil sends false Christ under the name of Christ, how much more can he work error and deception under the name and image of Mary or another saint! And the more freely, the more negligent we are in heeding the counsel of Paul [1 Thess. 5:21]: "Test all things, and keep that which is good," and that which John says [1 John 4:1]: "Test the spirits, whether they are of God." But we are content with a beautiful appearance, and immediately run to it without examining. This running to and fro is done by the devil: first, so that he may draw the people away from the consecrated places and alienate their hearts from the sanctuary and direct them to worldly things, always tempting them with new and strange things and making them curious (for this is deserved by those who are weary of the church they have at home). Two

They do this so that they may have a just cause for neglecting the word of God and the worship of God in the parish churches. I do not want to say anything about the fact that by traveling they waste time and squander their wealth, and burden themselves with many sins by gossiping, or hearing, or seeing many useless things. But their house, their business (rem), their family they neglect, that is, in vain they toil and commit much evil.

But that such running together is of the devil is shown, besides what has already been said, by the impetuous running together of the mob itself; for it is said that women and servants, while they were working or going about their business, were suddenly raptured (raptos) and forced, as it were, to leave their business, which cannot possibly be by the Holy Spirit, but is a very evident deception of the devil. For the Holy Spirit is not a spirit that drives to sacrilegious behavior and impetuous being, but a spirit of counsel. Nor does he revoke his commandment, in which he commanded the woman to be under the authority of the man, and that without his consent her vows are void; and the servants that they should serve their masters faithfully and not embezzle anything: how then should he draw away the very same to disobedience, which he has so strictly forbidden? Therefore, I have heard that where such churches were consecrated and ordained for regular worship, such congregation ceased. But it is said that even now some of them are not consecrated, lest the influx should cease and the profit dry up. Oh about the Christians who seek profit through such ungodliness! Is that from God that cannot bear the cross and the blessing? Who could have ever believed that Christians could be plunged into this abyss of error even by the most cunning devil!

But I, too, have known a man who began to erect such a sanctuary, which serves to deceive, under the name of the Virgin Mary, who had appeared to him in his sleep (so holy and worthy does hope think it to be); but when this was refused him by the superiors of the Church, he denied the idea of a sanctuary.

the devil immediately stopped in that place, and he went elsewhere and established his whorehouse there. But these are in truth images and idols of whoredom, which the Lord punishes through the prophet [Hos. 9:1, Ps. 73:27], in which believing souls forsake Christ through their whoredom. For He has forbidden to believe those who point us to certain places and preach to us [Matth. 24, 23.<sup>1</sup>) 25.], "Behold, here is Christ, or there." Believe them not, saith he, "behold, I have told you before." Therefore let it be cheaply suspicious to thee, as the pestilence that creepeth in darkness [Ps. 91, 6.], however delicious a semblance that may have inag, which is performed upon these unconsecrated oerters. For it is not in vain that the Church has decreed that her churches and places should be sanctified by the word and prayer. Now if anyone's wife or servant should cry out that they have overcome such a spirit for pilgrimage, hear my counsel: then you also take a good oaken wood (oruoem) and sanctify their backs with several strong blows, and you will see that by this finger of God that devil is cast out. For since women are easily seduced, he is most wont to deceive them by these antics.

Thirdly. If he does not have this power in unconsecrated places (for in truth he does not have it everywhere), he does so in holy places. But this he does when he incites to leave the mother church and to go on pilgrimages to church consecrations and saints' funerals (patrocinia) of other churches, which are situated either in desolate places or in villages, but where you can see so many taverns and disorderly houses that you would like to think it is a Babylon (for in such a way the church consecration feasts and the feasts of the patron saints are kept nowadays); but in the evening they return home full of indulgences, that is, full of beer, revelry and other abominable sins, which they have served there, if they go home at all; for it happens almost regularly that at the church festivals some are killed or at least badly wounded, in such

Just that it has also become a proverb: The indulgences from the church consecrations are distributed late in the evening, because they beat themselves to death or at least injure themselves there. The devil continues to increase such lamentable disgrace, and we can still be of the opinion that it would be better if these church consecrations were not held, but should take place. May the Lord finally give our bishops the grace to revoke this indulgence at the consecrations and not allow the devil to mock us when we are murdered, for he would already be allowed too much to mock us through error.

But here I am opposed to the pilgrimages which have been accepted (receptae) [by the Church] to St. Peter in Rome, to St. James, to Jerusalem, to Trier, yes, also to various places to honor the relics of the saints and to obtain indulgences.

I answer: He would not sin who would have all these in order and would stay at home; they are not required, but one takes them on voluntarily. But I do not oppose what has now been established by long custom and habit; those who want to may still go, only they should learn that they could serve God incomparably better and create their happiness with the same costs if they serve the poor at home, yes, those who are commanded to them, as, their wife, children, servants, overlords, then also patiently bear the chastisements of God and any adversities. But it is as if we do not have enough to fight with the devil at home, if we do not go out like Dina [Gen. 34, 1. 2.], and seek more opportunity to become disgraced. For how many resist the sophistical speeches and worries with which he disputes our hearts in the home church? Furthermore, he torments us every day with drinking, gambling, and idleness, and tries everything so that our worship will not remain pure and our blessedness will suffer.

Our greed for money has also recently invented that seven golden fairs (namely they are so called from the gold coins with which they are paid) with certain wax candles and other customs are held, I do not know for what for a quite certainly occurring event. So the shameful enemy has not even left us this sacrifice unharmed.

How? if this bottomless and insatiable money bag of avarice also belongs here, since for the building of the church one sacrifices, begs, and a treasure without end is gathered together, and for this purpose one uses the relics and indulgences in the most cunning way: so that, where the money is gathered together, it is not spent, neither for the building of the church nor for the poor, but for wars or legal disputes, which are already there, or is kept for such, which will still come? For so also have they made the nails of Christ ministers of avarice, yet under an exceeding holy appearance of godliness, that they pierce the gold and silver coins [with the same]. Why do they not rather pierce paper or a board with them, if only it is sought that one performs a reverent act (devotio)? But what do I dare to describe the cesspool of avarice in the church, since the prophet himself despairs of it, and summarizes everything in one piece and says [Jer. 6, 13.]: All follow avarice from the greatest to the smallest. 1)

After all, this is supposed to be the summa of everything:

All these worshippers of the saints sin against the first commandment, because they do not seek what is God's, but their own, even in God and His saints, and are themselves in this work the ultimate end (as they say) and an idol, using God and serving themselves. Of these the word of the 78th Psalm [v. 34. ff.] can be said: "When he strangled them, they sought him, and turned early to GOD, and thought that GOD is their refuge, and GOD the Most High is their Redeemer (but now it follows from what heart they did this), and pretended to him with their mouth, and lied to him with their tongue; but their heart was not steadfast unto him, neither did they keep his covenant faithfully"; and that word of Christ Joh. 6, 26. "Verily, verily, I say unto you, Ye seek me not because ye have seen signs, but because ye have eaten, and are filled." For the same cause he drove away him also that said [Matt. 8:19.], "Master, I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest." But he said [v. 20], "The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests; but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head," by which, of course, he indicates that he said this not only for Jesus' sake, but also for his own covetousness (cupiditatem). -

So the verdict is clear [Matth. 16, 24.]: "If anyone would come after me, let him deny (not money, not clothing, not even health, but) himself, and take up his cross and follow me." Likewise [Luc. 14, 33.], "He that renounces not all that he hath cannot be my disciple." Likewise [Luc. 14, 26.]: "If any man hate not his father and mother, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple."

Furthermore, since they also seek their body and what is of the body, it is certain that they are not worthy of Christ; however, they are worthy of some gifts, like the hired servants, like the children of Abraham of Keturah [Gen. 25:6], but not of the inheritance with Isaac. But if they are not worthy of Christ, it is clear that they do not do his will, nor keep his commandment.

I do not say this to say that all those who are such people are condemned, but only that they may learn to recognize their misery and not rely on being Christians for the sake of honoring and worshipping God and the saints in such a way, but rather that they may see their imperfection and understand what is meant by the groaning that Christ taught us to confess and then commanded us to pray [Matth. 6, 12. 10.]: "Forgive us our debts" and: "Thy will be done" 2c., because we are not such people, although we should be. Therefore, if one can grasp the counsel of God, He does not give these [bodily] goods for the reason that He is in contact with the-

1) Löscher remarks: "This is said against Tetzl and his indulgence stuff. After that, Luther spoke in particular (sx prokssso) about indulgences, which will be communicated later from the 'manuscript'." In our edition, this passage is found in vol. XIX, 736 ff.

But rather to provoke by these little things, that either the imperfect, or at least his children, may desire the greater, to whom he does not give such things. And this is enough of this matter.

But lest the unholly heretics, the Picards, think that I am furthering their cause, who, out of great ignorance, indignant in haughty conceit, accuse us Germans of worshipping the saints of God and making idols of them, and therefore gather against us a great heap of scriptural languages, in which it is forbidden to worship more than one God, and, in order to make us hated by their own, as it seems, with good reason, do not indicate in the most deceitful way, that it is written that King David and Solomon and many others were worshipped, at the same time as godless perverters of Scripture and deceitful slanderers of our Christianity (pietatis) (for so these peasants finally teach us that one must worship only One GOD, and boast as if we had ever denied just that, while they cannot deny that often also the officials at the court of a king are honored and, as it were, worshipped, in order to reach the king all the more easily): so I say for the sake of the exceedingly coarse and inconsistent ignorance of these people: that one should at any rate take his recourse to the intercessions of the saints, as it is said in Job [Cap. 5, 1.], and turn to any one of the saints, and as Solomon directs his father [Ps. 132, 1. Vulg.], "Remember, O Lord, David, and all his meekness." But also the patriarch Jacob said of Ephraim and Manasseh [Gen. 48, 16. Vulg.], "My name shall be called upon these lads, and the names of my fathers Abraham and Isaac." But I will speak of this in His time, God willing.

Lutder's shipyard. Vol. III.

This is the case with those who worship the idol of their wisdom and righteousness instead of the true God. These are "the proud" whose king, as God says in Job 41:25, is the Behemoth, the devil. With these there is trust in free will [the opinion] that things are not bad for them, that they do not need a doctor. But Christ died in vain for them, because they can lead a good life without him. In this way the Pelagians in particular, and then all heretics, have been lost for ages. Furthermore, there are also people today who are not Pelagians, but have the same attitude or even a worse one than the Pelagians. For the Pelagians at least attributed to God that he instructed free will through the teaching of the law; but these have reason, which guides them rightly, 3) which strives for the best, so that they do not use the instruction of the law out of necessity, but only because it is convenient for them (pro commoditate). But in this they differ from the Pelagians in that they admit that without Christ one cannot lead a good life in such a way that it is meritorious, and so Christ died, not for the sake of sin, but because otherwise there would be no merit. It would not have been necessary for him to die in order to pay the punishments of hell, but only so that heaven could be earned. For imagine that if a child grows up without a real mortal sin (for this, they claim, is difficult, but still possible), Christ is not necessary to him as a deliverer from the power of the devil, but only as a helper to heaven, because if such a man died, he would neither go to hell nor to heaven. By this theology they seem to me to assert that no one is born as a child of wrath and a child of the devil, unless one wanted to say that a child of wrath and of the devil is he who has no merit. And since the priest at the baptism of little children blows out Satan, that he may give place to the Holy Spirit, it is understood by this that from such a vessel, which has no merit, only make one that has merit. For only now is the apostle forced to the point that he understood in such a way "the vessels of wrath" [Rom. 9, 22.]; and the sacrament of baptism gives grace, not for the forgiveness of sin, but only for .a beginning of merit, and the word of the [Nicene] Creed, "I confess a certain baptism for the remission of sins," must, according to the new gloss, be understood not of sins leading to damnation, but of sins not meritorious. And so original sin has brought no harm into the world, but only deprived of merit and of seeing God, and this deprivation of seeing (that is, of all goods) is not an evil [in fact], but only according to the word, namely privative [it only indicates the deprivation]. For in such a way we do theology nowadays. And [Gal. 3, 13.]: "Christ became a curse for us" and [2 Cor. 5, 21.] "was made sin for us", that he might free us from the curse and from sin, this is not understood differently than that he was made something unmeritorious (non meritorium), in order to free us from the unmeritorious. Finally, the little word "sin" will receive a new meaning in the whole Scripture, that is, the Scripture will become a completely confused book (in duet confusionem). But we want to leave this darkness and save it for another time, because we have spoken and acted of these things very often elsewhere.

Now, as we said above, since we are, as St. Augustine says. Since we are a corrupt multitude (Una massa perditionis), no one is justified other than by the pure grace of Christ, without any merit. And therefore he must necessarily be haughty and think much of himself who has not yet despaired of himself, his reason, his good opinion, his inward and outward works, and has come trembling and miserable to the throne of grace. For all those moral virtues and sciences which are in human knowledge (scientiae speculativae) plunge man into a twofold evil: first, that they are not true virtues and sciences, but sins.

and error, because they necessarily come from an evil heart that has not yet been made whole by grace, which in all things can seek nothing but itself, and so they make man empty and vain (inanem). Secondly, that they deceive man and make him puffed up, so that he makes himself think that he is neither evil nor foolish. Hence it is that he is sure, and cares for nothing less than seeking grace, knowing that he does no evil, though he admits that in so many good works he does nothing meritorious. From this comes further evil, that he despises, judges, condemns, bites, jeers against, punishes, belittles all who are not like him, for he, like that Pharisee (Luc. 18:11), is "not like other people," nor one of them. These are the ones who build their house on the sand (Matth. 7, 26. 27.), which is in terrible danger and will fall into eternal destruction.

But the right servants of righteousness know and confess that they are wholly sinful, and want that all the good they have is not in them, but apart from them in God and in His mercy, because the righteous of his faith shall live, but before God no living man is righteous (Rom. 1, 17. Ps. 143, 2.). Therefore, depressed by their sin, they judge no one but themselves, put no one down, despise no one but themselves, and hold themselves by this declaration (diffinitionem) of righteousness: righteousness consists in accusing oneself first, and a righteous man accuses himself first. These have in truth One GOD, from whom, through whom, and to whom (in quem) they are justified, and are without sin through the mercy of GOD, who forgives their sin, not through their active righteousness. Thus, God is praised and worshipped in truth, since to His works is attributed all that we are, indeed, since our works are not ours, but God's, as Christ says (John 7:16), "My doctrine is not mine." Thus nothing remains for us but sin, foolishness, wickedness, corruption and shame, and therefore we cannot please ourselves in any way or make an idol of ourselves, since we have again become the nothingness from which we came.

have come, and God alone remains all in all.

<sup>1</sup> But if we say this, we are reproached: Just as the apostle, who taught the same, was also reproached [Rom. 3:8]: "Let us do evil, that good may come of it; which condemnation is quite right."

Therefore, these must be answered: First, that it is not denied, but most zealously taught, that one should do good. The argument is only based on the word "good", because (Hebr. 11, 6.): "Without faith it is impossible to please God", and (Rom. 14, 23.): "Everything that does not come from faith is sin. Admittedly, their good, which they so call, done out of nature and out of a moral endeavor (moraliter), is therefore evil in the sight of God, because it is not done out of God and for God's sake (that is, it is not recognized out of God and not related to God), but man puts it on himself and pleases himself in it as if it were his, even though it is not his. For this addition of Leviathan (the devil) makes everything evil in the sight of God, however great the appearance it has in the sight of men, hence Paul freely exclaims publicly both about the Gentiles and the Jews [Rom. 3:10, 12]: "There is no one who does righteousness, there is no one who does good; they have all gone astray, and have all become unfit." But grace enlightens man to recognize that his works are God's alone; nature does not teach him this. Hence such a man is patient and meek, whether his words and works be blamed or praised, knowing that he loses nothing because it is not his. But nature rages when it is rebuked and is senseless when it is praised. The cause of all this is that faith and hope have no other foundation than God alone, Jesus Christ, the right rock, and by no creature. Reason and nature, however, have a sandy foundation, their good works and their wisdom. Therefore, when a man's good works fall away through evil speaking, he is angry, but when they fall away through the revelation of conscience and divine judgment, he despairs forever. But the righteous, though he falls, rises again, and against his conscience he leans on God's mercy, as it is written [Ps. 21:8]: "For the king hopes in the LORD, and shall stand firm through the goodness of the Most High."

Therefore, the description of hope in the Magister Sententiarum [Petrus Lombardus] is either wrong, or it is obscure and not given in an understandable way, for hope does not come from merit, but vice versa, merit comes from hope; for as faith, so hope and love must necessarily be there sooner than any meritorious work. For hope comes only from God having mercy and pouring it out, and has no other object (objectum) or substance (materiam) or foundation than the mere mercy of God, not at all our works, which are rather the object (objectum) and origin of despair. Christ lived for us and is our merit if we believe in him. But those who believe in him do not henceforth live for themselves, nor accumulate their merits, but serve Christ, and in turn, make merit for Christ. For thus the apostle teaches Rom. 14:8: "If we live, we live unto the Lord; if we die, we die unto the Lord." He is our hope, and we (that I say so) are his hope, or those for whom he waits (expectatio ejus), as a son is the hope of his father, and the father the hope of the son, for whom he has provided everything and gathered treasures.

But as I have said of hope in spiritual things, so may it be understood of hope in bodily things, as there are riches, beauty, honor, power, favor, sex, good living, and the like. For he that trusteth in these things, and is proud of them, and despiseth others that are not equal unto him, it is evident that he maketh these things his own, that he taketh them for his own use.

1) Perhaps this following piece belongs to the sermon of August 3, 1516, whose exordium is found in Walch, St. Louis edition, vol. X, 1 288 ff; only it will have been reworked for printing. Compare, among other things, Luther's Urtheil here and there on the explanation of the "pes (hope) [1. o. Col. 1290, § 4s at the Magister svntviiturnum. (Weimar edition.)

He would not make a distinction between himself and any other man, however rejected. If he realized that it belonged to God alone, he would make no distinction between himself and any man, however rejected, and would confess that he had nothing more, only that Jesus Christ alone was his assurance. Thus it would happen that if this commandment were kept, there would be no hope, that is, no root, no beginning of sin, and as a result there would be no sins, but peace, love, gentleness, meekness, patience and all virtues in one heap, which, however, cannot be hoped for in this life. Therefore we always remain sinners and transgressors of this commandment, but are preserved by this sacrifice alone, that we well recognize this transgression and do not deny it, nor excuse ourselves in our sins with ungodly, malicious words, but confess them and sigh for the help of grace, and that the future kingdom will soon come. By this humility we deserve to be forgiven in the things we do too little, as St. Augustine says: "All the commandments are fulfilled when we are forgiven for what we do not do. But those who confess are forgiven, for God gives grace to the humble [1 Pet 5:5]. Therefore, one must beware of the harmful and flattering gloss, which completely exorcises and nullifies humility from the ground up, saying: God does not require that this commandment be fulfilled in this life; for this gloss evokes the most harmful certainty, it makes the hands limp and the knees of the sturdy fighters waver, and is one of the cushions and pillows which the Lord has made in the

This commandment (as well as all others) flows from the first commandment. For if the first one is kept, this one is also kept easily.

Prophet Ezekiel [Cap. 13, 18.] condemned. Unless one understands this to mean that God does not require it of those who demand such a fulfillment of themselves and suffer, and confess that they do not fulfill it, and therefore seek an early death, and desire to depart [Phil. 1, 23.], so that they may no longer lie in sins and in disobedience to this commandment, but be with Christ and in righteousness and in complete obedience to this commandment. To these, I say, he does not impute it, nor does he require it of them. But from those who do not demand it of themselves, but put pillows under their arms and walk without fear, sure that it will not be demanded, he will certainly demand it to the last penny. Of these the 10th Psalm [v. 13.] says: "Why should the wicked blaspheme God? For he saith in his heart, Thou inquierest not." For he that knoweth not that he is guilty of this commandment, how shall he know that he is a sinner? Whoever does not know that he is a sinner, how can he fear God and His judgment? But whoever does not fear, how can he be humble? But he who is not humble, how can he obtain grace? He who does not obtain grace, how can he be justified? He that is not justified, how shall he be saved? 1)

The other commandment follows:

1) On St. Laurence's Day, Aug. 10, 1516, Luther concluded the sermons on the first commandment. (Weim. Ausg., Vol. I, p. 74.] - "Here, presumably, the sermon of August 10, 1516, connected itself." (Weim. Ausg., vol. I, p. 430, note 2.) This sermon is found Walch, St. Louis edition, vol. X, 202 sf. The first paragraph of it is again I. o. vol. XII, 1728.

The other commandment.*)

Yes, it is already held. For it is for this reason that our blindness was made manifest to our foolishness, since this would not have been necessary if Adam had stood firm; for then we would have known all this.

But now we do not even know what must necessarily be done in external things, let alone that we should know what is internal. Therefore, in the first commandment the heart and the inner man are instructed how to behave toward God, but in this commandment the mouth is instructed. For we sin against God with three things, with the heart, with the mouth, with works; therefore for each one there is a special commandment, and these commandments are all three such that they contain a negation (negativa) or a prohibition in themselves (prohibitiva). And among all ten commandments there is only one which commands (affirmativum), namely: "You shall honor father and mother" 2c. For the third, "Thou shalt hallow the holiday," theHErr Himself interprets by a prohibition (negative), saying [Ex. 20:10.], "Thou shalt do no work there." This is also indicated by the name "Sabbath," which means rest, that is, abstaining from works. For in the same no work is commanded, therefore on that day they occupied themselves only in reading the law. So in all the commandments he forbids evil, therefore no other commandment has a promise except the one, that is, the one which enjoins honor against parents (affirmativum). The others threaten punishment because they forbid evil.

Therefore / Just as he who does not sin with his heart does not sin with his mouth and work,
Thus, he who sins with the heart cannot act rightly with the mouth or with any work:
He who does not keep the first commandment does not keep the second and third,
But he who holds the first also holds the second and third.

For it is not to be feared that he who has placed his trust in God, loves God above all things, hopes in Him, seeks Him, thirsts for Him, should use His name uselessly and dishonorably, just as it is not to be feared that a subject who loves his prince should not also want that his prince's name should be made glorious and held as a sanctuary everywhere through him. 1) Therefore, in the first commandment, we have already mentioned those who sin against the same thing, namely people of two kinds, quite gross and quite foolish. Here all things must be spoken of in the same way. For in this commandment no other swearing is forbidden than when it is done in the name of God, but also no blasphemy against a man, let it be done in the name of God, but afterwards [where it is said], "Thou shalt not kill."

1) As Löscher notes, the manuscript: imkert nt sanotuin, which we have recorded instead of Kaders.

It should be noted above all that this commandment in an affirmative way also indicates that one should speak the name of God in the right way, or where it is necessary for salvation, and that here alone it is forbidden that one should not use it uselessly. Therefore, it is often commanded in Scripture that one should call upon the name of God, praising, thanking and glorifying. Thus it is written in Romans 10:13: "Whoever calls on the name of the Lord shall be saved."

Therefore, let us first look at the gross [transgressors], among whom we first encounter the superstitious, the soothsayers and those who invent superstitious things about the tetragrammaton from Jewish fables. 2) That these use the name of the Lord uselessly is obvious, for they use the name of God neither for the salvation of the soul nor for the glory of God, but for their own vanity, for alliance with the devils, in signs, words and gestures, as was said above [in the first commandment, Col. 1139]. For it lies

2) Instead of the previous sentence, as Löscher reports, the following is written in the manuscript: First, the superstitious, the soothsayers and others, of whom it is said above, desecrate the name of God. Secondly, some superstitious people from the Jews, who make useless talk about the rain tetragrammaton; but this belongs to the first commandment. Third, those who live unworthily of the Christian name, who actually desecrate its glory. Fourth, perjurers, liars, plotters (dolosi), deceivers, and all who abandon the truth when they call God as a witness and curse His name, 3) even by God; likewise the bishops who [wrongfully] 4) banish and absolve. Fifth, those who joke [with the name of God]. Sixth, those who blaspheme against God. These are the worst. Seventhly, heretics and hypocrites and people who have a hopeful mind, quarrelsome people who argue about the truth; indeed, those who call upon their righteousness under the name of God. These we will now take one by one. First: That these 2c.

4) inZnKle is missing in Löscher and in Weimar's,

They are not interested in attaining the blessedness of the soul, much less in honoring God, but only in atoning for their lust. Therefore, just as they rejected God from their hearts and made Him useless in themselves, contrary to the first commandment, so they also now profane His name with their mouths and use it uselessly.

"But that which is done without need or just cause is called "vain" and "useless. But it is a twofold necessity or benefit, for which one should lead God's name, namely our blessedness and God's honor; yes, only God's honor, because we should also not seek our blessedness through His name, unless it is for His honor. But "to lead" (assumere = to take into one's mouth) is understood in this way, for example, when someone takes something before him or intends to do or say something, and uses the name of God for this purpose; just as he accepts (assumit) in his heart the grace of God through faith for his blessedness, so he takes (assumit) into his mouth with reverence the name of God for his and other people's blessedness. Now enough has been said about this in the first commandment, that one refrain [from the useless use of the divine name]. Nor can they excuse themselves by using holy words and prayers, since by doing so they sin more shamefully than in other such things.

Would you not consider him a madman who, wearing the sacred garments meant for worship, would go to the dance, to the theater, or to war, and make such a joke out of such a serious matter? If then you would punish him with all seriousness, why do you not punish yourself much more than the one who misuses that which is more holy than all garments, yes, that by which garments and everything are sanctified, not for dancing, but for fornication, for the works of the devil, or at least for bodily help, and does not respect the soul? Such is the excuse of those, as of him who in such a way abuses the holy garments, and when he is punished, says: Well, it is a holy and good thing. For what else should one say to such a one than this: [You speak,] as if I did not know that it was good and holy. This you teach me now, while I ask you for

For the sake of God, punish you for abusing the Holy One in such a way. But we are now such Christians, who buy wooden shoes, so that we do not defile our new shoes, and certainly do not drag good clothes into the muck, nor do we do to our golden vessels the dishonor of putting urine in them, nor even unclean water, but we drag the holy name of God to some unworthy things, without all shame. Since no one does this with what is his (just imagine that someone would be so furious if he did this with what is his), how will it be with what belongs to others, even what is his, who wants his own to be kept pure? How popular would he make himself, who would drag a prince's title, name, and coat of arms into the mire and turn back in it, namely, if he himself saw it and forbade, or rather commanded, it to be set up high, as it belongs? 1) But when we hear that the Turk desecrates the churches, defiles the altars and all the sanctuaries, we become quite beside ourselves, burn with anger, and think of avenging this disgrace by war, and complain that the princes do not wage war against the Turk. But just reach into your bosom, and you will have seized a Turk. In the meantime, God gives the princes to the greater punishment in wars among themselves, so that he punishes us more than the Turks, because we defile the sanctuaries worse than they do.

Secondly, we are confronted with perjurers, liars, schemers, deceivers and all those who abandon the truth by calling God as a witness and by cursing His name, even by cursing God, those who banish unjustly, even those who joke (with the name of God) and blaspheme against God, of whom something has already been said above and more will be said later. But here we will see who are the ones who sin by swearing against the name of the LORD.

It is therefore to be noted, 2) that there is a twofold

1) We have adopted the reading of the Weimar edition: in snkiiios ioco stntui instead of sukliini in the other editions.

2) Instead of the section from the beginning of the previous paragraph to here, the manuscript here brings only: "Secondly, those who sin by swearing against the name of God. Here is to be noted" 2c. This omission here has its reason in the fact that the same had already been said before in the manuscript. Cf. Col. 1193, note 2.

Swearing gives [a good and an evil]. Of the good it says Deut. 6, 13. and 10, 20.: "Thou shalt fear the LORD thy GOD, and serve him only, and swear by his name." For thus God Himself often swears in the prophets, saying [Ezek. 33, 11.], "As I live, saith the LORD," and Ps. 110, 4. "The LORD hath sworn, and will not repent," and Ps. 132, 11. "The LORD hath sworn unto David a true oath." Thus Christ swears in the Gospel [Matth. 26, 63. f.]; the patriarchs, the prophets, the apostles, and all the saints swear and have sworn. And this is a meritorious work, because it is done in things pertaining to blessedness. Therefore, whenever anyone speaks or does anything that pertains to salvation, he should swear so that it will be believed, if it is feared that it will not be believed. Thus the apostle swears in the letter to the Romans [Cap. 1, 9. f.] that he often intended to come to them. What other reason did he have for his swearing than that it would benefit their salvation, that they would believe it? so that they would know that he was a faithful shepherd and not a greedy man, and that they would have confidence that true love was in him. Thus it is said in the 63rd Psalm, v. 12: "He who swears by him will be praised." The reason why God is pleased with this swearing is that by it his truth is invoked, and faith is believed in him, and for his sake peace and unity are established among those who swear. Therefore he is sacredly honored in this work, because the work of the devil is destroyed, namely strife and contention. For he that believeth not thee, and is not satisfied, believeth thee for the name of GOD, whom thou callest upon, and is satisfied; therefore we owe this honor to GOD alone. Therefore the apostle Heb. 6, 16. says: "The oath makes an end of all strife."

The other swearing is evil, and this is twofold. One is that which is done out of habit, because in this way, through the constant use of the name of God, reverence for Him is diminished. As when one says in German: "By God, truly, forsooth, as true as God is in heaven, by God and all the saints," in which living GOD, by the holy GOD, "on my holy cross, on my holy blood, on the cross of GOD, it is torture great, torture beautiful" 1), that is, on the suffering of Christ it is so. Likewise, when one curses thus, "The devil take me, break my neck, God help me no more than God help me, on my soul," on my conscience, "by my faithfulness and honor, by my priesthood." This and many similar things are, unfortunately, so often in the mouths of many that almost the second word is such an oath. Here, house fathers and mothers should watch over children and servants and servants, for it is an exceedingly wicked habit and contrary to this commandment.

But for the sake of the simple-minded, one might ask: Does this have anything to do with the name of God, when one swears like this: "Truly, I speak the truth? I answer: Yes, because the name of God is the truth, because He is the truth. For the apostle Rom. 9, 1. swears by the truth and his conscience. And even though it might seem that this is forbidden because the conscience is not the name of God, since it is sinful to swear uselessly, just as it is sinful not to swear by the name of God or by something other than God, even if one speaks the truth, Christ still refers to Matth. 5, 34-36. refers all this to God, since He says: "You shall not swear by heaven, for it is God's throne, nor by the earth, for it is His footstool, nor by Jerusalem, for it is the city of a great king. Neither shalt thou swear by thy head, for thou canst not make one hair white or black." From this it is evident that he who swears by what is GOD's, or what is appropriated to him, swears also by GOD, by Him in whom and to whom are all things [Rom. 11:36.].

The other is false swearing, when someone intentionally and knowingly swears falsely with the above-mentioned oath formulas; this is a very grave sin, and rarely does this sin go unpunished even in this life. If you doubt this, only ask the perjurers about it. But this sin is above the

1) In the original: "Martyr already".

It is very difficult when this is done in a solemn way with prescribed ceremonies (forma) in view of the church, as those do who secretly betroth themselves to each other, and as punishment for their sin afterwards hate each other and divorce by perjury: a terrible guilt, but also a terrible punishment. Therefore, among all the commandments, this one alone has a threat of punishment added to it, in that it says [Ex. 20:7], "For the LORD will not let him go unpunished who takes the name of the LORD his God in vain." But the first commandment also has a threat, that the LORD will punish the iniquity of them that hate him unto the fourth generation [Ex. 20:5]. But because the apostle [Eph. 6, 2.] does not enumerate the promise contained in this [first] commandment, but only that in the fourth, which he says is the first, it would seem that this threat of the first commandment should not be counted either.

And truly, perjury is a great sin, which is evident from the testimony against it in Scripture, for the Lord commands in the Law [Deut. 19:12, Matt. 5:33]: "You shall not take a false oath," and the prophets punish perjury severely. Therefore Hosea says, Cap. 4, 1. 2. [Vulg.]: "There is no truth, there is no mercy, there is no knowledge of God on earth. Cursing and lying and murder and theft and adultery have abounded, and one bloodguilt follows another." Yes, God wanted the oath to be kept so inviolable (sanctum) that He also avenged the fact that Zedekiah had not kept his oath to the king of Babylon [2 Kings 24:17 to 25:7]. In the same way they were not allowed to harm the Gibeonites [Jos. 9, 19.], even though they had been betrayed by them when they swore an oath to them. Nor did they dare give their daughters to the children of Benjamin for the sake of their oath [Judges 21:1 ff], and they would rather let pagan blood be mixed with the blood of their brothers than break their oath.

Secondly, how great a sin perjury is,] is clear from the matter itself. For to swear is to call upon God as a witness and to use him as a means by which those who are in conflict unite. But so he who swears falsely, exposes GOtt to ridicule; yes, what is frightening, when he says: As true as GOtt is, is alive, is true, he says in his heart that this is not true. And thereby he denies GOD with the mouth, yes, also with the heart, with which he assents to the denial of the mouth. And this is the most grievous denial, because he knows that God is, and believes this with his heart, and yet at the same time he agrees with it also with his heart that he denies Him; for he would not deny Him outwardly if he did not want to deny Him, and yet he denies Him against his heart and conscience. Therefore, this is the most serious lie, and it is against God, because he wanted there to be no God, so that his lie would stand.

Thirdly, this is clear from a similitude. If you persuaded a prince to give you his letter and seal so that people would believe you in your cause, so that they would believe you for the sake of his name, and then you shamefully denied it and put the prince to shame, what do you think he would think of you? Do you think that you would have a guarantor in him? Or [that he would be at your service] if you asked him to be present at the treaty you made with another, and if he came, you would deny before his face that he was a prince and strangle him? But how great a majesty is God! He alone is the Lord.

To understand this more clearly, it is to be noted that against this commandment in twofold way one acts with the oath. First, by swearing; second, by breaking the oath. By swearing, for example, if someone knowingly commits perjury in a matter by fraudulently saying that he wants to do something that he does not want to do, in order to become free, or if someone falsely denies what he knows, as happens in trade, with entrusted property, in court cases. These sin more grievously than the superstitious, for the latter take the name of God in vain, while the latter lie, which is much more grievous; and this is done chiefly by negationibus, as it is said in the 24th Psalm, v. 4: "He that hath not sworn to his neighbor falsely." By breaking the oath, for example: if someone.

has sworn without deceit, but later changes his mind and does not keep the oath, which happens with affirmations, as the 15th Psalm, v. 4, says: "He who swears to his neighbor does not deceive him. But if he cannot keep it, he has not therefore sworn perjury. But you say, How is it then? If I do not swear, I must suffer harm or danger or death; surely it is seen that I am to be absolved [from the sin of perjury]; this is as if a robber or an enemy compels you to confess what you have. To this is the answer: one must not commit sin for the sake of anything, not even for the sake of the eternal, much less for the sake of the temporal. But you say: Who will restore it to me? Answer: God, for whom you have spoken the truth. But I cannot enumerate all the cases of this dreadful abomination, because nowadays, in truth, it has come down like a flood and is not considered anything. Oh, if we thought about how so few people are saved and feared, how soon this security of our blessedness would end!

Therefore the Lord says Matth. 5, 33. f.: "You have heard that it was said to the ancients, you shall not make a false oath, and you shall keep your oath to God. But I say unto you, that ye swear not at all." Many have struggled with this saying as to whether it is permissible to swear. Some say that it is "half of the evil of the punishment" if one swears, others that it is half of the evil of the swearer. But if one looks at the meaning of Christ, he definitely does not want one to swear, because he says: "You shall not swear on any account. So the meaning is: "The Jews are commanded not to take false oaths, but swearing is permitted to them at their discretion; but to you I command that you shall not swear in any way, either by heaven or by any other place. By this he means that no one should ever swear of his own will. Namely, the desire and own will to swear he has forbidden, and as much as is in him, no one may swear. Therefore, if he says more than, "Yes, yes, no, no," he sins, and it is evil. However, by this he does not forbid that any believer should swear.

I say that a man should not swear if he is forced to do so, whether he is forced by the violence of another or by the need of his brother. Yes, both friend and foe can urge me to swear, 1) and do whatever he wants, if it is only something permitted, as he says below [Matth. 5, 40. f.), that one who takes the coat should also leave the skirt, and even walk two miles with him. For then he does not swear himself, because it is not in his will, but in humility he serves another's will, or through love takes care of another's need. Where this is not the case, one may not swear in any way without it being sin and evil, because then one swears out of mere arbitrariness, without need. For in this passage Christ instructs the inward man, who is to avoid not only perjury but also oaths. The Jews are forbidden to take false oaths, but Christians are also forbidden to swear to the truth, because the honor of the divine name will be more perfect and inviolate under the new law than under the old. Secondly, because a Christian should not love temporal things, neither should he swear for their sake. For since he must not seek what is his, how should he be permitted to swear for the sake of them? Therefore, he must esteem the name of God more highly than the Jews did at that time (dissimulatum est). But where one can render service to another, a brother is bound without hesitation, but in the fear of God, to do what the other's need requires. And the cause of this prohibition is that he knows that we always use the name of God not otherwise than uselessly [, and it is not rightly used], except where it is used in love and humility for others or also for our own blessedness, which is the basis for this prohibition, 1 Cor. 12, 3.: "No one can call Jesus a Lord without through the Holy Spirit" 2c. Or to put it even better: "You shall not swear on all things" is said against those who make an excuse.

seeking to swear, not by the name of God, but by heaven, by earth, by Jerusalem, by their head, by their soul, as if for this reason they were not guilty of swearing falsely, because they do not swear by the name of God.

In this way they regard such a swearing as if they had not sworn. That this is the opinion of Christ can be seen from what he explains immediately afterwards, how he does not want people to swear at all, namely, neither at Jerusalem 2c.

The third commandment.

Remember to sanctify the holiday.

"This is my commandment, that ye love one another," John 15:12. "Love is the fulfillment of the law," says the apostle, Romans 13:10. If one has this, no law is necessary; without it no law is sufficient. Therefore, in this third commandment no work is commanded, but rather rest, so that God may not be offended by works. For no work is commanded in it. Therefore these three commandments prepare man for God, as it were as a pure substance (materiam), that he should rest with the heart, with the mouth, with works, that is, according to the inward, and outward, and middle man, which are the sensual, the rational, and the spiritual man; and it should be a pure rest. Two things in particular are to be noted here.

First, that the Sabbath was commanded to the Jews as an example, as the apostle expressly indicates Col. 2, 17: "Which is the shadow of things to come, but the body itself is in Christ." Hence servitude (opera servilia) or work of the hands (manualia), though thoroughly good, means sinful and illicit works of the old man. For as some animals were unclean only according to their signification (significative), which in themselves were good, pure, and wholesome, because God had created them, and yet signified unclean and evil: so also the bodily works, which are good in themselves, are nevertheless forbidden [on the Sabbath] to signify future things, that is, the revelation of evil deeds. Thus the Sabbath signifies the spiritual time which Christ, the Sun of righteousness, has illuminated, which has no night. Therefore Isaiah Cap. 66, 23. says: "There will be one month on another.

And one sabbath upon another." And the apostle chastises the Galatians [Cap. 4, 10.] for keeping days and months and times and years after the Jewish manner, that is, only externally. Therefore this commandment has actually ceased, yea, all commandments, so far as perfect Christians are concerned, for [1 Tim. 1, 9.] "to the righteous there is no law given."

But the church has kept festivals for the sake of the imperfect, because it is necessary to carry out God's word, for the truly righteous is so conformed to God that, as with God there is no difference of days, place or person, so also with Him every day is a festival day. But the weak, who are not yet dead according to the old man, need these things, that they have to create (occupentur) with certain services, days and ways, with watch, fasting, work, prayers, exercises (disciplinis) and the like, by which they reach the growth of the inner man, so that when the body has been mortified and subjugated, and the passions slain, they may also gradually cease, and be diminished as much as the inner man has increased, so that when the latter has become perfect, those things must cease altogether. This is what the apostle says [Gal. 3:24], "The law hath been our taskmaster unto Christ." For the law brought nothing to perfection; but John went before it to prepare a ready people for the Lord [Luc. 1:17].

Whoever therefore lets himself think that he has accomplished something great or even everything through the doing of those works, and bases himself on it, trusts in it, is sure of it, and through it seeks nothing else, is [Hos. 10:11] "the calf of Ephraim, accustomed to thrash gladly," who is who thinks that this is a good man, that is, one who does good works, whereas it is only for the purpose of preparing a man to be good. For it is only a baptism with water [Matth. 3, 11]. Of such people much, yes, almost everything is said in Scripture. For those who seek their righteousness by works (justiciarii) are hypocrites, who also pervert the Scriptures to that end, and, as the apostle says [1 Tim. 1, 7.], "understand not what they say, or what they set." Just as the apprentice in any craft does what the master does only when it pleases him, but thereby progresses to mastery (but if he were to stop there, as if he knew everything, he would appear to all as a fool and ridiculous), so here we are not made good by good works, but prepared. For it is not by doing but by suffering that we are good, if we suffer God's work (actiones) on us by being silent. Therefore, the Church keeps this commandment and many other figurative things (figuralia) to train the weak, so that they may increase, not so that they may remain on the same spot and be safe when they have done these things.

Secondly, it is to be noted that St. Gregory asks here: why the Lord attracts only this One commandment [of love], since the Scriptures are full of commandments? But (as I have said) all the commandments require love, since without love, that is, without an easy, ready, cheerful, inclined will, the commandments are not fulfilled, even if they are fulfilled. For there remains an unwilling and therefore also a guilty (rea) will, even though it does the work with its hand and outwardly. For it is said [Jac. 2, 10.], "He that sinneth against one is guilty of all the commandments." Thus the first Psalm [v. 2.] says that the man is blessed who delights in the law of the LORD (that is, who has love and loves his neighbor). And Ps. 110, 3. it is said, "Thy willing people," and the apostle says [2 Cor. 9, 7.], "A cheerful giver GOD loveth." For GOD has no pleasure in forced service, but in free and willing, as the 54th Psalm [v. 8. Vulg.] says: "Willingly

I will sacrifice to you." This will is love, as St. Augustine says.

Why then did the Lord not give this one commandment alone and let himself be satisfied with it? I answer: It would have been sufficient, but man had to be shown in which things he must have love, so that he would not deceive himself through false delusion and trust, and think that he has love, while he does not have it. For it happens very easily that we have a very good opinion of ourselves and a very bad opinion of our neighbor, while it should be the other way around. Therefore the holy ten commandments are, as it were, a mirror in which man should look at himself, in what and how far he lacks or has advanced. For with all commandments one should not only take care that one does them, but above all from what kind of heart and will one does them. I say they are given that we may know our will from them, and then also that it may be exercised; all this is a burden to those who are unwilling and reluctant. For behold, to make this very thing clear, the first commandment contains all the others in itself. For whoever keeps this one keeps them all, and whoever does not keep any other one does not keep this one, because his heart has something else in mind, but not God alone.

But our old Adam is so perversely arrogant that he often wants to be considered wiser and holier than all the saints. That is why he dares to say with an insolent face that he keeps the first commandment, that he is not aware of any transgression, that he has no idol, that he loves nothing so much as God; that is why he had to be referred to works and words that would testify about him and convict him of his arrogant sacrilege or of lying. For example, if he is in doubt that he has no other God, he should ask his tongue if it swears, if it uses the name of God uselessly. For [Matth. 12, 34.]: "If the heart is full, the mouth overflows." It is easy to be mistaken in the opinion of the heart, and to be deceitfully presumptuous. And it is not easy to know whether one is keeping the first commandment, if one does not consult the works and words about it. Therefore,

1) These brackets are violated by us.

If anyone swears or takes the name of God in vain, let him know that he is lying or deceiving himself when he says that he loves God and keeps the first commandment. He has not searched and examined his heart properly.

But behold, someone might think that he also keeps the second commandment, and is not aware of any transgression of it: let him inquire about the third commandment, whether he willingly keeps the holiday holy, whether he eagerly hears the word of God, prays, considers, reads, speaks of God, is present at the service. If he does not do this, or does it with less pleasure than his other business, he is lying when he says he keeps the first and second commandments; for his works bear witness against him. Or would it be possible that someone should not uselessly use God's name who is himself useless? How should a useless man do anything but useless? He speaks uselessly, he thinks uselessly, even if he thinks and speaks about God. But a useless man is the one who deals with other things than God's, and who does what is God's unwillingly, compared to what is his. And every man is completely useless (vanitas).

Thirdly, if he should think that he also holds this, let him test himself by a grosser sign: Let him see how he receives the stewards (vicarios) of God whom he sees, namely, the parents, the superiors; if he holds these in low esteem and contempt whom he sees, how can he presume to say that he holds God in high esteem and nothing higher than Him, since he does not see Him?

Fourth, in matters concerning the neighbor, it is absolutely the will of God that you love him. This will is always included in the first commandment (intelligitur). Now if you say that you love your neighbor, and hate him, bite him, belittle him, injure him, despise him, kill him, curse him, revile him: behold, your work bears witness against you. Likewise, if you do not defend him when he is wronged, do not excuse him, do not speak well of him; for this love does, if it is a true love. So look well into this mirror.

Fifth. If you do not recognize yourself from this, how is this not enough?

Because evil desire is of many kinds, and no one is sufficiently aware of his own, you must pass this test through many things, yes, through everything. Thus, if you have not harmed your neighbor's body and person, you may have harmed the body of his wife, who is one flesh with him. Hast thou not coveted her, looked upon her lewdly, touched her, spoken to her, or not resisted another who did so? not helped him and restored him? How can you, I pray you, love him as yourself? For you would certainly want another to act against you in this way, for you love yourself in this way, there is no doubt about it, and you allow yourself that.

Sixth. Suppose you were not aware of anything here either, and your Adam should think that he is completely unharmed, as he is wont to do after his blindness, while he is pure in no one, think what you have sinned against his outward good, namely whether you have stolen, that is, whether you have brought something to yourself by any fraud, with false goods, money, measure, usury, cunning, robbery, theft, whether you have harmed or harmed him with counsel and will?

Seventh. [Search thyself how it stands in the things concerning the good name. Whether thou dost disparage and bite thy neighbor, and whether thou art not guilty of any sin of the tongue against him? Whether thou rejoice when others do that which thou doest not thyself.

Eighth. If thou art blameless (of integrity) in works and words (which is very rare), go now into thine heart, search out its secrets, and consider its lusts, and if thou wilt not lie, thou shalt find that thou art full of evil desire. Neither canst thou say unto thyself, I have no evil desire: for the scripture saith against it [Prov. 20:9], "Who can say, I am pure in heart?" No man is pure inwardly. For it is not enough that thou restrain thine evil desire, but there shall be no lust in thee: it shall be dealt with more extensively in the proper place. Therefore the two last commandments are the greatest, which the apostle in the Epistle to the Romans [Cap. 13, 9.] alone refers to, saying, "Let nothing desire thee."

Therefore, whoever has love, that is, a sound, complete will for the law of God, and loves the same, fulfills the law of God. For it is not to be feared that he who loves God should dishonor His name or seek another god, or desecrate the holiday. And he who loves his neighbor is not to be feared that he should despise his parents, kill, break marriage, steal, bear false witness, or even harbor evil desires, since he rather seeks to do good to his neighbor. "Love", says the apostle [Rom. 13, 10.], "does no evil to his neighbor", neither in word nor work nor desire.

But let us return to the proper object (materiam) of this third commandment. I have said that the Sabbath once served, as it still does, as an example and a ceremony for the sake of the weak, but now every day is a feast day on which no one should sin. For since in the past he was stoned to death who picked up wood on the Sabbath day, Deut. 15:32 ff, what will happen to those who commit horrible crimes in the time of grace, and moreover mostly on feast days? This is written so that we may be frightened by it; for gathering up wood is not such a great evil, but signifies (significat) an evil, as also other service work on the feast day.

1) Now the first are those who sin grossly and crudely on the holiday, namely, with revelry, drinking, gambling, anger, murder, cursing, robbery, insidiis, deceit, evil plots, and the like, of which Malachi, Cap. 2, 3, says: "I will throw the dung of your holidays in your faces, and it will stick to you." Behold, dung he calls the feasts of such people, because on the same they also give dung of themselves, as the unclean swine. And Amos, Cap. 5, 21.: "I am grief-stricken for your holidays and despise them."

For these people, like the Jews (of whom he is speaking here), put all the glory of the feast in beautiful clothes, effort in eating and drinking, 2) and ceasing to work. If these three things are there without what they mean, they make a Jewish celebration, and are nothing but incitements to fornication and vices. For if the belly is full and the soul idle, and then ornaments are placed before the eyes, what else should come out of it but that people are induced to indulgence and evil desires? And those who spend the holidays in this way do not think that if this meant keeping the holiday, any whore or Turk or heathen could do the same, even a horse and a pig, namely eat and drink, further, walk idly and finally, dress up splendidly.

2) Instead of "vielm, splendor" in the Weimar one, we have with the other editions (Löscher, Petri, Witten

Here one can find some who fast on the evening before the feast (vigilium), sometimes with water and bread, but spend the day itself with eating and indulging. And it has become quite common that Saturday is held more sacred than Sunday, because one abstains at least from meat dishes, idleness and splendor, which goes in full swing on Sunday, and all holy evenings (vigiliae) are held more sacred than the feast days themselves; admittedly quite wrong.

Secret interpretation (mysteria).

The bodily rest (ocium) means the spiritual rest, that one may leave off evil lusts and thoughts, so that one may be fit for God's word, which wants to have an empty soul. Therefore, every Christian must ask himself: Why are you idle today? And in such a way he should use this as a reminder and a reminder that he must celebrate (vacandum) in order to hear God's word.

The adornment of the garments means the good works, such as hearing mass, praying, giving alms, and doing other works of mercy, as Christ taught against the Pharisees; of which more hereafter.

To eat and drink deliciously (lautus victus) means to consider the benefits of God, the suffering of Christ, one's own sins, to read the Word of God and to reflect on it again and again. Hereafter.

berger, Jenaer and Erlanger) vietns "plsiitor" assumed, because with the former reading four Dmge Herauskommen. The latter reading corresponds to luitms vietus in the "secret interpretation".

The second are those who do works that are otherwise permitted, such as works of necessity and works that serve to prepare what we need for our sustenance. And these sin less than the former, and so much less that they are excused even in many cases.

The first case of this kind is necessity. But how one must understand need is doubtful, because here an extraordinarily great variety takes place. But this cannot be measured better than according to the rule of our Savior, who says in the Gospel [Luc. 14, 5.]: It is not sinful to pull an ass or an ox out of the pit or to water it. From this we get this rule: If such a great harm is to be feared, or even a lesser harm than an ass or its health is valued, then the work can be done by which such a harm is prevented. This, however, must be understood in such a way: if something like this should not occur by one's own choice, but because of occurring necessity through an accident. For this I must add, lest the miser think that they are given liberty to sell or buy as they please, because if they did not sell or buy, so great a profit would be lost on the day. For in such a way no feast day could be appointed, because any [feast day] deprives of profit, since it hinders the business that brings profit and the work. But the rule is proved by this: Because it was permitted to the Jews, and they did no sin in it, much more is it permitted to the Christians, who are freer from legal ceremonies!

According to this, the special cases may be easily judged. For example, if a merchant buys or sells on a feast day because he cannot buy or sell on another day or at another hour without great harm, than because the buyer or seller is in transit and does not want to wait. The latter is excused because he did not seek the work and the profit, but accepted what was offered to him in order to prevent harm, but otherwise would not have done so, and his heart was such that he would have preferred that it had been offered to him at another time.

has been offered. For in such a case, as the business has come about unexpectedly, he can also soon settle it and turn back to the celebration. The same applies to any other damage, even minor, but on condition that the service, namely the mass and the word of God, is not missed, unless there is great need, which in the judgment of a good man would serve as an excuse. But, as I have said, this is to be understood from the damage, which does not come from keeping quiet with the business, or from the omission of the business, but from approximately. For a damage by omission of the business can happen at any hour.

Secondly, from those who cook and prepare the food. For this is necessary, and it is not necessary to follow the Jewish superstition nonsensically, since the Jews do not cook on the Sabbath day, although they eat, drink and indulge. So it is also lawful to bring food and drink, and, to come to our customs, it is not a sin to put a barrel of beer in the cellar, but it is more of a sin to bring it out in so many stalls (modiis) and jugs 1) that they also drink so much that they spit it again. So it is a greater sin to bring out of the kitchen and cellar too much than to bring it in: about this the Jews do not worry, but about that they fearfully (curam) guard themselves, and many follow them. But it is a strange folly that they do not prepare food [on the Sabbath]. Why then do they not also leave off dressing and go naked? for dressing is also a work and a labor. Further, why do they walk and go and stand? Why do they not sit and sleep? Why do they eat and drink? Are these not also works? How then do they keep the Sabbath, that is, how do they rest? Furthermore, it is not a small work that one must stand at mass, at the sermon, and at the acts of worship; I prove this by all who do this with unwillingness, of which there are many here and elsewhere. So they say: I must celebrate and not work; and act according to the commandment contrary to the commandment. For that is where Jewish wisdom has come to.

For in such a way some have also gone to the petty that they even say it is forbidden to make wreaths. If they understand this from those who sell them, it is true. But a virgin may well make a wreath early in the morning to adorn herself with. For she can mend it if it is torn, so also make one; yea, she can put on her garments and adorn herself, shake out and clean her garments to put them on. It is not against this commandment that she put her cloak (peplum) in order and other adornment, except that this is done after the manner of some who cannot get away from the mirror and therefore miss the services. But those who adorn themselves out of pride or for evil desire do not sin against this commandment, but sin all the more grievously because they sin against another commandment of God on a holy day.

Third, one may feed, litter, milk, graze, tend livestock 2c.

Fourthly, wine taverns (tabernariis), butchers, bakers, fishermen and other craftsmen who provide other people with food and clothing. These do not sin if they do not encourage, help or favor drunkards and gamblers.

Fifthly, works may be done that serve a common purpose, such as repairing a bridge, preventing a flood, warding off an enemy, extinguishing fires, and averting other public hardships.

Sixthly [work may be done] by physicians, 1) runners, messengers who have to carry necessary things, blacksmiths who shoe horses, mills 2c. All this is excused in case of need, if only the service is not missed.

Seventh, those who go to the fair because they cannot do so at other times. And hereafter similar cases may be judged.

1) Weimarsche: msüols, in the other editions: rnocloinis.

But here the question arises: whether the Wittenbergers are excused for arranging crossbow shooting on a feast day in order to shoot a bird from the perch, since they could just as well do this on another day, and there is neither need, nor love (pietas), nor due modesty (modicitas), and this half feast day could just as well be given to GÖtte after the meal as the morning? A similar judgment to make about the military parade (armorum ostensione), as if this could not be done just as well on another day. Here the mayors should take care.

The other is to be moderate (modicitas) or to do little. Therefore, one may do here all the works that one does on other days, if they are only a few. As when a cobbler cut a pair or two of shoes, a tailor a skirt, a grocer sold something he had not laid out for sale. So you may run through all kinds of officia and works in similar things.

The third is love, when one helps the poor and needy, as well as the churches (ecclesiis). So it is also something holy when one bathes a sick person, washes an unclean person, cleans his clothes, his bed, makes his bed, serves him with food and handouts, otherwise it would not be allowed to ask for alms or to give them, since the mendicant orders never do this [to such a degree] as on feast days 2), likewise also all others. So one may also bring them [the poor] grain, wood, food and drink, this is permitted, if it is only done out of love, and not out of request of a counter-service (retributionis) or for the sake of eating, as it is now the custom everywhere.

<sup>3)</sup> The third are those who keep the day holy according to the letter, but not spiritually, since they do the works of outward sanctification, but not with the Hearts. And even though they satisfy the church and sin less than the previous ones, they are still people like Cain (Cainistae), who do not sacrifice the person, but the work of the person. They are only careful not to get into trouble. And would God that all those who make it worse were only such people.

In order to sanctify the holiday, one must do five things, as follows from the decree [of spiritual law], namely, hear Mass, hear the Word of God, pray, sacrifice (as some wish), and repent of sins.

First, to hear the mass. Here some interpret this extremely foolishly to the Canon, in that they want the Mass to be read with a raised voice, because it is commanded, not to see it, but to hear it, as if it were not rather commanded to read the Canon of the Mass, which alone is actually the Mass, with a restrained (pressa) voice, so that it is not heard. The rest, however, are prayers and preparations (paramenta) for the Canon of the Mass. If they want it to be read aloud for the sake of the Gospel, why do they not consider that in relation to the Word of God another commandment is given than about the Mass? But away with these useless dreams! Since in the whole Church no one other than the priest alone hears the whole mass, namely, because this mystery is great, that Christ, the true priest, although he works many things in the Church through outward sacraments and visible ceremonies, in which the faithful join in and cooperate, as the clergy now does in relation to the priest with song, prayer and response, nevertheless accomplishes most things for us with God in an invisible way, which the people and their congregation neither see nor become aware of.

After that, it is an undecided (anceps) question whether it is enough to hear the early mass; likewise, whether it is enough to hear it in the monasteries. Here one must make a distinction: If there is a need (which is discussed above), it is enough to hear a silent mass (privatam) in the morning, or also a mass in the monastery, because need has no commandment. But where there is no need, this distinction is almost always made, so that if the parish church is not despised by the but rather to visit the monastery out of devotion, it is then free to listen to them in the monastery. But in my judgment I would say (another may have his opinion) that in the great misery of our time 1) it is not at all safe to let any one, especially a simple-minded and unintelligent man, follow his devotion and his discretion against the clear rules (canones) [of spiritual law]. The reason for this is that the canons of the fathers are given to guide the people, and every man's devotion must always be suspicious, and the more it pleases him, although it goes against the common usage or the decree (decretum) of the fathers, since we know that the angel of Satan, who disguises himself as an angel of light, is to be greatly feared, and one must be extremely careful of him. For under the appearance of devotion he could easily destroy all decrees, and also the word 5 Mos. 12, 8. and Richt. 17:6, where it is commanded, and even forbidden and punished, that each person should not do what seems right and good to him. Otherwise, first the fear of man is lost and the reverence for God's church and for the community. Then the certainty is nourished [and demanded] that other greater things should also be permitted gradually. Thirdly, the licentiousness of the old [Jewish] people returns, that on the heights and in the groves and outside the churches worship is held, which was highly forbidden. For in fact we see that, if this arbitrariness of worship is permitted, not only the parish churches but also the monasteries of the city are abandoned, and the field and village churches are preferred to them under the same pretended appearance of worship, and that in such a way the worship of God is not allowed.

1) Luther's remark in the misprint refers to the following: "What is said on the first page of sheet H, that one should not hear the masses in the monasteries in a sacrilegious manner, was said and already printed before Leo's declaration of the tithe had gone out, in which he gives permission to hear the mass everywhere in the monasteries, even though it is safer not to believe one's own devotion now that this permission is there. - The decree of Leo X, of which Luther speaks here, went out under November 13, 1517. (Weimar edition, vol. IV, 538, note 2.)

Finally, the service of the church consists in visiting taverns and trading at the fair under the pretext of church consecration, patron saints (patronorum), vows 2c.

Therefore I say that in my opinion, whatever the reason for hearing mass elsewhere, no man is allowed to follow his judgment, his opinion, his devotion, but the order (autoritatem) of the church, and that one should give his mind captive to the obedience of Christ [2 Cor. 10:5], because it is written [Prov. 28:26]: "He who relies on his heart is a fool." And the Church cannot err, but every one can err in his devotions, since many prophets, saints, and kings have also erred in a similar manner, to us for a warning and a terror. Therefore, do not believe any gloss about this decree. For whoever makes such glosses is ignorant of God's law and has not yet recognized what the devil and man are, much less what God is. And it is a wonderfully perverse gloss that allows one to pursue his devotion as he pleases, while the text expressly intended to prevent this. Yes, always hold everything suspicious that points you to yourself and indulges you, for it makes "you exercise your will when you fast," as Isaiah [Cap. 58, 3.] says. Thus the prophet Micah mocked Ahab, saying [1 Kings 22:15.], "Yea, go up. "2c. But follow all that draweth thee away from thyself, as, Matt. 5:25: "Be willing unto thine adversary" 2c. Micah 7:5 [Vulg.], "Beware of thy friend"; likewise [Jer. 9:4], "One friend betrayeth another."

The second is to hear God's word, which is again under the commandment that one hear it in one's parish church, as well as the mass, unless it is omitted because of the consecration of other churches or monasteries. That one may hear God's word in the afternoon in these is indeed a council of the Church, but nevertheless 1) in accordance with the commandment of God, who wants one to hear His word everywhere with all devotion.

shall. And this second is more necessary than the first, indeed, the first is for the sake of this second, as is evident from Christ's words when he says [1 Cor. 11:25]: "Do this, as often as you do it, in remembrance of me," as if he wanted to say: Do not say mass unless you also preach the gospel. And the apostle says [1 Cor. 11:26], "For as often as ye eat of this bread, and drink of this cup, ye shall proclaim the death of the Lord. "2c. Therefore, no Mass may be celebrated without the Gospel; the private Mass with special, the public Mass with public proclamation of the Gospel. Yes, in the first Church also the banished, the penitents, the catechumens, the possessed (energumeni)<sup>2)</sup> were present at the Mass until after the Gospel; this was called the Mass of the catechumens, as one can see from Dionysius. Would to God that this still happened today, that the banned ones at least heard the word of God, so that they would recognize [their sin] all the more easily and feel a thorn in their conscience. For it would be an exceedingly cruel ban that should also forbid the hearing of the Word of God, since it is commanded that it be preached to all creatures.

Here again the question arises whether it is enough to hear the Gospel in the silent Mass. The answer to this is that it is enough if he understands it and at the same time is forced to make a journey. Otherwise, even if he understands it, he is required to hear the word of God when it is proclaimed publicly (solennter) in a loud voice (vocale). Otherwise, anyone would be free to leave the public preaching, and it would fall into contempt. Yes, if he has to travel because of necessity, he is excused if he does not understand it, even if he does not hear it. However, everyone must consider not only how great a need compels him to be absent, since this is a physical need, but also how great a need compels him to have the word of God, since this is a spiritual need. Therefore, godly conduct in heavenly things (pietas coelestis) must always outrank earthly desire.

1) Here, however, it is to be noted: If now the people are bound with such great strictness to hear the word of God, dear, with how much greater strictness are the priests bound that they also proclaim the word of God and see to it that it is proclaimed! Since this is commanded above all commandments in the most urgent way, I do not know where the lamentation comes from that nowadays nothing less is taken care of. In many places it is left entirely to one's own devices, but in several places such things are preached that one should rather leave to one's own devices, and in other places human things, legal doctrines and worldly wisdom are preached; but the gospel, that is, the memory of Christ, is so rare that one must feel a horror when one looks at it. The people are forced to the parish church and do not obey, because the priests are forced to preach the gospel and do not do it. What wonder, then, if the people stray to other churches in superstitious licentiousness, since the priests in gross ignorance are fooling with fables and vain doctrines? Thou preachest not the gospel, and yet thinkest it a great iniquity that the people run now and then to the high places of idols? Since you withdraw from the church in your ministry and from the word [of God], what else can follow from this than that the people also withdraw from obedience and preaching (auditu)? You are literally a useless person inside, with the spirit you stand outside (foris - outside the church). Therefore the people also wander out equally according to the body and according to the spirit, and thereby sin so much less than you, the more willing they are to hear the gospel when you preach it; yes, if you had even learned it! So you give occasion for the church to be empty, and you do not give the sheep their pasture and food, while you drive the cattle into the stall. Therefore

1) The first half of this paragraph recurs from word to word in "Luther's Lecture on the Book of Judges," Cap. I, 8. (Weim. Ausg., Vol. IV, p. 538.) It is reasonable to assume that this passage is to be placed there on the account of the scribe, who most likely also completed other gaps in his manuscript in his own hand. (Weim. Ausg., Vol. IV, Supplements.)

the sheep of Christ will be scattered on the mountains [Matth. 9, 36], "because there was no shepherd" [Zech. 10, 2], says the Lord.

The third is prayer. There are many things to be said about prayer, but here it must be understood as oral prayer, this cannot be denied; but it should be the lesser and a small thing compared to spiritual prayer. For prayer is the elevation of the mind to God. The words are the ladder, but the voice is the putting on (apparatus) of the ladder. That is why I said that those who pray only with their voices sanctify the day according to the letter and badly; indeed, they do not pray, but only recite the prayers of others, not unlike another's book of scripture and words, which itself is dead and understands nothing, or like an organ that makes the singing of the clergy heard, but itself feels or understands nothing of it. In this lies today a great mystery (mysterium - spiritual interpretation): namely, as the organ is, so is the clergy, that is, a screamer without understanding. A voice without words, like the organ, produces only a silent and speechless sound and tone. Of spiritual prayer, however, we will say in a moment in the fifth [section] 2.

The fourth (as some suppose) is sacrifice; but this is abolished, though in the first church this offering (oblatio) of bread and other food was common; of it was sacrificed, and what remained was given to the poor. But now, instead, the churches, monasteries, hospitals 2c. are provided with endowments for the poor.

Fifth, which is the greatest and first of all, namely, to be reconciled to God by examining one's conscience and repenting of one's sins. conscience and repentance of sins. This repentance, however, is to be done in such a way that it does not arise so much from hatred (against sin) as from love (against God). But it will come out of love (to give the simple an example of this) when a person reflects again and again on the good deeds that God has shown him throughout his life. Then

2) Löscher, Wittenberger, Jenaer and Erlanger have wrong: in rjuinto ^ruc-ecpto.

May he keep his ingratitude and his misdeeds, which he has committed by misuse of such goods, as that he has given us five senses, has protected us in so many dangers, has given so many goods of the body, the soul and all kinds of things (rerum). He has not given all these things to animals, to stones, or even to many people. Then go up to the spiritual benefits, that he sent his Son into the flesh, that he let him be crucified and die, and other gifts of immeasurable greatness, finally that he promised us eternal goods. When all this is well considered and held against our own sins, it awakens an extraordinary hatred and loathing for ourselves, but love and praise for God. This is a very true repentance, which is alive and strong, while the one that is produced by the fear of hell and by the shame of sin is only a repentance according to the letter, fictitious and of short duration, because it is not rooted in love, but only imposed by fear.

Thus one reads of a man who had lived very badly all his life, but who was nevertheless lifted up by God's miraculous blessings and gifts, and finally even attained the office of bishop. Then he rejoiced, admiring God's goodness in the face of his unworthiness, and exclaimed: Lord, you have conquered, and have caught me by your exceeding goodness: behold, from now on I will serve you wholly; and so he did. And one should not despise this gross ascension from the lowly (primis), bodily goods 2c. For one reads in the histories that at the time of the Concilium at Costnitz, two cardinals who were riding to the Concilium saw a shepherd weeping in the field. But one of them, whose heart was moved with compassion, said: I cannot pass by without hearing and comforting this man, rode up to him and inquired why he was weeping. When the shepherd did not want to tell the cause of his sadness, the Cardinal insisted [that he wanted to know it] and forced him to confess it.

1) Here we have the reading of the manuscript: tri^titiuni adopted instead of "tristi" in the editions.

At last he said: Look at this animal (and looked at a toad): God has made me into such a splendid creature, into an upright, beautiful man who has reason, and I have never thanked Him that He has not also made me into such an unshapely toad; that is the reason why I weep bitterly. Since the Cardinal was horrified by the unusually great remorse of this man and suddenly realized that he had proven himself even more ungrateful against much greater benefits that had been bestowed upon him, he fell from his mule as if dead. When he was finally lifted up by his servants and brought into the city, he kept crying out: "O Saint Augustine, how rightly you have said: The unlearned rise up and snatch the heavens to themselves, and we with our learning roll ourselves in flesh and blood!

These are the works of the true saint, which are signified by all outward works. Thus it is said in Lamentations Cap. 3, 20. [Vulg.], "I shall remember, and my soul shall languish within me." Without these two pieces, the mind and the heart are not kindled; but if the heart is not kindled, everything else happens coldly, void and harmful, because it departs without fruit. And these two pieces must be heard from the Gospel, and what is heard must always be well considered (ruminari). For these two pieces, namely God's good deeds (bona) and our evil deeds (mala), are precisely the ladder to God, through which we climb down within ourselves and ascend to God, as it is illustrated in Genesis 28:12. It is also these two pieces of sacrifice of praise and confession of which it is said [Ps. 50, 23. Vulg.): "The sacrifice of praise will honor me"; and it follows what the ascension to GOD is: "And this is the way that I show him the salvation of GOD," that is, I will reveal to him eternal blessedness. Of the other, namely [the sacrifice] of confession [says Ps. 51:19], "The sacrifices that please GOD are a troubled spirit; a troubled and bruised heart You, GOD, will not despise." And these two must be sacrificed at the same time, that they may be the more perfect.

The fourth commandment.

<sup>1</sup>) You shall honor your father and your mother, that (it may be well with you, and] you may live long on the earth.

The Jews have made this commandment powerless (irritum) by their statutes, as well as all other [commandments], because they have interpreted this honor only on words and signs and have thus emptied the words of the law (irritatores facti). For because "honor" means to give a sign of reverence, they have taken it according to the outward shell of this meaning, so that they taught that one should honor them with outward signs alone. But, as I have often said, the law of the Lord is spiritual, without change, refreshes 2) souls and instructs the inward man. Therefore, it imposes its obligations on the heart first (obligatory) and demands the heart. Therefore, let us continue according to this twofold understanding, namely of the letter and of the spirit.

Spiritual honor toward parents is a surrender (exhibitio) of the heart, and reverence that flows from a ready will. There are two parts to this: first, a willing obedience and willingness to do whatever the parents want; second, a due regard and high opinion of the parents. For the honor that the heart shows is a great service to God (pietas), and greater than love toward one's neighbor, because love loves only in this way, that it is ready to serve the neighbor, but honor instills in him a holy fear above that 3) and holds him [the neighbor] exceedingly high. Therefore, this commandment is placed immediately after the commandments of the first tablet, because it deals with those who are governors of GOD; therefore, just as GOD is to be worshipped with honor and holy fear; so also His governor must be worshipped in such a manner.

It is therefore evident that whoever honors parents in a spiritual way first shows them willing obedience and subordinates his will to them, and for this reason not only comes to their aid in times of need, but also in all things conforms to their wishes. And whoever does not show such a heart to his parents shall know that he is not fulfilling this commandment, although even now very many are blind in this [spiritual] understanding and only cling to the mere surface of the words. So it is said, "Thou shalt honor," namely, from the heart and out of full affection, "thy parents," 2c. For how should he be disobedient to parents who not only offers his heart to them, but also offers it in such a way that it is filled with reverence (honore) toward them?

Secondly (which is still greater), he shows reverence (reverentiam) (not by heart according to the letter, but inwardly in spirit), that is, that he has a high opinion of them in his heart, and this is mainly commanded in this commandment, whereby it also differs (as I have said) from love, by which each should obey and serve the other, Gal. 5:13.

But from where does this high opinion of parents arise in children, especially since they are sometimes poor, of low status, ill, shapeless, or otherwise of low standing? For in such things many are annoyed, so that they are ashamed to have such parents, and they are sorry that they were not born of the rich, the powerful, the noble 2c. O great blindness! These people must be given this rule: The high opinion of the parents comes from the consideration (respectu) of God and His will. For a pious child will think thus: Behold, if it did not seem unworthy of the highest majesty that such a man should be my father or mother, why should it seem unworthy to me? If it pleased the supreme God to work and create me in them, why should it displease me to come into being or to be created in them? For what do the parents do to give the child its form, who never even think whether it will be a boy or a girl, whether it will have eyes, ears, feet, whether it will be alive or dead, white or black, whether it will have hair or not? So I will worship the workshop of my God who formed me. I will not fix my eyes on the poverty, ugliness, lowly origin of my parents, but on God, the master craftsman. Thus, even thus, the reverence flows from GOD to the parents, does not come from the parents in that they are regarded higher than how they are flesh and blood, rather as a workshop of the highest majesty. For who will despise the workshop of the originator (principis)? What man-made work hates its workshop in which it is prepared? Since, then, God wills that the parents be honored, and there is an exceedingly just cause for this, namely, because here also is a workshop that represents God's place, this commandment differs from the [three] preceding ones only in that in those God is honored as in Himself, but in this [commandment] as in another, namely, in the principis (regentibus), which are His chair, His workshop, His altar, His throne of grace. This, then, is the right honor.

The honor of parents according to the letter is done with an unenthusiastic heart and from a mind that despises them, namely when one honors the parents outwardly with gestures (signo) only out of fear of punishment. For he who honors them only out of fear of punishment,

For as long as he fears and remembers the punishment, he honors it, but always despises it inwardly in his heart; but if he forgets the punishment, he also despises it outwardly with his deeds, as is proven by many examples and is also experienced daily.

1) It has been said how children should behave toward their parents. But it is necessary that they prove themselves parents, that the parents are worthy of their name, so that the honor of the children is not shown to idols and dead images of the parents. Yes, sometimes they are worse than robbers, because they take care of the flesh of the children, but kill their souls. For it often happens that a child has a worse murderer in its father, and it would be better for the child to be killed by robbers than to be raised by its father. Or why do you think that the plague rages mainly among small children? For no other reason than because God fulfills in them what the Book of Wisdom Cap. 4, 11. 14. says: "And is put away, that wickedness should not corrupt his mind, nor false doctrine deceive his soul; wherefore he hasteth with him out of the evil life." And afterwards [v. 16.], "For the righteous that is dead condemneth the living wicked, and a young man that is about to be made perfect the long life of the unrighteous." 2c. But of this in more detail hereafter. Now let us see what they owe them, that they may be parents.

After the apostle had commanded the children to honor their parents in Eph. 6, 1. ff. and had put this command on their hearts and explained it to them by saying: 2) "You children, be obedient to your parents in the Lord", and in fact makes known the will that they [the parents] are not to be parents merely according to the flesh, as the Gentiles, but "in the Lord," and the children also are to obey them "in the Lord": so he immediately says of the parents [v. 4.], "Ye fathers, provoke not your children to anger (which he interprets Col. 3:21, "Lest they be timid"), but bring them up in discipline and admonition unto the Lord."

With the reading ciiot, Luthern would have to be blamed for an error in the sequence, which is not found in him.

The first thing that he wanted them [the parents] to do, of course, concerns the soul (for he preached nothing about their bodies), that they should not provoke the children to anger, and not make them fainthearted. This goes against those who rule the children with anger, and since the heart is still soft, it is completely filled with fear and timidity, in such a way that they finally run away out of hatred against the parents, and do what they would otherwise never have done. For what is to be hoped of a man who, in mistrust and hatred of his parents, despairs of them? For this is not the apostle's opinion, that one should not anger the children or give them blows, but one should chastise them out of love, but not that the parents should vent their anger on them, in which case they care nothing how they correct the children's fault. For when a person has become petty, he becomes useless in everything, and despairs of everything, is timid in everything he does and in everything he attacks, and, what is worse, such timidity, which is implanted at a tender age, can hardly ever be eradicated afterwards. Because they have learned to be frightened at every word of their parents, they are later afraid even of a rustling tree leaf. But also the nurses are to be resisted, who frighten the children (illudunt) by terrible figures and gestures, especially at night (de nocte). With all diligence a child must be brought up to a right fear, that it may fear what must be feared, but not that it may be fearful, as it is enough for some parents, if they only have the children fearful, which is extremely harmful for the later life.

So much for the deviation to the left. But now, so that they do not miss each other on the other side, he says:

Secondly: "But bring them up in discipline and admonition to the Lord" [Eph. 6, 4.], that is, teach them what must be taught and punish them if they do not do it. For both are necessary for them, that they be taught what they do not know about God, and that they be punished if they do not follow what they have known. Therefore, see to it that the children are instructed above all in spiritual things, that they are given over to God rather than to worldly affairs. But oh, how this is all wrong now! And it is no wonder, since even the parents themselves are not instructed, nor even brought to rights (probat) by the punishment. There was still one hope left, which was based on the teachers of the schools, that at least there they would be instructed in godliness under the influence of the sciences, but this too has fallen away. All pagans, but especially the Jews, teach their children with greater diligence than the Christians. That is why the church is in a very bad way, because its whole strength is based on the offspring (successoribus); but these are neglected in their youth, like a garden in springtime.

Therefore, they must be raised up in the instruction of the Lord. But the instruction to the Lord is the one by which they are taught to know the Lord Jesus Christ, to remember vividly how he suffered for us and what he did, what he promised, as the children of Israel were commanded [Deut. 11:19], that they should make known to their children the wonders which the Lord had done for their fathers in Egypt, so that the future generation might also know [Ps. 78:4]. And if they have this knowledge, but still do not learn to love the Lord and to thank Him and to pray and to follow Christ, then the exhortation (correctionem) to the Lord must be applied, that is, the terror of the judgment of God and the threats of the wrath of God against the wicked. 1) For he who has known this from his earliest youth

1) Concerning the preceding passage, Luther remarks in the misprint: "What is said about the instruction and discipline of the Lord in the children would be better taken from the instruction and discipline which they [the parents] receive according to the way of GOD, not according to the way of the

When a person has learned the benefits of God and his promises, because of which he should love him, and the punishments and threats, because of which he should fear the Lord, he will easily hold on to them when he grows older. For in these two things the Lord wants to be worshipped, that one should love him as a father because of past, present and future benefits, and that one should fear him because of past, present and future punishments, as he says Mal. 1, 6: "Am I then Father, where is my love? Am I the Lord, where do they fear me?" In such a manner shall the children now learn to sing unto the LORD of grace and judgment [Ps. 101, 1.]. For these two things the apostle has in view, when he says, "in discipline and admonition to the LORD." To discipline belongs that you tell him [the child] how God created all things, gave him the senses, the life, the soul, assists daily with all good to what he has created; that he suffered for the child and did miracles, preached, and promised even greater things: so that he may be grateful to God for this, and recognize and love him as his father. To the punishment belongs that you tell him with how great plagues he once struck the Egyptians, the Gentiles, the Sodomites, the children of Israel, yes, also all men in Adam. Likewise, how he still strikes before our eyes with pestilence, gallows, sword, water, fire, wild animals, diseases, and how great punishments he threatens in the future in hell with the devils. And he wants them to use this rather than the punishment of men, that is, their own punishment, and not without a reason, namely, so that they learn to always look up to God, and not to fear men, but to fear God, so that they do not, when they fear the seriousness (rugas) of their parents, also finally fear men in what is God's, that is, so that they do not become fainthearted. For this is how one must act with children, not that they fear their parents, but that they know that they offend God if they do not fear their parents. For in this way they will not become fainthearted, because where they have learned, they will also know their own people and their passions, so that the children may know that they are instructed and punished by God more than by their parents)".

Parents are not to be feared in any other way than in the fear of God, nor are they to depart from God in adversity and in prosperity because of any fear or love.

That this is a sacrifice pleasing to God, if one instructs the children in this way, is clear from the first book of Moses [Cap. 18, 17-19], where the Lord could not hide from Abraham what he wanted to do. But prompted by this he says, "For I know that he will teach his children to fear the Lord." See how he says that the punishment of the LORD on Sodom through Abraham would serve to instruct his children and put them in [right] fear. In like manner, Jonadab, the father of the Rechabites, is gloriously praised and blessed in his children [Jer. 35:19.] because he had raised them devout and godly in the fear of the LORD. This is how Tobias and Jehoiakim's wife, "Susann," were raised. On the other hand, in the first book of Samuel, Cap. 3, 13, what Eli deserved by neglecting his children. Likewise, how did it go with the five-year-old boy at St. Gregory's? 1) And we are indeed exceedingly foolish. Behold, in one's own children one can earn either life or death, and yet not take care of them. For what profit is it to thee, if by thy fault thou bringest up wicked children, if thou art also blameless in thyself? Many try in a very wrong way to do a hard service to God in things he does not want to know about (alienis studiis), with fasting, wearing hard clothes and other self-chosen requirements (affectatis observantiis), and these blind people do not pass over this godly behavior any less than once the Jews who left the temple of God and sacrificed on the heights. First of all you should pay attention to what the Lord demands of you, the direction of which office he has laid upon you, as the apostle says [1 Cor. 7:20]: "Let every man continue in the profession wherein he is called." For for this, before all

1) In the Leipzig edition, Vol. I V, p. 38, it says (more explaining than translating): "So also St. Gregory writes that the evil enemy led away a father's child, which was five years old, from the womb; for he had drawn it badly, made it swear and curse 2c."

Take care of things and deal with them especially indulgences, prayer, visits to churches, or any vows.

1) It has been said how parents should behave toward their children so that they will be worthy of the name "parents" and so that parents will not become corrupters of children who will be lost along with the children. 2) Now let us see who are these corrupters and perpetrators of the children.

For the first are those who neglect their children and knowingly let them grow up without discipline and admonition to the Lord; although they harm them by no evil example, yet they corrupt them by permission, loving them too much according to the flesh and making them angry, saying: They are children, they do not understand what they are doing. And they speak the truth. But neither a dog, nor a horse, nor a mule understands what it does. But see how they go, come, do, and learn what they do not understand. But even a stone and wood does not understand how clumsy a thing it is for a house, but it is prepared by the master craftsman and understands it immediately; how much more a man? Or if other people's children understand it, why don't your children understand it? These parents will therefore bear the sins of their children, because they make them their own. Or did not that five-year-old boy, of whom St. Gregory says, also do it without understanding it?

The second are the ones who prey on them with impure words and curses, then also with evil examples and gestures. There have been people (and God wished that there were no more such people anywhere), as I know, who lived on the wages of their daughters, and at the behest of their parents, the daughters and the wife committed fornication. Who can doubt that it would have been better for these daughters if they had had robbers for parents? Then there are also such foolish people to whom it is extraordinarily-

The people of the world like it when they have warlike sons who strike easily, as if they were worthy of the highest praise for the sake of it, because they fear no one. The final reward for the foolishness of these people tends to be grief and sorrow, which befalls them through the sudden murder of their sons; and rightly so. Now children (as youth is hot-tempered) are inclined to evil desire and anger: therefore parents must beware of [evil] examples in words and gestures. For what else should the son of a curser and unchaste man learn [from him] but to curse and speak shamelessly?

The third are those who give their children the opportunity to love the world, since they are concerned about nothing else than how they walk gracefully, learn to dance round dances, clean themselves, please people, excite the evil desires, become conformed to the world. Where are the people in our time who take such great care that their children have God, as they take care that they have clothes, splendor, wealth, positions of honor, etc.? Here we meet a whole sea full of big and small worms.

Behold, what unseemly clothing (portenta vestium) this licentiousness has brought up in both sexes, especially in the women! God only protect the men that they wear nothing but a linen outer garment (peplum), because the women wear berets on the bare hair like the men. Perhaps in revenge, because the men began to wear hairnets, which were given to the women, so the women took the berets from the men. And why does the world think that this is good, but because it likes a new fashion (mos)? But consider what this is, to cover a man's head in a woman's net, and at the same time the mystery which the apostle touched [1 Cor. 11:7], because he did not want the man's head to be covered.

But first, let us make a distinction. Either such adornment is done with the will and at the behest of the men: then the women can certainly be excused, since they do it against their will, only to please the men; but I say of this, if the men are sensible and wealthy, then the women can be excused.

are; as St. Cecilia went out in a golden dress, but under it at the flesh was dressed with a hair shirt, and likewise Anastasia; likewise Esther in the old bundle (lege). Yes, St. Augustine once seriously punished a certain Editia, 1) that she had taken off her woman's clothes against the will of her husband and had put on a widow's garment. Breaking off from this, because obedience must be rendered to the husband in those things which can be done without sin, let us see how it stands with women who, against the will of their husbands, demand this expenditure, and exert a constraint on their husbands. About this do not listen to me, but to the first apostle Peter, who is appointed as a faithful shepherd over all, and 1 Pet. 3, 1-6. says: "Likewise let the wives be subject to their husbands, so that even those who do not believe in the word may be won over by the wives' conduct without the word, when they behold your chaste conduct in fear (spiritually and in heart they should be subject, that is, be subject in fear or reverence, so that they have a high opinion of them). Which adornment shall not be by heart, with braids of hair, and cloaks of gold, or putting on garments; but the hidden man of the heart unfeigned, with a gentle and quiet spirit, that is delectable in the sight of God. For so did the holy women of old adorn themselves, who put their hope in God and were subject to their husbands; as Sarah was obedient to Abraham, and called him lord, whose daughters ye became, if ye did well, and were not so timid."

This lesson is read to you, women, this Latin is given to you (as children); learn it and pay attention to it. Your bishop, pope, apostle, father, shepherd, says this and tells you to keep it. Then we will hear what he teaches the men.

And first of all, lest anyone think that in this commandment nothing should be said about women, let him know that here it is commanded to honor all human headship, as I also said before. Now the man is the head and lord of the woman, and her predecessor.

set. Likewise, however, here again all authority (potestas) is reminded that it should show itself worthy of honor. Therefore, after the children have received their instruction, yes, at the same time as their instruction, it is quite appropriate and closely connected (proxime) to speak also of the behavior of the spouses among themselves.

But see how gentle and modest, how calm and gentle the holy apostle is in his teaching. He is not stormy, he does not thunder, he does not threaten, but teaches gently and sweetly, so that even the pleasant way in which he says this should induce one to do what he teaches, let alone the benefit that the things he teaches and alone intends to teach have.

First, he wants the wives to be subject to their husbands. Paul agrees with this Col. 3, 18: "Wives, be subject to your husbands in the Lord, as is fitting"; and Eph. 5, 22. ff: "Wives be subject to their husbands, as to the Lord. For the husband is the head of the wife; even as Christ also is the head of the church, and he is the Saviour of his body," that is, not a corrupter. "But as the church is subject unto Christ, so also the wives are subject unto their husbands in all things." But in what this subjection consists he explains [1 Pet. 3, 2.] sufficiently in the following, since he praises their walk toward men in reverence and fear as useful for the salvation of men. 2) So that they are subjects, that is, that they treat the man reverently and honor him, obey him in all things. For this reason he introduces the example of Sarah, that she was subject to her husband, because she called him lord, and thereby made known her fear and reverence, and that she was ready to obey and yield to him in all things. Since Peter commands that unbelieving men be subject to him, how much more should this be done to believing men, as Paul again says, Eph. 5:33: "The woman fears her husband," i.e., she should not be subject to him.

2) Löscher: Here is a gap [?], which is to be completed from the manuscript thus: "And so right honor, spiritually understood, shows in a beautiful way just the two things mentioned above, after obedience and after reverence. St. Bernard."

behave respectfully toward him. Against this act the women, who despise their husbands, are stubborn and stiff-necked, always want to have the last word, or act without the knowledge and will of their husbands by spending money 2c. All of these are guilty of this commandment because they are not subject to their superior. For the apostle says in 1 Cor. 14:34 that the law says that women are to be subject to men. The law of Moses has this in many places, but the first law is Gen. 3, 16. the commandment of God to Eve: "Your will shall be subject to your husband, and he shall be your master." Here is the explicit provision that the man shall have dominion over the woman. Now as it is not fitting for a son to quarrel and rebel against his father, a servant against his lord, the people against their prince or priest, so it is not fitting for a wife to do so against her husband. And notice this first, for it is something great and very seldom done. This is what St. Monica did, she kept silent against her husband and gave in; but to other wives who were beaten by their husbands, she said that they should be mindful of their position, not be arrogant against their masters, since they should know from the reading of the marriage contract that they had become servants (ancillas). Therefore, a woman should either be a subject or not marry. If she does not want to have a master, let her refrain from taking a husband, for this is what God commands and decrees through the apostles and His holy Scriptures.

Conclusion.

The woman, who has a whimsical (morosum) husband, does not take it into her mind to repay like with like and to drive out violence with violence, but seeks to bring about a change by a just opposite change and a calm nature. For so the apostle teaches here [1 Pet. 3:1], "That men through the good behavior of women may be converted to the faith." But what is done for the sake of faith, that should also be done for the sake of some other lesser good. For so also Paul says in 1 Cor. 7:14: "For the unbelieving man is a man of faith.

Man is sanctified by the believing woman." For one evil is not overcome by another evil, but increased and strengthened, but it is overcome by good.

Second. Their adornment should not be by heart with hair braids or gold or dresses. But this is now mainly the adornment of Christian women and nowadays taken to the extreme (ad monstra). The apostle says that this outward adornment is appropriate for pagan women, but Christian women should have a different adornment. But who can be silent, since the abuse has risen so high?

First. I know some women (for not all of them aspire to this foolish vanity) who are forced to adorn themselves with these precious things against their will, and have a great disgust for them, like Queen Esther, Queen St. Elizabeth; and often these are just such women who live in abundance, so that they could well adorn themselves. For those who are not able to do so strive for it all the more, as is now the case with the nobles and citizens: the poorer they are in comparison to their ancestors, the more lavish they are in their expenditure. Therefore we want to say about them.

Although St. Agatha was of noble birth, she walked not only with a veil, like a woman, but even in the dress of a slave, and since she was censured for this, she boasted that she was a handmaid of Christ, as is evident from her legend.

And first of all I do not know whether I should punish the men or the women more, or at least the authorities of the cities, that they allow the women such things, whereby their property is damaged with knowledge and will. For why do the authorities [here] not give laws as is done elsewhere? Or why does not the husband keep his wife in check, since he is her master? Or if he bears this willingly, how can he wonder at the impositions of princes? And take heed, if you do not change, the treasure will not cease, but will increase. I want to assure you that when this one is over, another greater one will come, because you have challenged and are still challenging God. Doesn't an honorable woman have to be ashamed of herself?

meu that she has such precious veils and sheaths (calyptras) that a moderate citizen could maintain his entire household with them? But what shall I say of the garments and the exceedingly costly abuse of silk, purple, gold and silver? And it is certainly a more tolerable pity to make of them silver basting, chains and rings, than to make of gold hoods, nets and fringes, of silk fabrics, embroideries and damask; for these things are consumed by use, those remain serviceable, though they are not useful at present.

But I don't know what to say about the new profit or damage masters who build fancy machines with wheels to press (plananda) veils and other linen, so that the veils come to eighteen to twenty guilders, but the pressing machine to forty to fifty: could the lightning shatter the wheels prepared for St. Catharine and can not also hit these quite vain and worldly machines?

But all these are signs that we dislike the inner adornment, which we would not dislike so much if we did not like the outer adornment so much. It is easy for a respectable woman to despise the outward adornment, when she is after the inward adornment; one cannot take care of both adornments in the same way.

Therefore, the time of the synagogue has now come again, which Isaiah Cap. 3, 16-24 with these words: "Therefore the daughters of Zion are proud, and walk with their necks erect, and with their faces made up, and they walk, and are truant, and have fine shoes upon their feet: so shall the LORD make the crown of the head of the daughters of Zion bald, and the LORD shall take away their jewels. Zu der Zeit wird der HErr den Schmuck an den köstlichen Schuhen wegnehmen, und die Hefte, die Spangen, die Kettlein, die Armspangen, die Hauben, die Flittern, die Gebräme, die Schnurlein, die Biesemäpfel, die Ohrenspangen, die Ringe, die Haarbänder, die Feierkleider, die Mäntel, die Schleier, die Beutel, die Spiegel, die Koller, die Borten, die Kittel; and shall be stench for good smell, and a loose ribbon for a girdle, and a bald head for a frizzy hair, and for a loose coat a tight one.

Sack" 2c. Behold, how many and how great splendor of women he has gathered together; forty-one ornaments are not enough for a woman! Who should not be afraid to take a wife? Do not both the Greeks and the Latins call with a very good word the woman adornment the world?

1) Because this collection of all kinds of things makes a kind of world. Read also Theophrastus, St. Jerome against Jovinian, and Plautus in the Aulularia, and you will see that a woman, if left to her will, has an insatiable desire for adornment; therefore the same must not be satisfied, but restrained with all one's strength.

And what does a respectable woman or virgin do that she desires with such great zeal to become like the whores? Or what do you seek with such great adornment? Do you want to attract the hearts of strange men to you? Or do you want to make it known that you do not like chastity? Do you wish to become a whore? Why do you seek to please someone other than your husband? Who should not think this desire to please suspicious? A woman pleases enough and more than enough when she is so adorned that she pleases her husband: for she is to please him alone; to him she is given and subject.

Likewise also the virgins. Why do they foolishly seek to please young men? Do you not think that he will be deterred from marrying you if he thinks that he will be forced to clean you at such great expense when he has married you? If you want to captivate a young man by love, listen to very good advice: be demure, little preened, speak few words and do not stare him in the face. The greatest adornment of a virgin and a woman is a demure restraint, for this appeals and captivates the hearts of men more than all adornment. Moreover, such behavior makes marriage firm, while carnal love, which has been awakened by adornment, soon produces weariness after marriage, because marriage is not based on good manners, but on vain adornment. Do so, and you will be (also with God's blessing) rather get a husband than the most frivolous wasters of goods, who are quite similar to the wolves and harlots of whom the 144th Psalm, v. 12. says: "Their daughters are like the hewn out oriels, like the palaces", that is, splendidly adorned before others, as a palace stands out before other houses, is adorned and is seen 2c.

<sup>1</sup>) It has been said how a woman should behave towards a man, so that she honors him as her superior according to this commandment, namely by twofold service (cultu), namely obedience and reverence, that she has a willing heart to do his will, then also honors him from the heart by thinking highly of him. But if she asks how she can hold in honor a man who is shapeless, morose (morusus - to whom nothing can be done right) and not even worthy of love, let alone honor, I answer, as I said of the parents, that one should look at God in him, because it pleased God that the man should be his (ejus - God's) and represent his (ejus) place, as the apostle says [1 Cor. 11, 7.], "The man is GOtte's image and GOtte's glory, but the woman is the man's glory." Therefore he need not displease her, because she sees that he has pleased and pleases GOtte. It is a great dignity of the man that he has a part in God's name and office; therefore he should be honored by the woman, because God is the man of the whole church and of the soul. This exceedingly great mystery is also the reason why the woman should honor, fear and listen to the man. So turn your eye from the flesh and recognize and serve God in your husband, and it will be easy for you to honor him.

But on the other hand, it must now be said that the men should also prove themselves worthy of the name of a man and a superior. St. Peter continues in the above-mentioned passage [1 Petr. 3, 7.]: "In the same way, you men, dwell with them with reason, and give the female, as the weakest instrument, its honor, as well as fellow men.

1) Löscher: "The following was preached by Luther on the day of St. Martin [November 11, 1516." The exordium is found in Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. XII, 1774.

inherit the grace of life, so that your prayer may not be hindered."

First of all, he teaches men not to dwell with their wives only, but with reason, that is, not according to passion and only according to the sensuality of pleasure, making no distinction between a wife and a whore; for so also do the beasts and the heathen dwell with one another. He therefore instructs the man's eye how to look at his wife, not with the eye of evil desire, but of reason and knowledge. 2) By reason, the man is to know and recognize two things about his wife, according to God's command. First, he says: "as the weakest instrument" (vasculo), secondly: "as also joint heirs" the wives are to be held by them. And so he explains himself what he wants to be understood by "dwelling with them with reason", namely, that the man recognizes the woman as a very weak vessel, and nevertheless holds her in honor as a co-heiress of grace, and not as if he had her to atone for his lust (in passione desiderii). Let us explain this further.

You men should know that the woman is a weaker vessel (vasculum) than the man, therefore you should live with them according to this knowledge (scientiam). "Vessel" he calls her after the body and after the soul. For man also is a vessel after the same manner, but a stronger one. For as the woman has a more tender body, so also a more tender mind; therefore honor shall be shown to her by the stronger men. We are all called "vessels" because the soul dwells in the body as in a vessel.

But this honor of the instrument (vasculi) is the honor given to the body of the woman, which consists in nothing else than to love one's wife with a chaste love, as it is said in 1 Thess. 4:4, 5: "That every one of you may know to keep his barrel in sanctification and honor, and not in lust (passione desiderii), as the heathen do, who know nothing of God," that is, to withdraw from one's wife and to give up one's wife.

2) Here we have followed the reading of the manuscript: "eoMitioni" instead of coAitatioiis in the editions.

evil desire is not enough. For sanctification is this chastity.

But in teaching this, the apostle Peter, in a covert way, wanted to commend (commendare) their wives to the men, that they should have patience with them. As it were with a very short word (epitheto) he takes up the patience of the men (tangit) by saying: "to the female, as the weakest instrument", 1) as if he wanted to say: She is a woman, she is weak, she is an instrument, in that she has a very noble soul. Knowing this, give them honor for their sake, then also for your sake, so that your prayer may not be hindered. For who will come to prayer, or even do anything honorable, through the desire (passiones) of evil? For prayer requires most strongly that the heart turn away from the lusts of the flesh. But since the woman is a very weak instrument, she must also be carried and her guilt overlooked, and she must not always be punished harshly for trivial things, as some men who are too impetuous perform a tragedy for the smallest cause. As the Psalmist [Ps. 130:3] says to the Lord, "If thou wilt, O Lord, impute sin, O Lord, who shall stand?" So it is impossible for peace to be kept in a household between husband and wife, if one does not credit and overlook anything to the other, but pays attention to everything down to the smallest detail. For who does not sometimes give offense? Therefore, many things must be overlooked, many things must be ignored, so that a peaceful relationship can exist. This is why a man should keep his wife chaste, because she is the weaker instrument, that is, because of her tenderer body and softer mind; secondly, and much more, because she is the co-heiress of such a great grace; thirdly, and most of all, so that the blessedness of men themselves is not hindered. Behold, what a powerful and mighty exhortation!

In a similar way the apostle Paul says Eph. 5, 25. 33.: "Husbands, love your wives, just as Christ also loved the

And: "Let every man love his wife as himself; but let the woman fear the man," that is, she should honor him and have a reverent awe of him (revereatur). He has beautifully distinguished: "the man loves", "the woman fears", both in a chaste way; the chaste love should condescend, the chaste fear should soar; the subordinate owes this to the superior, the superior to the subordinate. And Col. 3, 19. He says: "Husbands, love your wives and do not be bitter against them", that is, as I said above, they should not be too much after them and not take every opportunity to scold them.

How did Christ love the church? Worse, in a spiritual way. Although he could not find anything in her that he could love, but only what he had to hate in her, he nevertheless gave himself up for her and sanctified her 2c. Thus, if a man finds something in his wife that is not at all lovable, he must change himself and offer himself, that is, he must abandon his desires that are not fulfilled because of his wife's fault, so that in this way he looks only at what is lovable in her, and purifies her to himself in such a way that he presents her to himself without a blemish. This does not happen, as I have said, unless he overcomes evil with good, and learns to love even that which is not lovable, so that it becomes lovable by becoming different, or he himself changes. For since all things are indifferentes, they can be loved as well as hated, depending on the change of the mind; as, the honor of the world, although it remains the same, is loved and hated by the same man, depending on whether he turns away from it or turns toward it. And this is the best kind of change, where not the thing and the object, but the direction of the will (potentia) is changed, because this is something permanent. This change is found among Christians and at the right hand of the Most High, but among worldly people it is only the search for change of objects.

But that's enough about that. Now about the household.

"You shall honor your father and your mother." That under the father also the house

1) "In the Erlanger Ausgabe fund nur in dieser] ist hier der Text so wiedergegeben, wie ihn im Druckfehlerverzeichnis der ersten Ausgabe ausdrücklich verworfen hat." (Weim. Ausg.)

Lord is understood from 2 Kings 5:13, where the servants of Naaman called him Father. This is where the name father of the house comes from. Therefore, the servants must honor their masters in the same way as indicated above, namely with spiritual honor inwardly [in the heart], ready to obey them and to think highly of them for the sake of the Lord, whose name and office they see shining in them, whose expressed will this also is, as it is 1 Petr. 2:18, "Ye servants, be subject (behold, this is obedience) with all fear (behold, this is reverent conduct) unto masters, not only to kind and gentle, but also to whimsical," that is, to those who are hard to deal with, bad, sullen, unreasonable, hard 2c. Although the apostle is speaking here of bonded servants, not hired ones, the same commandment applies to them. Therefore, servants who embezzle their masters' goods with intent and will are to be regarded no differently than thieves, and are required to make restitution, for they receive their wages so that they may be faithful. But now the whole world has great lamentation over the servants. Therefore let them mark this commandment with all diligence; for this is not to honor masters by calling them masters, but by being obedient to them from the heart and fearing them.

And with this word the apostle comforts the servants who complain about their masters, that they are wicked and strange, that is, that they cannot get along with them (difficiles), by saying [1 Petr. 2, 19. 20.]: "For this is grace, if someone for the sake of conscience bears with God the evil and suffers the wrong. For what glory is this, if ye suffer strokes for iniquity?" And Paul says Col. 3, 22-24: "Servants, be obedient in all things to your physical masters, not with service in mind, but to please men, but with simplicity of heart and fear of God. Whatsoever ye do, do it heartily, as unto the Lord, and not unto men: and know that of the Lord ye shall receive the recompence of the inheritance: for ye serve the Lord Christ." Behold, how beautifully the apostle draws this commandment to the spiritual mind, that lords from the heart are to be honored because they do not serve the lords but the Lord in them. If I said this out so aridly, no one would believe it. But there follows also the consolation for the servants, as in Peter, saying [Col. 3, 25.], "But he that doeth wrong shall receive that which he hath wronged (see how he seeketh to persuade them to patience), and counteth no respect of persons in the sight of GOD." That is, do not be troubled that they are masters, but you are servants; it is all the same with God; whoever does good or evil will receive his reward. He says the same thing in Eph. 6, 5-8: "You servants, be obedient to your physical masters with fear and trembling, in simplicity of heart, as to Christ; not with service alone in mind, as to please men, but as the servants of Christ (that is, because you thus serve 1) Christ), that you do such will of God from the heart, with good will. Let it seem to you that you serve the Lord, and not men (for in this you do not the will of men, but the will of God, and serve God); and know that whatsoever good thing any man shall do, that shall he receive of the Lord, whether he be a servant or a freeman." And Tit. 2, 9. 10.: "To the servants (set thyself as an example), that they be subject to their masters, doing in all things to please, not barking back, not embezzling, but showing all good faithfulness, that they may adorn the doctrine of GOD our Savior in all things."

On the other hand, the masters should not show themselves to be tyrants, because, as said above, it is impossible for a servant not to omit or commit something once in a while; many things must be overlooked in a good servant. For if they are to show obedience and reverence, masters must also show kindness and benevolence. Hence it is said in Eph. 6:9, "And know that your Lord also is in heaven, and with him is no respect of person." For who can serve such a man, from whom nothing is heard but reproach and scolding, and who is always ranting?

This also includes other wage earners and craftsmen, as manual laborers, masons, carpenters and other such people, about whom and about whose disloyalty tMrrall is great complaint; for high wages they are hired, but they are lazy at work, and for the most part they cheat the masters whom they serve, and, unfortunately, they make no conscience about it, as if they were not openly robbers and thieves of other people's property, which they receive illegally, while they do not do enough work for it.

Finally, the bishops and the princes, the priests in the villages (plebani) and the town councillors (in the cities), in general the authorities in spiritual and temporal government (utrumque dominium) belong here, who are to be feared very much, because they carry the sword of the Lord, whom everyone should be careful not to contradict, because the law says [2 Mos. 22, 28.): "You shall not blaspheme the ruler of your people," and again: "You shall not curse the gods. And, alas, one is nowhere more at hand with disparaging speeches than with these; there is no fear of GOD, who exercises the regiment in them (Rom. 13, 1.): "For all authority is from GOD," and though they esteem and oppress the peasants, or their citizens, or the priests, yet one must bear them, not unlike the hand of the LORD, which oppresses us because of our sin and failings. Since these people, because of the (little) power they have, cannot harm with works, they harm with words; therefore the law commands that one should not speak degradingly of them nor blaspheme them, for that would be to judge one's superior, which is quite contrary to order. But the more their (the rulers') life is clearly revealed, the more it is judged and blamed, but not in a Christian way (catholice), yes, even in contradiction to the right doctrine ([minus] orthodox).

To resolve.

The Jews have abrogated this commandment, since they, in order to indulge their avarice, taught [Matth. 15, 5.]: "The sacrifice (munus) that is offered by me is useful to you", that is, if I offer the gift for you, it is more useful to you than if I give it to you. But even now this foolishness prevails everywhere, in that the

the same avarice of the priests is going on, so that people are more attached to dead stones and wood and with a more willing heart than they give to their own parents and to their living neighbor. Therefore (as I have often said), so that we may not be accused of forgetting the law of God in utterly vain Jewish hypocrisy, let us first honor the commandment of God, and honor it in such a way that we accomplish and understand it spiritually, that is, that we first and foremost use these outward goods, be it body or possessions (for God has no need of them, nor has He spoken a word in the first commandments about offering them to Him, as He says in Jeremiah Cap. 7, 22), serve parents if they are poor, then relatives, then also the poor and needy; finally, we should lend or give for free to all neighbors and believers who need it, but not behave in such a way that we pass them by (as this nonsensical behavior is now commonplace), and decorate churches and in them pictures, blankets, utensils in the most precious way. This should be the last thing and should be done with moderation, because it is not necessary. For we suffer from a lack of necessities because we procure superfluous things. For it is not necessary that we should be careful of superfluous things, since so many things are necessary to salvation that no one is able to accomplish them. Otherwise, if these things were necessary for salvation, how would the poor be saved who do not have them?

But now, in these wretched times, people insist on these things as if they were necessary and belonged only to the service of God, since they are given to men for comfort, and God has no need of them, but man does: nevertheless, in wonderful blindness, they are not given to men, but to God. And there are men who say, We know that GOD hath no need of these things; but they answer not when thou sayest unto them, Why then givest thou these things to GOD, who desireth them not, and deprivest them from the brother that needeth them, contrary to the will of GOD, who commandeth [to help the brother]? And let this be enough of this commandment.

The fifth commandment.

You shall not kill.

<sup>1)</sup> It has been said of the commandments which refer to GOD, both to Himself and to those who are in His stead. Now the following six refer to the neighbor. And behold the admirable and fitting order. For forbidding begins with the greatest and progresses to the least. For the greatest harm is when a man is killed; next is when his spouse is dishonored (violation); third is when his goods are taken from him. Now those who cannot do harm in these things at least do harm with their tongues; therefore the fourth is doing harm to his good name. If they are not guilty of any of these things, they are at least too close to their neighbor in heart by coveting what is his. This is what envy actually consists in; let us now take these before us. Such progress is also in the first four commandments. For the greatest is when one rejects God in heart, mouth, and works; then, when one at least? uselessly uses with the mouth the name that one confesses with the heart and mouth; finally, when one does not honor with works the one whom one honors with heart and mouth, and finally, when one despises him in his representatives. Although this is the least of the first four, it is greater than the others that follow it, because [by the transgression of the latter] it is not exactly (proprie) God who is affected, but man and his neighbor.

But this commandment, as well as all others, the Pharisees have drawn to the letter, as if no one would go against it.

who did not kill another with his own hand. This is how they taught and this is how they lived. That they taught in this way is clear from all the prophets. Therefore also the Psalmist, who sees that they taught only the outward works, but not moved by heart reasons, by displeasure about it, says in the 19th Psalm [v. 2]: "The heavens tell the glory of God and the firmament proclaims the work of his hands", as if he wanted to say: These people teach only works of men, not the works of GOD. Hence it comes that they pervert the law of God, which is without change and refreshes souls [Ps. 19:8], but those convert only the hands. And the reason is that the law is spiritual. And here it is to be noted that when the law is called "spiritual," this is not understood to mean that it is to be understood according to spiritual interpretation (mystice), like the figures and mysteries (mysteria). For "spiritual" is something different, depending on whether it is understood by spiritual interpretation (mysticum) or by spiritual things (spirituale). But it [the law] is called spiritual (spiritualis) because it is fulfilled by the Spirit alone and requires the Spirit, that is, if it is not fulfilled from the heart with a cheerful will, it is not fulfilled. But such a spirit is not in us, but is given by the grace of the Holy Spirit, which makes people who desire the law of the Lord. Therefore, when one hears any law commanding this or that, one must always think and understand that it commands to do such things with pleasure, that is, freely, without fear of punishment, and with a cheerful heart. Since this is not in us, it is immediately understood that the law compels us to go to grace so that it may be fulfilled. Thus it is said in the first Psalm, v. 2: "But have pleasure in the law of the Lord." But those who understand "spiritual" in such a way that "according to spiritual interpretation" (mysticum) and "spiritual" (spirituale) are the same, must also understand the holy ten commandments not spiritually (spiritualem), but only the ceremonies of the law, since no commandment has a spiritual interpretation.

1) Löscher: "Luther preached the following on the 24th Sunday after Trinity in 1816. This information will not be correct. The 24th Sunday after Trinity is November 2. Now, however, this piece stands between the sermons of November 11 and 30; therefore, it is probably to be placed on the 26th Sunday after Trinity, November 16. (Weim. Ausg.)

(mysticum) in the Decalogue. And thereby they contradict the apostle, who says Rom. 7, 14: "The law is spiritual", and yet he speaks of the law in the holy ten commandments, as the text explicitly indicates. Therefore, spiritual interpretation (mysticum) and spirituals (Spirituals) differ, like higher and lower. Everything spiritual (Spirituals) is mysterious (mysticum), but not vice versa. For the spiritual (spirituale) is nothing other than what is a living will to do or not to do something, or means the same. But the mysterious (mysticum) often means external actions (operationes), as the sacrifice of a sparrow means the mortification of the flesh. But this still belongs to the letter, although it is a secret interpretation (mystica), because it can happen without spirit and willingness, because often also the commandments of the Gospel are kept according to the letter out of fear, and not willingly, although the right life according to the Gospel consists in doing the commandments with pleasure and gladly, and whoever lives otherwise does not live according to the Gospel, but according to the letter of the law.

Therefore, those who understand by spiritual understanding and teaching of the Spirit the gospel itself, and that according to the outward works, are almost Pelagians, for such works are also done by the ungodly, but the works of the gospel have their name not from their outward but from their inward. Therefore they are hidden works; though they shine outwardly, yet the will is hidden. For the same reason they are also called the works of God, because they are works of grace and of the Spirit, since man does not have this will of his own accord, and for this reason neither do the works themselves. Now these works are frequently mentioned in Scripture, and the works of men are severely punished because, although they are similar to right works, they are not right works, because they are not done with pleasure and in vain, but always have either the fear of punishment or the desire for benefit in mind (pro fine). For this is how the Jews lived and taught, as I have said. For when they brought Christ to Pilate, they would not kill him, lest they should sin, but should overthrow him.

answered him that he might be slain. So Saul also said [1 Sam. 18:17] of David, "My hand shall not be on him," and delivered him into the hands of the Philistines, as if he were innocent because he did not kill him with his hand but with his heart.

About this Christ says Matth. 5, 20: "Unless your righteousness is better than that of the scribes and Pharisees, you will not enter the kingdom of heaven." And why is that? Because they took the law according to the words and according to the sound of the letters, that is, not according to the intention of the Lawgiver. Therefore he says [v. 21.], "Ye have heard that it was said unto the ancients," as if to say, It is "said," but not understood; they have heard the words only, but the understanding they have not known; therefore they have lived according to the letter, and all this because they were old men of the flesh, children of Adam, earthly. "But I say unto you" [v. 22.]. Which "you?" Worse, not "to the old," but to the new, heavenly, Christians, spiritual I say spiritually. Therefore, let us hear how Christ interprets this law spiritually, and we will see how many kinds of people sin against this commandment.

Now the first are those who prove their wrath by the deed, who kill according to the letter and by the deed, of whom the Lord says [Matth. 5, 21. Vulg.]: "But he who kills is guilty of judgment (judicio)", or rather, he is guilty of judgment, or "to the court", in the dative (in dandi casu), for being delinquent against the court. This is easily understood by all, but it must be noted that under this work are also included all those who have called for it, have given cause for the murder by advice, assistance or in any other way, or have been comrades and participants.

The second are those who prove their anger with words, of which the Lord says [Matth. 5, 22.]: "Whoever says to his brother, You fool, is guilty of hellish fire." But by the word, "Thou fool," are understood all those curses, invectives, and blasphemies which proceed from well-considered anger. For although such people do not

They say such things about him that he would die in any case if this were to happen. For how could he live if the devil took him, if the pestilence killed him, if the thunderstorm (fulmen) struck him? yes, sometimes they even go so far as to wish the death of the soul on him, saying: "That the infernal fire may consume you! But Christ uses a milder word, "You fool," so that we may understand what is the matter with those who curse more harshly, out of a fierce (plena) anger that desires the destruction of the one it curses.

The third are those who vent their anger with gestures. Of them the Lord says [Matth. 5, 22.): "Whoever says to his brother, Racha, is guilty of counsel." By this are understood all other signs which arise from the same deadly anger, as there are, turning one's back on him, not greeting him or thanking him, expressing oneself with joyful words over his misfortune, expressing regret over his welfare, from which the philosopher [Aristotle] in the second book of Ethics has made the goddess (virtutem) Nemesis. For Christ uses here a very small sign, so that he would give reason to make a right judgment about the predicted, yes, because the spirit expresses the malice of men only weakly (parce) and with restraint, but wants it to be understood deeply. At least the word "Racha", if I may say my judgment, seems to me to be common even in all languages; for even we, when we are indignant, bring forth with a certain snarling of the throat, as it were [the growling] of a dog: "arch" or "räch". For such a snarling and rough sound of the throat, I think, the Lord intended to signify by this expression, and let it be what others interpret as an exclamation of one indignant. For, as is known, there is no exclamation word that expresses indignation, and more violently, than "rach" or "rarch". Therefore, although such a man does not kill either by word or by deed, he expresses this, moved by anger, by a sign by which he expresses his wish that he be destroyed (non esse); thus he kills by a sign.

The fourth are those who are angry in heart (affectu); and this stage is the cause why what the [three] above do is sin; if it did not take place, it would not be sin even if it did and could take place (for the movement of anger is the head and life of anger, which is manifested in words, signs, and works; without these it would not be anger); of these the Lord says [Matth. 5:22], "He that is angry with his brother is guilty of judgment." For though they kill not with works, words, and signs, yet they do it with the heart. Of these John says in his first epistle (Catholica) [Cap. 3, 15.], "He that hateth his brother is a slayer of death." Why? Because he does not grant him life, but death; therefore, as far as the heart is concerned, he is a slayer of his brother before God.

Therefore, this commandment is a very deep one, and there is no one who can fulfill it without grace, because there is no one who does not have someone to be angry with when he examines himself rightly. Otherwise the Lord's Prayer would be false, which says, "As we forgive our debtors." For without love it is impossible that this commandment should not be transgressed, for a man either loves his neighbor or hates him. But some people have now arisen who want to take a middle position in this (neutral), who say that one can be such that one neither loves nor hates; but I advise you not to trust these people.

Therefore, whoever wants to fulfill this commandment, let him strive in every way to love every man with a sweet affection, yes, let him ask the Lord for the grace of love, and do not flatter himself in vain that he does not hate anyone; for this must be a very gentle and humble man who does not sin in this commandment. For the anger in the spirit (spiritualis), which is forbidden in this movement of the mind (affectu), is so deep that even if it does not appear in signs or words, it may live inwardly in the strongest possible way. Of these says Isaiah Cap. 29, 15 [Vulg.]: "Woe to you who have an ambush in your heart (profundi corde) and whose works are in darkness."

But there is also another spiritual

Anger, and a good one at that, which is called "zeal for God". For if the Lord had not also wanted to indicate that there is a good zeal, he would have said without any closer definition (absolute): "Whoever is angry"; but now he says: "Whoever is angry with his brother", so that he does not contradict himself, since he says [Luc. 14, 26.]: "Whoever [does not] 1) hate his own life" in this world 2c. Therefore anger and hatred which one has against himself is something exceedingly noble; of which elsewhere.

So this explanation of the Lord about this commandment is sufficient for us; only that it moves many, why the Lord has kept this order, that he has transferred the simple anger to the court, "Racha" to the council, "you fool" to the hellish fire. For this is easily recognized, that under "judgment," since the law says, "But he that killeth shall be guilty of judgment," these things are all three comprehended in the spirit, as the Lord himself interprets the law; so that, as in the word, "Thou shalt not kill," is comprehended the forbidding of all wrath, so under the word "judgment" is comprehended all the punishment of wrath. Why then does he now distinguish "judgment" from "council" and "hell"? First of all, Lyra thinks that the text has been rearranged, since it seems that "Rath" should have been placed before the punishment. St. Augustine says in the first book "on the Sermon on the Mount" (de ser[mone] do[mini in monte]): that an order of gravity (gravitatis) is indicated here in the punishment, as it is also in the order of guilt; but how this happens invisibly in the souls, one cannot say. Thus he leaves it undiscussed (incognitum), and asserts only this, that by those stages an ever heavier sentence is expressed. For in court, there is still an opportunity to defend oneself; in council, however, the person found guilty is discussed as to what punishment he should be given; in hell, however, there is a certain and fixed condemnation of the guilty person. This judicial process expresses the severity of the various crimes. But since St. Augustine did not specify how these are punished, he also says, that this cannot be stated, so I will also refrain from stating this explicitly. For if the Lord had wanted to designate different punishments by these levels, so that the one guilty of judgment would not be guilty of judgment or hell, it follows that mortal hatred would not be guilty of hellish fire, nor would cursing and detracting [from one's neighbor], which is quite wrong. Yes, it would follow that the one who kills with the work deserves a worse punishment than the infernal fire, because this is the worst and heaviest of the three, while there is no worse punishment.

Therefore - may it be granted me to present my thoughts without presumption - there is for these four degrees all at once, or may there be still more degrees of the death stroke, also in the work (which is certainly true, because he commits a more serious murder who kills his father and his mother or his wife than another man), only One punishment, namely the eternal damnation and the infernal fire, which however is imposed in different degrees, what is indicated by these differences of degrees. For as he is farther from punishment and slower to punishment who is tried only in temporal things, so he is slower, that is, less severe and more easily punished in hell, who has been only angry. For what in time is slowness or swiftness, in eternity is aggravation or mitigation. Yes, slowness and swiftness in bodily things arise from the strain and slackening of spiritual things, as is seen in fiery and sluggish souls, 2) some of which accomplish much in a short time, others very little in a long time. For a slack soul does little, while a tense soul does much. So also, just as he who is guilty of counsel is nearer to his punishment (malo) than he who is guilty of judgment, and yet farther than he who is guilty of hell, so he who is guilty of hell is nearer to his punishment (malo) than he who is guilty of judgment.

1) non is in the Vulgate, but is missing in all editions.

2) It seems to us that instead of uniuMipus 1 in all editions) should be read: auirabus. Because immediately follows uuiua. It is also difficult to believe that Luther should have opposed the "bodily things" (oorporulibus) to the animals as "spiritual things" (spiritualia).

The one who is guilty [of the council] will be punished more severely in hell than the one who is guilty [of the court]; but the one who is guilty of hell will have no more respite, that is, he will be punished exceedingly severely and not leniently. But he that killeth, and worse than killeth, shall without doubt be punished most severely. This I want to have said in such a way that I have not asserted anything but certain truth.

But there are some who are secretly hopeful, who certainly imagine that they are not guilty of this commandment, because they do not kill, are not angry, and are not aware of any hatred; this is possible and may be true. But therefore they must not think that they are justified and have exhausted and fulfilled this commandment to the bottom. For the law is without change [Ps. 19:8], and is purified in fire, and proved seven times [Ps. 12:7]. Therefore let no one boast that he does not sin in anger against his brother until he feels so meek and peaceful that, even if everything and his life were taken from him, he would not be angry with the one who took it from him, and would not feel anger if it happened that way. O how great and profound a word is this! It is easy not to be angry with the peaceable and with those who do you no harm; so do the heathen, so do the animals, yes, even the wild animals. What a glorious glory of righteousness is this, that thou art not angry with peaceable men! But if money, house, father, mother, brother, sister, son, fields, the members of the body and even life are taken from you, see if you can not only not be angry, but also be happy and praise God and be kind and favorable to those who do this. If you can do this, then thank God, because you have God's grace. But if you find yourself unable to do so, know that the old ingrained anger, the spiritual will to kill, is still hidden in you. For the law forbids this and fights it; therefore grace is necessary here, which the law forces you to seek, after you have recognized the impossibility [of helping yourself] through it in such a way.

Now you say to me: Must man then be so pure that he should not even have the will to be angry at all the evil that is done to him? I answer, "Only so pure, because nothing impure will enter the kingdom of heaven [Revelation 21:27]. For as long as this will remains in us, which breaks out in anger as soon as an occasion presents itself, we are unclean. Therefore, man must become so pure that he (as I have said) not only does not become angry, but also [Matth. 5, 44.] blesses those who curse him, is kind to those who persecute him, thanks God in adversity, and desires even more adversity, so that he hates only sin and not punishment, as it is said [Song of the Three Men, v. 70], "Light and darkness, praise the Lord," and [Ps. 34:2], "I will praise the Lord always; his praise shall be in my mouth forever." Therefore, that the [false] saints of the Jews have not been such people, it has been said of them in the 8th Psalm, v. 3. "Destroy the enemy and the avenger." Therefore I have said that the law is spiritual; for he who understands this commandment otherwise understands it in a Jewish way and according to the letter, and his righteousness is no better than the righteousness of the Pharisees.

Therefore, St. Augustine in the first book "On the Sermon on the Mount" sets six levels in this commandment. The first level is: Do harm, even if you have not been harmed. This is the highest injustice. The second is: To do more harm than has been done to you, which is close to the law of Moses [2nd book, 21, 12. f.]. The third is: Damage as much as you have been damaged. This is how far the law of Moses went, which says [Ex. 21, 24.]: "Tooth for tooth, eye for eye." For this law allows something (donat), because according to all laws the injurer is worth a greater punishment than the one who has done no harm (innocens). The fourth is: If one has damaged you, and you do not do as much damage as you have "suffered". The fifth is: that you do not harm again at all when you have been harmed. This comes close to the commandment of the Lord, but not yet complete. The sixth is: that when you have been harmed, you be prepared to be harmed still more; that is to say (Matth. 5, 39.): "to offer the other cheeks also". See, then, how he wants anger to be eradicated from the bottom up, so that a man not only does not get angry, but also desires to be harmed; for such a man is pure. Do you, who hear this, not think of the word of the Psalm [Ps. 119, 96. Vulg.], "Your commandment extends exceedingly far"? Now if someone is not harmed by another, it is necessary for him to harm himself, and to vent his anger against himself through many repentances. Therefore nothing is better than that each one, just as he is commanded to love his neighbor as himself, should also hate his neighbor as himself, so that everything may be put in its proper form.

Therefore, the inclination to anger (vis irascibilis), which is killed and completely eradicated (mortificatur) by this commandment, is itself an enemy of the cross of Christ. Therefore, because she is a murderer and kills, she must not only be wounded, but completely killed and exterminated, and the right of retribution must be exercised against her. For he who kills shall be killed. But it is killed by this law, that is, it is indicated that it should be killed, but grace alone kills it in fact. But when it is killed, man becomes kind, patient, gentle, ready to love any enemies and to do them good, to be happy in tribulations. All this prevents that impatient and crude inclination to anger. Oh how few are careful about it; they are sure and rely on their other good works, and do not know how spiritual and undefiled the law of the Lord is.

So the one who loves the cross of the Lord and boasts of it is the one who does not kill and is not angry. For this is the real difference between good and evil spiritual anger, that evil anger is angry only because of the evil of punishment, but good anger only because of the evil of guilt, and therefore dislikes and hates himself so much because of sins, loves all other people, and hates no one because of the goods that have been taken from him.

But, you say, if this were so, no one would be blessed, or only a very few. I answer: That is why I said that the Law is very spiritual, and therefore one must strive to fulfill it in such a way. It is also no wonder that few become blessed; but therefore one should not despair, for what is impossible for us is possible for God, as the Lord says Luc. 18, 27: "What is impossible with men is possible with God." This is what I have said, the law, rightly and spiritually understood, terrifies man and compels him, after he has been humbled, to take refuge in grace, and, despairing of himself, to lift up his eyes to heaven and say [Ps. 123, 1.], "I lift up mine eyes unto thee that sitteth in heaven," 2c., and again [Ps. 121, 1.], "I lift up mine eyes unto the mountains from whence cometh my help." For here there is no escape; for there it must come to pass with man that he may be so pure, whether this be in life, or in death, or in purgatory. Therefore do not be hopeful [and do not mean] that you do not sin, if you still feel that you are angry because of temporal things, because you are not yet in the spirit, righteous with Christ, but in the flesh, and have to do with Mosaic things.

But what I have said of this commandment is to be understood by all in the same way. For every commandment is spiritual, without change, reliable, tried, purified seven times, though it is seldom interpreted as the 12th Psalms complains of such people. Therefore, St. Jerome rightly said that the [ε "φ] which is in the Greek, "He who is angry with his brother without a cause," must be erased, for, as he says, every occasion for anger is abolished in this commandment, and that word is an addition, for it is not found in the right books.

But it is objected: You speak of the perfect, but not all imperfect are condemned. I answer: This is true. There are degrees in this and every other commandment, as the Lord has distinguished four degrees in this Gospel, and St. Augustine, as we have seen, six. For the first is that you do not kill with your works,

1) Weimar edition (as well as Walch): "Ps. 12, 7." This citation is wrong, because the whole psalm is about the given matter, only the seventh verse is not.

After that 1) you must go on, so that you also do not do it with words, and further not with signs, finally also not with the heart. Now if you also want to live meritoriously (mereri), then you must also gladly desire adversity and bear it with joy. I know that one does not have to be perfect all at once, but that one climbs up gradually. But at last one must become perfect, and always strive to advance, and not stand still, and be satisfied with any of the aforesaid stages, as many do, who sin more grievously by not advancing than others by not beginning, because those are proud of their righteousness begun.

Therefore, it often happens that the worst sinners and prostitutes, in deep repentance, soon become so perfect that they fly out to the highest level, ready to lose everything and endure with joy, while others, who toil for many years, do not yet reach the second level. If you should now say: This is not to be wondered at, that great sinners have such deep repentance [, I say against it]: Behold, behold, here I hear. thee, thou Pharisee; thou art not a great sinner, thou art not like other people, thou hast found thy ways good, and thy blindness is all too deep and wide, as if by this hopefulness thou wert not worse than all these.

Therefore, one must always be careful to kill not only the wrath, but also the tinder of wrath itself, and the whole Adam, the tree with the fruit and the root. "For the wrath of man doeth not that which is right in the sight of God" [Jac. 1:20]. For the commandments of God are not to be learned merely so that you know how to make your confession, for this tinder does not belong to confession, but only the works; nor is it taken away by confession, since it is not removed by baptism either; but [the commandments are to be learned] so that you may know your sins, and what you ought to do, and what you ought to ask of God, "for by the law comes knowledge of sin" [Rom. 3, 23], because the commandment of God demands more, than we are able to do. But here they are shouting: So should he command the impossible? This is blasphemy. It would follow that he would condemn unjustly! Answer: No, but he commands it for his own sake, that he may have mercy and humble men, that they may seek [his] grace. For he that learneth the commandments for this cause only, that he may confess, goeth into presumption, that he may do that which he hath learned, and falleth more and more grievously, doing nothing but increasing and magnifying his conscience.

1) camouflage all editions, but perhaps tiin to read. (Weim. Ausg.)

Corollary (Corollarium).

That man is not perfect as he ought to be is a sin, but to some it is attributed, to others it is not.

It is counted to those who stand, because such people do not hate their sin, which is in them, namely the tinder, and therefore they love it and make an alliance with the Cananites. It is not imputed to those who fight against it with constant zeal; for because of this zealous effort and their progress, it is not imputed to them, even though it is in them, because even though it is in them, it is not in their will, but against their will in the flesh. Therefore, that which is in them is not in them. Therefore the apostle says [Rom. 7, 18.], "I know that in me, that is in my flesh, dwelleth no good thing"; it dwells [evil] in them, but it does not rule in them, as the Jebusites 2) dwelt^ among the children of Israel, but did not rule [1 Kings 9, 21.]. And Rom. 8:1: "There is therefore nothing condemnable in them which are in Christ JEsu, who walk not after the flesh." Why? Because those who belong to Christ have crucified their flesh with its lusts [Gal. 5:2]. For they walk continually against the flesh, not after the flesh, that is, they contend against the tinder, which those in deep sleep (stertentes) safely disregard, and are satisfied with their good works. For what do you think the suffering and death of Christ means other than the death of the old man and of the the whole Adam? Although he is not killed at once, he must be martyred and pierced with so many strokes of the cheek, blows of the fist, scourges, thorns, even with nails, until he bows his head and passes away. For the head is this tinder, the innermost root of anger and evil desire, which is not killed unless, broken by many adversities, it finally rests like a dead man. The same is meant by the fact that the children of Israel all died in the wilderness in former times, except Joshua and Caleb, and only another generation came into the land of promise, which represented the second circumcision in the spirit; so that [the first generation] 1) not only lost the temporal, but also the spiritual goods.

Now let us see what our theologians think of these commandments. They say that this was not the intention of the lawgiver, that they should be kept in love, unless someone wanted to enter into life [by keeping them], according to the words [Matth. 19, 17.]: "If you want to enter into life, keep the commandments." Otherwise, they say, it would follow that he sinned who did not kill, and this omission [of killing] would be done by him without love. Behold, thus speak those who are among the most distinguished of theologians. But what do they say but what the Jews also hold and say? namely, they make a letter and a statute out of the most spiritual commandment of God. For they interpret [the commandment: "Thou shalt not kill" so: That is, you shall not do the work of killing. Since this can be done very easily, they immediately fall into line and say that this commandment has been kept, even if it has not been done in love; but this is not sin, nor is it a transgression of this commandment. What should we do to these Pharisaic interpreters if the Lord himself had not interpreted this commandment? for they would be able to say that even anger in the heart is not forbidden in it, except when a man who has not been offended (non irritatus) is angry out of malice; but I know that this is not sin.

1) Without such an addition as we have made, this sentence seems to us to be completely incomprehensible.

not whether this belongs here according to their opinion. If they knew that this underlying (radicalis) malignant anger (malignitas irae) is forbidden here on principle, they would certainly not deny that it is commanded to fulfill this commandment in love, unless they wanted to say that someone could change anger into gentleness by his own powers, without grace.

Secondly. They also dream this, or want to force one to dream it: that "Thou shalt not kill" 2c. refers to the time when one is left alone; if someone would then be angry, he would sin. This, of course, is the opinion of the one who made the gloss: "without cause," as if to say: [He who is angry with his brother,] if he should not be irritated by a wrong 2c.; as if he were not sinning, if he were indignant because of a harm against him who did him the harm. For they have not penetrated so far into the knowledge of this commandment that they should see that, since everything relates to the time of temptation and trial, man then recognizes the spirit of the commandments and his carnality, when he realizes that he is forcibly carried away to sin, and finds nothing good in his flesh, so that he sighs for the grace that will make him well. For here man cannot put away his anger and impatience without grace, as experience shows. Otherwise, man would be taught here that he should not put away any other anger than the devilish anger, which consists in being angry and doing harm, even if he is not offended, which hardly any animal has, or at least only very few. In the same way, they dream of the act of loving God above all things, namely, in the time of rest, and do not think of how impossible this is in temptation and suffering. They conceal all this very well when they only speak of the works of the commandments according to the sound of the syllables; for then they find the abomination of Jewish blindness, namely that grace is not necessary, nor is it meant (intenta) in the commandments, except conditionally, and not because of the infirmity (defectum) in men, but because of the intention of Him who gave the commandments (praecipientis): so that grace becomes abhorrent to all men, since rather a new constraint is imposed, as it were, which goes beyond the law, and makes blessedness more impossible than the law itself, and as if grace should not rather be a help and comfort to those who are to fulfill the law. But in such a way do the theologians drive one to imagine abominations of ignorance and fantasies (prodigia) of darkness. That the commandments must therefore be fulfilled in grace requires not only the intention of the governor, but also the need (indigentia) of him who is to do them. For it is true that he sins who does not kill while he is out of grace, but he sins not because he does not kill according to the letter, but because he kills inwardly in the heart, in the spirit, since without grace he cannot be without wrath and without the tinder of indignation, as is clear from experience, when there is temptation and occasion is given by adversities; For this hidden evil of wrath causes him to be unable to do anything but kill; so he is guilty of this commandment according to the spirit, though he is not guilty of the same commandment according to the letter; so it is evident that they speak of the law according to the letter.

Third, from the same blindness, they conclude that some commandments only forbid (negativa), others only command (affirmativa). This again is not true, unless you keep only the outer shell, the syllables. For by this commandment "Thou shalt not kill" he expresses the very strongest commandments (affirmativam), namely this: Thou shalt be gentle, and kind of heart, and patient, and quiet, and peaceable. For a negation is put in Scripture for this reason, because an affirmation is not so strong; as, in the place [Luc. 10, 42.], "Mary hath mentioned the good part, which shall not be taken away from her," that is, for all eternity she shall be showered with it. And in the 110th Psalm, v. 4: "The Lord has sworn, and he will not repent," that is, it will please him most highly and forever. And the word in the first Psalm [v. 1, Vulg.]: "Blessed is the man who has not gone away [to the council of the godless]," that is, this man is extremely well to do.

taken among the godly. And so in many other things. For the apostle also interprets the word [Rom. 7, 19]: "Do not let yourself lust" in an affirmative way by saying: "The good that I want" is the opposite of evil lust, namely chastity and love, "I do not do", because "do" means in an affirmative way (positive). So this commandment is indeed forbidding according to the letter, but an exceedingly strong command according to the spirit, because the Lord demands that they be gentle and peaceable. But they leave the inward filth, which the Lord imposes on the synagogue, when he says Lamentations. 1, 9. says: "Their filth clings to their hem," and Deut. 32, 5. [Vulg.]: "They have sinned against him, and are not his children in their filth." So also the word: "Thou shalt not commit adultery" is a prohibition, but only according to the letter; but it contains the exceedingly spiritual commandment: Thou shalt be chaste, abstinent, temperate, sober, modest, and that from the bottom of thy heart, willingly and gladly. For this, however, grace is absolutely necessary, not for the sake of God, who has this in mind in His domain, but for the sake of our carnal nature, which is unable to accomplish anything through its actions. So also the word: "Thou shalt not steal" is a forbidding letter, but a commanding spirit, namely: Thou shalt be poor in spirit, thou shalt be content with what thou hast, and be modest 2c. Yes, also the first: "You shall not have other gods" is a commandment (affirmativum), namely: You shall love and honor the Lord, your God, alone (unum), above you and all things, otherwise he would not be the one God (unus), if you loved something else at the same time with him. Likewise also the second: "You shall not take the name of the LORD your GOD uselessly." This is the letter, but the Spirit says [Ps. 111, 9.], "Holy and honorable is his name," and again [Joel 3, 5.], "Whosoever shall call upon the name of the LORD shall be saved." So [this commandment] intends that the name of God shall be used in constant reverence, and shall be called upon with fear; but even more shall it be praised and glorified by a humble confession of one's own shame. And the third: "Thou shalt keep the holiday.

ligen", that is, according to the letter: You shall not do any work on the holiday; the letter is a prohibition, while in it the noblest and greatest works of God are commanded with hearing, teaching and contemplating the Word of God inwardly in the spirit. By heart is rest, by heart is the greatest activity of God who works. And if you interpret these three commandments spiritually, that is, from the inward works, you will find that the first is love toward God, the second is faith, and the third is hope. For to have no other God is to love God above all things. Not to use the name of God uselessly is to believe in His name and to call upon and praise Him inwardly in the spirit of faith. For [Rom. 10, 14. 13.]: "How shall they call on Him in whom they do not believe? For whosoever shall call upon the name of the LORD shall be saved." Furthermore, to keep a holy celebration (sanctificare quietem) is to keep God quiet (sese passibilem praestare), so that God alone may work in him; here patience and hope are necessary, for here one enters into darkness, where man does not work, but is wonderfully led along the path of suffering. So often you suffer, so often you do not work, but celebrate (quiescis), and God works in you, but you do not know what, because you are suffering and are a mere material on which God works]. This is what is said [Ps. 46, 11.], "Be still and know that I am GOD." Here, hope alone reigns in love through faith. Therefore, St. Augustine rightly says that the worship and service of GOD consists in faith, hope and love. But these are the very strongest commandments (affirmativissima) and the three theological virtues, which are expressed under the letter of these three words as prohibitions (negativa). There remains only one commandment (affirmativum): "You shall honor your father and your mother", but how this is also a spiritual commandment has been said above. Although the letter seems to teach honor only in outward gestures (signi), the commandment requires under it a heartfelt fear and a willing obedience, which cannot possibly take place without grace, as is seen in the test of temptation, where the opportunity approaches to each one to keep it, if it is contrary to his

Now with the eighth: "Thou shalt not bear false witness," it is sufficiently known that the letter is indeed a prohibition, but that it is a commandment according to the spirit, that thou shalt be an advocate (paracletus) of thy neighbor from the heart with apologizing, defending, and by doing everything that thou wouldest that one should do to thee in danger of the good name and [in distress] of the conscience. Of the remaining two commandments, it is equally known that "not to be lusted after" is, according to the letter, to grant one's neighbor all good from the heart and to wish that no evil befall him.

From all this it is evident that the ten commandments, as they read in the letter, are correctly interpreted in the spirit of Christ and the apostles, since they teach hope, love, obedience, reverence, humility, gentleness, peace, patience, modesty, chastity, poverty, kindness, gentleness, cheerfulness, benevolence among one another 2c. These are commandments, but by all means a spiritual preaching of the holy ten commandments.

Now let's get back to business.

But [the commandment] begins with gentleness and sweetness of spirit, to instruct man that he should strive to be like God in his conduct toward his neighbor, just as he would have God conduct himself toward him. For it is through kindness that God is most highly praised; therefore, in order that you may be a gentle person, kind, lovely, friendly, mild, agreeable, yielding, good, that is, exceedingly like God, He says, "You shall not kill," you shall not be a killer, you shall not be crude, sharp, hard, bitter, intolerable, indignant. This is the effect of the spirit of grace, which this commandment compels us to seek and ask for. The Lord says the same thing in Matth. 5, 5: "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth."

Corollary.

In vain do those flatter themselves who do not kill, and yet do not strive from the heart to be kind, because thereby they have only the outward appearance of the commandment and the dead letter, whereby, as it were, by shadow images, the inward shadow of the commandment is lost.

of the Behemoth is covered. And we want to give a likeness:

The lime seems to be cold and without heat, but when water is poured over it, it bursts into heat, but only through oil is it quenched again, so that it becomes completely still. Thus man, ignited in the furnace of inherited (maternae) evil desire, has the hidden root of anger, which bursts forth when a temptation approaches him, and is healed no other way than by the oil of grace.

Another similarity: If a robber or a murderer or another highwayman does not kill or wound by deed, is the prince satisfied if he does not lay down his weapons? for he will suspect that he will murder as soon as an opportunity presents itself. In the same way, even if a man is not actually angry, he still has the sword of anger inside, even though it is hidden in the scabbard, but he does not please God if he does not lay down the sword and throw it away. Nor is it enough that it is in the scabbard; for it is to be feared it may be used on some future occasion. For this is the sword with which the Son of God was slain. Therefore, even if you do not kill, you are still a slayer of death before God, because you are found in the weapons with which his son was slain. For who could safely bear before the face of a prince the sword with which it is established that the prince's son was slain? Therefore, the anger must be so far removed from the innermost heart that it does not seem possible that it could still break out again.

So also a dog, even if he does not bite, is he not biting for that reason? yes, he is all the worse, the more treacherous he is. But oh, how few are mindful of these wiles of our heart! Therefore the 5th Psalm, v. 10, says: "Their inwardness is heartache" (insidiae), where we have [in the Vulgate]: "Their heart is vain" (vanum).

Therefore, the first stage, which is peculiar to those who begin to abstain from the work of death, whether by their own doing, or by acquiescence, or advice, or

Helping, as the false tongues (tercia lingua), the ear-blowers, the instigators of murder are wont to do, that they stir up anger and discord, strife, enmity, murder, as the apostle Gal. 5:20 teaches. This level seems easy and small, but if you look at it rightly, it is very great, and few are not guilty of it, because few keep their tongue in check so that they do not sow discord and thereby, as much as is in them, cause death. That his mother was free from this great and frequent evil by special grace of God, Augustine says in the 9th book of his "Confessions". And no one thinks that he is easily free from it, unless he is peace-loving and a good mediator, who speaks only what can reconcile and please angry and divisive people, or rather what can keep united people in harmony, by concealing what is evil and praising the good that each has in himself in both. There is an example of a wise servant who was sent as a messenger by his master to a man to give him orders to leave his house. But he told him to greet him from his master. And when he returned to his master, he said that the man wanted to go out. At last the master, by miraculous providence (of which I will say no more now), was favored, and recognized the wisdom of the servant. Therefore it was rightly said that a blower of ears or a slanderer is a threefold murderer, because he kills three people with one blow: first himself, secondly the one whom he blows into the ears, thirdly the one whom he slandered, because the mouth that lies kills the soul [Weish. 1, 11]. But they excuse themselves and say that they speak the truth; but it is a bad excuse, because the truth must also be told in the right way according to the proverb: What is right, you must also do right. For even the truth becomes a lie if it is not told where, how, when, to weep, and so much is hunted down as should be said. Therefore St. Bernard also says that the slanderer has the devil in his tongue; he who listens to him, in his ear. The second who is killed is the one who listens to the slanderer, because he in the same way sins, except that he causes him to anger, that is, to death. The third [who is killed] is the one who suffers this, who, when he experiences this evil, likewise falls into wrath, that is, death; for if he does not fall there, it is not the good deed of the slanderer, but of God; the slanderer has done as much as he could.

Of other evils that a slanderer causes, elsewhere. The epistle of Jacob would have to be dealt with in order to make clear how far the first level of this commandment extends and how few are on it. And briefly we will do this.

He says in the first chapter [Jac. 1, 19. 20.]: "Therefore, brethren, let every man be quick to hear, slow to speak, and slow to anger. For man's anger does not do what is right in the sight of God." With these words he incites to gentleness, therefore follows [v. 21]: "Therefore put away all filthiness and all wickedness, and receive with gentleness the word that is planted in you," 2c., as if he wanted to say: Do not perform all uncleanness and exceeding wickedness, that is, do not give yourselves up to uncleanness and wickedness, that you may perform them all, but it is enough that where you resist and cast them from you, uncleanness and wickedness will still cling to you. He adds, "all," and "exceedingly many" (abundantiam malitiae in the Vulg.), to indicate that those who fight against it are nevertheless not without uncleanness and wickedness, how much more have they all uncleanness who do not fight [against it], but obey it, as the Psalm (Psalm 36, 5. Vulg.) says, "He standeth firm in all the evil way," for it follows: "but wickedness hath he not hated." Further, he calls evil desire an "uncleanness," or an impurity, because it is an impurity of soul and spirit, which is the cause of wrath among men; for therefore they are angry one against another, because the one hinders the evil desire of the other; wherefore he teaches that we should put away this, which is as it were the whole and chief of impurity. "Wickedness," however, is what he calls anger itself, which is also something that is too much and superfluous in the mind, like the disgusting separations (foeda) of the body of something superfluous, as if he wanted to say: the dung and superfluous malice, that is, the malice, which is a dung and a vulgar separation (obscenum) of the soul, put it down and do not cherish it. But this happens when someone is "quick to hear and slow to speak". For angry people are not only quick to speak and slow to hear, but also not at all able to be silent and to hear; for he who is quick to anger is also quick to speak, and again. Therefore the best means of breaking down anger is that a man should take hold of himself and get into the habit, first, of being slow to speak when he should be angry; secondly, and this is a perfect degree, of being "slow to anger," so that he may resolve in his heart not to be moved to anger, and finally to find out whether he cannot be silent when he is offended.

But some excuse themselves by being angry and speaking for the sake of God and righteousness. To them he opposes and says: "Man's anger does not do what is right in the sight of God. It is impossible that he who is angry and does something out of anger should do a work pleasing to God, since God is a God of peace and tranquility (suavitatis), who is not pleased with impetuous behavior (turbulentum). A remarkable saying, which many too much disregard, who show their indignation against unjust behavior of others, but gloss over their injustice (palpant) and sometimes even boast about it. So he also says afterwards [Jac. 1, 26.]: "If anyone among you makes himself believe that he serves God, and does not bridle his tongue, but deceives his heart, his service is vain." O a great word! How many make so many words, but are also (and of these he actually speaks here) bitter, wrathful and exceedingly sharp, and yet want to be regarded as servants of God and saints! So it is one and the same, that the worship of a talkative man is vain, and that the anger of man does not do what is right in the sight of God. Thus anger, through the tongue, destroys worship and all righteousness, that is, it [worship] is beautiful outwardly, but void inwardly; therefore it also "deceives," not others, but "his own heart" by thinking he is a servant of God, when in fact he is not.

And in the third chapter [v. 1], describing the dangers and evils of the tongue, he says: "Dear brethren, forbear not to be teachers to any man, and know that we shall receive the more judgment." He says, "Let not a great number [plures in the Vulg.(that is, all) be teachers, and be quick to speak and to teach, and slow to hear; but let every man desire to be a disciple, and let another be his teacher, lest there arise a very desolate and discordant nature, so that there be many to teach, and none to hear, and every man against another, so that they fill all with discord, as the heretics have done in the church. Becoming a teacher is not evil, but that many want to become one, that is, that they want to hold different opinions (esse diversi), in that no one hears the other, is so that they will receive all the more judgment. And he warns against this by indicating such danger, because we are already guilty enough without this greater judgment that such people will receive. There is no need to seek occasion for sin and to receive more judgment, for [Jac. 3:2]: "We all lack manifoldly." We are all such people that we lack, and not only in words, but in many things, namely, with the eyes, ears, hands, and all the senses, and also with thoughts. And these shortcomings should be enough for us, so that we do not burden ourselves with greater ones. Then the apostle also admonishes that no one arrogantly presumes to be another's teacher, as if he himself lacked in nothing, as if he wanted to say: Why do you reproach one another vehemently, and why does each of you strive to be the master of the other? Do you not know that we all (without exception) lack not only in one thing, but in many things? Now if someone is not lacking in a few things or in a work, how will it be with the word? [Jac. 3, 2: "But he that lacketh in no word is a perfect man," as if to say: He may boast of himself that he is perfect, but not until he is perfect.

He does not make a mistake even in words, as if to say, "Such a man will not be found among you, because we are all lacking in many ways, much more also in words. Why then are you hopeful, and exalt yourselves one above the other, and do not rather one admonish the other in gentleness, and bear with one another? "He is," I say, "a perfect man, 1) and can also keep the whole body in check," that is, if he can tame his tongue, he can also keep his whole body from sin, for he who does not sin with his tongue has undoubtedly already tamed his other members and has them in check.

Then he presents three parables, one of which he had already begun [Jac. 3:3]: "Behold, we put bridles in the horses' mouths, that they may obey us, and we direct the whole lend." Secondly [v. 4.], "Behold, the ships, though they be great, and be driven by strong winds, yet are they steered with a little oar, whither he will that governeth it. So also the tongue is a small member and does great things," or: throws it back and forth, as if he wanted to say: The horses we can bridle and direct, and the ships, yea (as comes after [v. 7.]), even the wild beasts; but the tongue, being but a little member, ought most to be bridled and directed. But it rather hurls and moves great things, which are otherwise well governed, moves everything and tosses it about, as the wind does the ships, just opposite to the oar, which keeps the ships in check. In size it resembles the tiller of the ships, and yet in its action it is opposite, rather similar to the winds and whirlwinds. The third simile [v. 5]: "Behold, a small fire, what a forest it kindles!" that is, it happens that a small fire consumes much material (materiam), namely a whole forest. [V. 6.:] "And the tongue is also a fire, a world full of wickedness" (mundus iniquitatis), Greek: ὁ κόσμος της ἀδικίας (mundus injustitiae - a world of unjust-.

1) Here we have followed the interpunction of the Vulgate and the Jena edition. The other editions available to us, Löschner, Petri, Wittenberg, Erlanger and Weimarsche offer: Hie, iir^riana, psrksetus vir. kokest etc.

tivity), as if he wanted to say: It causes so much injustice that one could think that it is, as it were, a world, because it is a fire, and sets many things on fire.

With all these and the following words he wants to remind and teach us, because our own tongue is our greatest enemy, from which we must be no less careful than from our greatest enemy, and the smaller it is, the more harmful it is, since it is very small in size (in re), but very great in its power. For nothing harms the conscience more easily than the tongue. This is why silence is enforced in the monasteries, even though the devil has introduced logic there, too, which is an exceedingly garrulous teacher of garrulity.

For the same reason, and in order to curb the quickness to speak, the Lord threatens that men must give an account of every useless word [Matth. 12, 36]; a harsh but necessary judgment against such a slippery evil and exceedingly effective poison.

This also the philosophers have seen, that for this reason two ears were given to man, but only One tongue; and the ears themselves are not only wide and open to the outside, but also provided with the auricles, which surround them, so that the ear may hear more easily; finally curved and, as it were, directed against the word, so that a word may not easily rush by. The tongue, however, is not only closed and hidden, but also enclosed with a bony wall, namely the teeth, then with a bulwark of flesh, that is, the lips, except that it is so far removed from the lungs and from the heart, and needs so many tools, while the ears need none; yet it is quicker than all the senses.

Behold, the five senses swim, as it were, like five ships in these bodily things and bring innumerable things into the memory, namely by seeing, hearing, feeling, smelling and tasting. Nevertheless, they cannot bring in so much that the tongue does not bring out even more, in that it very often speaks assumptions, suspicions, opinions, presumptuous dreams, frivolous inventions, which neither are, nor were, nor will be.

Likewise, therefore, was soon the second

The first plague of Egypt was the sending of frogs, which signify useless talkativeness; for the first plague was blood, which signifies that when a man becomes flesh and blood, he becomes all tongue and speaks only vain things, and the more vain he is, the more he wants to speak. And by this, as by a reliable sign, you may recognize a vain man when he is talkative; and vice versa: how capable and substantial (gravior) a man is, you may recognize by this sign when he is scanty in words, rich in works. For such people have an aversion to speaking [and do not speak] unless they are compelled to do so by obedience or necessity, as it is said in the 39th Psalm, v. 3: "I am silent and still, and keep silence of pleasures," for as their life disgusts them, so does speaking. Again [Prov. 10, 19.], "Where words are many, there is no going without sin"; and the same [Prov. 14, 23.], "Where words are used, there is want." Job 11:2 [Vulg.]: "Will he then who speaks much be able to be righteous?" and Ps. 140:12: "An evil mouth will have no happiness on earth."

But this is most evil when man speaks driven by anger (ira magistra), therefore it is said that Aesopus bought tongues when he was ordered to buy the best meat, and likewise when he was ordered to buy the worst meat afterwards. Yes, many have taken their own lives for fear of slander (infamiae), and the poets say that Lycambes was led to hang himself by the [biting] iambic verses of Archilochus. Now if anyone should still doubt this, let him ask a man who has a wicked, quarrelsome and garrulous wife.

Furthermore, what teeth, claws, beaks, horns, spikes, poisons or other weapons are for wild animals, yes, what all kinds of tools and weapons are for evil men, that is the tongue for souls, therefore the 57th Psalm [v. 5] says: "The children of men, their teeth are spears and arrows." Likewise the 75th Psalm [v. 6. Vulg.], "Lift not up your horn so high." Hence [their tongue] is "a sharp sword." 1)

1) We have adopted after Ps. 57, 5th [Vulg.s the Conjecture of the Weimar edition: aoutus Kiaüius instead of: nrous, Ainciins in the editions.

That is why it is rightly called "a world full of injustice" and "a small fire that lights a great forest".

And it follows [Jac. 3, 6.]: "So the tongue is among our members, and defiles the whole body", as if he wanted to say: Is it not to be wondered at, that that should defile, and stain the whole body, which is not at all apart from us, but rather so completely within us, that it is among our own members? Is this not quite similar to a miraculous event (monstri), that one member harms not only one member, but the whole body, even though the members take care of each other with great concern? Only this one member stains the whole body, that is, it makes it guilty of sins, so that for the sake of the tongue the whole man becomes detestable to God and men, because a man with an evil tongue (linguosus) is so disgraceful and abominable that even if he were beautiful in the whole body, skilful and rich, nevertheless everything about him would be hated by men as an abomination. For who is fond of gossiping and chattering people, and does not rather have a loathing and disgust for them, and say, "Eh, how washful he is!"

[Jac. 3, 6. Vulg.:] "And kindleth the wheel of our birth, and is kindled from hell." The apostle seems to understand by "birth" that as which we are born, as above Cap. 1, 23. [Vulg.:] "He is like a man who beholds the face of his birth in a mirror," and again [Jac. 1, 18. Vulg.:] "He begat us according to his will by the word of truth, that we should be a kind of beginning (initium aliquod) 1) of his creature." So "birth" is the begetting or creation and creature to which we are born, brought forth, made. So "the wheel of birth" is called the whole being, and everything as which we are created, like a whole body. And this "wheel of birth", and the whole epitome (circulum) of our being or of what we are, the tongue sets on fire. For it is a fire and a world full of unrighteousness; therefore it ignites not a part of us, but everything,

1) initium, which is in the Vulgate, is missing in the editions. Petri, the Jenaers and the Wittenbergers have what we are and live. For this is perhaps why he called it a "wheel," not merely because of our complete being, but also because of our complete life and activity in this time; for our life is a fleeting wheel. But he adds, "kindled by hell," lest it be understood that here a good flame kindles, since it is kindled by hellish fire, that is, by anger and hatred it kindles all that we are, with anger and hatred, since it irritates and moves by anger, as may be seen in angry people, who tremble and glow within and without.

The fourth parable [Jac. 3, 7. 8.]: "For all the nature of beasts, and of birds, and of serpents, and of sea-wonders, are tamed, and are tamed by human nature; but the tongue no man can tame." Behold, with how mighty words, and in how many ways (sensibus), he attacks the tongue, to make it like hellish fire, and to lower it among the wild beasts. Who should not be afraid of himself, since he has with him a more harmful and cruel wild animal than the whole world? Who should not hate his tongue? Who should not be afraid to speak, since he hears that his tongue is reviled by so many horrible names?

It follows [Jac. 3, 8.], "The restless evil full of deadly poison." It is too little [for the apostle] that it [the tongue] should be restless, which in itself would be an evil, but "a restless evil," that is, which always harms and does not cease to harm. Further, "full of deadly poison," that is, which kills, not merely corrupts, that is, full of a rapidly acting poison, not a slow or ineffective one (tardo). By this, of course, it becomes clear how deeply the poison of the ear-blowers penetrates, so that those who have poisoned each other can hardly be provided with a remedy in the whole of their lives, since the envy and hatred have penetrated to the very marrow; very often they would rather die with their hatred than that they should reconcile. Therefore he says very emphatically and exceedingly strongly "full of deadly poison" not merely "pernicious poison".

[Jac. 3, 9.]: "By them we praise GOD the Father, and by them we curse men, made in the image of God." As if he wanted to say: One cannot do both at the same time, if it is not done for appearance. Therefore, let no one deceive himself by praising God; if he curses a man, he does not praise God, whose work the man is. For who could blame or curse a painting or a work of art that such a curse would not fall on the painter and master? Thus Jeremiah, Cap. 15, 10, says of those who curse the works of the Lord, "They all curse me." And Isaiah, Cap. 8, 21. "But when they suffer hunger, they will be angry, and curse their king and their God." Therefore it was chiefly forbidden in the law, and still is [Ex. 22, 28.], "Thou shalt not curse the gods, neither shalt thou blaspheme the ruler among thy people." And the apostle says [1 Cor. 6, 10.], "Blasphemers shall not inherit the kingdom of GOD."

Now if men would observe this, that by cursing men they also curse God, whose work and creature they curse, they would certainly not be so ready to curse, as it is said, Prov. 14:31 [Vulg.], "He that slandereth the poor blasphemeth his Maker." For what does he who blasphemes do but say, Eh, that thou art not otherwise, and art otherwise formed! whereas he ought to have mercy on him, praying and saying, O Lord, make him otherwise! even as one may remind and entreat a workman, but not blaspheme, as it is said there, Prov. 14:31: "But he honoureth him," namely, his Maker, "that hath mercy on the poor."

What St. Peter forbids [1 Ep 3:9], that one should not repay insult with insult, nor evil with evil, Christ also teaches [Matth 5:44]: "Pray for those who insult and persecute you," and Paul Rom 12:14: "Bless those who curse you, 1) bless and do not curse." What will happen to those who curse those who do not curse them? Therefore the 34th Psalm, v. 14 f., says: "Keep your tongue from evil and your lips from speaking falsely. Forsake evil, and do good; seek to do good.

1) In the Vulgate it says Rom. 12, 14. as well as in our Bible: "pursue", therefore should have been put on" Luc. 6, 28.

Peace and pursue it," that is, "from evil," not only with endurance, but also that you do not bear it or repay it, and "the good," not only that you repay it, but also prove it for evil that has happened to you; otherwise peace is not sought or pursued when you repay evil with evil.

This degree is therefore the second, which is forbidden by the Lord, that a man should not curse his neighbor, nor injure him, nor slander him. And as in the first degree more people are guilty than they themselves believe, so also in this. For by this commandment the three greatest offenses of the tongue are forbidden, namely, cursing, slander, and ear-blowing; but this third belongs to the first degree. And so all the evils of the tongue are forbidden by the third, fifth, sixth and seventh commandments. By the third, perjury and blasphemy and any other offenses against God; but by the fifth, offenses against one's neighbor; by the sixth, unchaste words; by the seventh, words by which one deceives and cheats in business or in court. For in the seventh commandment also is slander, but publicly and in court; but here is another.

Now there is a difference between cursing and slander, and ear-blowing, in that cursing is done against someone who is present himself, or is present, as it were, and to his face. This also includes all offenses that one is guilty of by insulting, blaspheming, blaming innocent people, and giving epithets. Malicious slander occurs when the person himself is absent, to another, and follows cursing. For if a person has brought evil against someone who is either outwardly present or whom he brings to mind inwardly, and communicates this to another, cursing has already become slander. Therefore, no one who curses is not also a curser, at least in himself. And these two things are beautifully expressed in the saying [Ps. 34:14]: "Keep your tongue from evil (that is, do not curse anyone, whether with words or with wordless [tacito] murmurings), and your lip from evil.

be careful not to speak falsely" (that is, be careful not to speak falsely), because it is falsity when someone speaks behind his back, since the one he harms does not know it. But conversely, not every curser is also a man who speaks evil, at least not against his fellow man, although he speaks evil against God when he curses man. But if he also brings the evil that two have done against each other to both, or even only from one to the other, as the friend of the one and the enemy of the other, then he is a two-tongued ear-blower and a stirrer of discord, who is worse than the other two; therefore he is not to be placed in this degree, but on the first level with the slayers.

So now let us complete this degree. Just as no one has reached the first stage of fulfilling this commandment, but he who not only does not kill, or injure, or sow discord (for this can also be done by omission), but is also so gentle that he rather revives and refreshes by works of mercy and benevolence, and so peaceable that he also endeavors to reconcile those who are at odds as much as he can with gentle and sweet words, and to mediate so that they do not become divided (for these will hear the words [Matth. 5, 5. ff.): "Blessed are the meek, blessed are the merciful, blessed are the peacemakers; for they shall inherit the earth, obtain mercy, be called the children of God": see, these three beatitudes are included in this commandment): so no one reaches the second stage of fulfillment, but he who not only does not curse, speak evil of, or reprove, but also in all things blesses those who persecute him, and pardons the accused, prays for all, and resists those who speak evil of as much as he is able. Behold, this is the spiritual understanding of this commandment.

The third degree of anger is for someone to say to his brother, "Racha" or "Archa," using a harsh guttural sound and equal-

sam produces a rattling of the windpipe. I have said that this includes all signs of anger, except words, yes, even words except curses and slander, as there are mockery (ironiae) in words, throwing up of the lips, wrinkling of the forehead, wrinkling of the nose, glowing of the face, then also silence, turning away the face, grim look: all these are signs of an enraged heart, which is filled with hatred. This also includes shouting, gnashing of teeth 2c.

Here some say that it is necessary to let go of resentment, but not the signs of resentment. Although this saying is true in some respects, it is not universally the case, and it would be much better expressed thus: It is sometimes useful to use the signs of resentment, not as if they were signs of resentment, but similar to the signs of resentment; otherwise they are not signs of resentment in fact, or one must not keep them in any way if they are in fact. Therefore, it would still be best to say that the signs of love must sometimes be left in place, and signs of anger must be shown. For if the signs of resentment are not to be discarded, why should they not rather be shown for some benefit (fructum), lest an opportunity be sought merely to omit the good.

<sup>2)</sup> It is better, then, that one show [the signs of anger] than that one not let [them] go; for he who shows them does it not out of anger but out of a good zeal; therefore he remains unsuspected of evil. But he who does not show them is exposed to the accusation (arguitur) that he did such signs before out of anger, and therefore, if he does not put them away, he leaves the brother under the suspicion of anger, and thereby hinders true and complete peace and harmony, since the latter cannot believe that his heart is reconciled, and is annoyed (and induced) to do the like again.

2) To understand this somewhat difficult paragraph, compare the penultimate paragraph before the next "inferential sentence". The difficulty is mainly due to the fact that the "signs of resentment" are such that "your brother cannot know how he is with you".

1) Löscher: "Luther preached this sermon on St. Andrew's Day [the 30th of November in the year lötl]. The erordium to this sermon is found in Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. XII, 1778.

Therefore, such teachers should be directed to this commandment of nature: Do not do to another what you would not have done to you; and: What thou wouldest have done to thee, do to another; and a heathen saith, If thou wilt be loved, love. But there is no doubt that all would want a man who has been offended by us and has been angry with us, not only to put away the signs of anger, but even to show the opposite signs, so that we may be sure of him. Therefore, stronger signs are desired than if he had not been offended. For in such a way God also showed the human race after the fall (peccatum) the benefits in a richer measure than before the sin, in that he did not spare his own Son 2c. [Rom. 8, 32.] Now if he had not given these so great signs, who could or should have believed that he was reconciled? Therefore, God's children should imitate their father.

By these sayings we are taught how difficult it is to keep the commandment of God. For it is evident from experience how difficult it is for men to cast off these evil signs and to show good signs, how they writhe and writhe before they can be induced to do so, at least in appearance; for in fact and from the heart they will never do so, unless God's grace assists them, for they say: I cannot be good to you, I cannot be kind to you. And these wicked people do not consider that they do not want such things to happen to them, neither from God nor from men. Therefore, this abomination shows what hell will be and what this world is, namely a kingdom of the devil, in which such a great evil is found in people, which makes them stubbornly obdurate against nature and what nature dictates to them in their own heart.

Therefore, there is no other difference between anger and spite (invidia) than between new wine and old wine; for spite or hatred is an ingrained (inveterata) anger, as St. Augustine says in his Rule: lest the anger grow up to be a gout, and make a beam of the mote. For anger, which soon passes away and does not

The anger that becomes hatred can hardly be called wrath, for it is soon consigned to oblivion. But when it is ingrained, it becomes an exceedingly tough evil, because it is a spiritual evil, so that it is also a proverb: Nothing remains longer in the memory than a wrong, and nothing is forgotten more quickly than a good deed; both happen through the fault of natural depravity, since it should be the other way around. For by this the good nature of a man is known, when he quickly forgets an insult and always remembers a good deed, so that he does not like to be well pleased, seeing that he is overwhelmed with a great many obligations to gratitude and to a repayment that is impossible for him. But, on the other hand, it is the nature of an evil nature to always keep an insult, and to always hold up the long past and to make up for it.

Therefore, let us explain with examples when it is permissible to show signs of anger or harshness. If someone is so stubbornly wicked that he will not desist after being admonished once, twice or three times, he must not only show signs of anger against him, but he must also show signs of wrath against him. If any man be called a brother, and be a fornicator, or a covetous man, or an idolater, or a blasphemer, or a drunkard, or a robber," and 2 Thess. 3:14 f.: "But if any man be not obedient to our word, reprove him, and have nothing to do with him, that he may be ashamed. But hold him not as an enemy, but admonish him as a brother." Behold, not as an enemy, but as a brother shall he be corrected. This is a holy and good wrath, which is greatly commended in the Scriptures.

Therefore a distinction is to be made here: First, that he be admonished according to the words of Christ [Matt. 18:15], "Sins thy brother against thee." By the way, he is not to be cast away the first time, but he is to be admonished. For if he asks forgiveness seventy times seven times, it shall not be refused him.

Second, distinguish whether you do so because he has harmed you or because he has committed a sin. For

If you love God more than yourself, you must be more angry that he has offended God than you. Then you must let yourself complain that he has done more harm to himself inside than to you outside. When you have considered this, you will easily be taught how and with what kind of heart you should or should not deny him the signs of love. But lest your heart deceive you, and you say, I am angry for God's sake, and not for my own, and you may lie, examine yourself concerning this matter, and see if you are as sorry and moved if he injures another as if he injures you. For if you are not moved in that case, it is a sign that you seek and avenge yourself, but do not better [your neighbor].

And why do I dwell on it for so long? It is a vain debate whether the signs of resentment should be discarded, for they must be discarded altogether. But if there is a reason why they should be shown, one must be angry wholeheartedly, not just let the signs be seen. The signs of resentment, if they come from resentment, must be discarded completely. But if they are not signs of resentment, and it is necessary to show them for the sake of the brother's correction, a perfect anger must also be added, so that he may see that they are shown to him from the heart and from what cause. And do not go along in such silence and false pretense (simulans) that your brother cannot know how he is with you. Such teaching is evil and totally against love, for it teaches hypocrisy.

But the commandments are extensive and many, all of which love would easily see and do; if they are not there, nothing can be taught sufficiently. For it teaches how man himself wants to be loved, that one should care for him, take care of him, be kind to him, do nothing against him in a disguised way: in such a way it teaches to show the same to one's neighbor. For a friend need not walk deceitfully, as St. Jerome says: A true friendship cannot suffer dissimulation. If there is resentment, show it;

If it is not there, show it again, either with signs of kindness or severity.

Corollary.

It is clear that even this degree is not kept if someone does not make an effort not only to refrain from the signs, but also to prove the opposite signs out of a benevolent heart. For by this commandment God trains us to all goodness, and intends to eradicate in us the root of the ability to be angry, so that there would remain only a loving heart, which works in grace, not by nature.

The fourth degree follows.

The fourth degree is to be angry with the heart, and this is the first and the root of all the others. For this also the law chiefly means, when it says, "Thou shalt not kill." For it requires a pure heart, not merely the hand, as the hypocrisy of the Jews [pretended], as the 24th Psalm, v. 4. says: "He that hath innocent hands, and is pure in heart." Therefore almost all the beatitudes Matth. 5, 3. ff. are conceived in this commandment and interpret the same. For: "Blessed are the meek, blessed are the merciful, blessed are the peacemakers, blessed are the patient, blessed are the pure in heart" are understood in this commandment. But that also: "Blessed are the poor, blessed are those who hunger for righteousness, blessed are those who mourn," means those who recognize themselves as those who do not fulfill this commandment, and therefore mourn and desire and hunger: who would doubt that here are the people, or at least must be such people, that they fulfill this and every other commandment.

Therefore, in this degree are all evil thoughts with their root, namely the capacity to be angry, which is inclined to revenge, as there are anger, hatred, evil suspicion, bitterness, resentment 2c. And just as this is the first degree, it also has fewer types than the next degree after it. For the death stroke in the work has very many kinds, as, death stroke, fratricide, spouse murder (uxoricidium), patricide, murder of a consecrated person (sacrilegium) 2c.

And by this it is clear that in this commandment there are four degrees and in the individual degrees still many degrees, and therefore no man in in this life who is not in one of them. But blessed is he who is from the highest levels; unblessed is he who is on the lowest. For goodness is heaven, wrath hell; but in the midst of both is this world. For [Ps. 122, 4. Vulg.] "thither went up the tribes, the tribes of the LORD," here [Deut. 16, 30.] they are gone alive into the lake and into hell; the nearer to meekness they are to heaven, and again.

Therefore, it is not enough for this fourth stage if we are not angry with our brother, if we do not also have an exceedingly kind disposition and a completely gentle heart toward him. Since we are not of this nature, we must flee to the grace of Christ, that in the meantime he may supply our lack out of his fullness, until we also become perfect.

The sixth commandment follows.

The sixth commandment.

You shall not commit adultery.

<sup>1</sup>) O a very short word, but a very far-reaching opinion, therefore it needs interpretation. Therefore let us listen to Christ who says Matth. 5, 27. f.: "You have heard that it was said to the ancients: You shall not commit adultery. But I say unto you: Whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her hath committed adultery with her already in his heart." This also he speaks briefly, leaving it free to derive the same distinction of degrees from the preceding commandment, and setting only that which is in the heart. Therefore we also want to set the same four stages here, namely, in the heart, in signs, in words, in works. For this commandment the Lord interpreted for this reason, because the ancients, that is, the Jews, took it according to the meaning and sharpness of the word, and so taught, nullifying this commandment, as well as all others, that only he was an adulterer who violated it by works, but did not care for the lusts, signs, and words; therefore they became unclean. And in this opinion they stood so firm that Jeremiah said to them [Cap. 5, 8.], "Every man neighs after his neighbor's wife, as the full idle stallions." Therefore he speaks to the new, that is to us, differently, so that all covetousness may lose its place here.

For it says St. Augustine in this place about the Sermon on the Mount: that under the name.

1) Löscher: "Luther held this on St. Nicholas' Day [December 6, 1516]." - The Exordium Hiezu is no longer available.

Adulterers, which are considered in this chapter, are understood to be all carnal and unchaste desires.

The first stuse is therefore the outward work, which undoubtedly arises from the inward desire, as St. Augustine proves there. But if in it all carnal desire is forbidden, then also every work that arises from it is forbidden. Therefore, many distinctions are made between the works.

1. simple fornication of a single person with a single woman, from which others distinguish

2. Fornication, because the former has to do with only one wife, but the latter is an unseemly rut of unchastity against many.

3. defilement, that is, weaknesses of a virgin.

4. kidnapping, that is, when a daughter or son is stolen, wherein at the same time a theft is committed, and the very greatest theft.

5. adultery, which is sometimes single, sometimes double, depending on whether both are married or only one.

6. incest, which goes against the reverence owed to blood relations.

7. sacrilegium, that is, when a spiritual person (religiosus), a priest, a nun, and all others who have vowed chastity to God, commit fornication.

8. Some add to this the excess in marriage.

These degrees in the work are in such a way

The values are different and greater and lesser among themselves, depending on the circumstances. For in the previous commandment, too, many different values were forbidden in the death stroke, as it is said, depending on different circumstances.

Although every commandment of God is, as it were, a light by which it is known what man, the world and the flesh are, and how far we are from God, it is this commandment that primarily shows this. For the apostle says [Rom. 3, 20.]: "Through the law comes knowledge of sin." Thus, the law is a light by whose shining we see the countless miseries of the human race.

For who is such a stone that he could even refrain from sighing and weeping when he hears these commandments of God, and they enlighten him, yes, show him the whole world, if he would only pay attention to how infinitely large a number of people lead their lives in such a way that they do not walk according to the commandments? If there were no other cause why we should never be joyful, but always mourn, this alone would be sufficient, if we were to look at the lives of men in comparison with the commandments of God. For then we would see how the human race is quite a miserable lost lot, since one so rarely sees people who live and act according to the commandments of God, and especially in this commandment. Is it not frightening that there are so many degrees of works by which this commandment is acted against, and that people without all fear perform them insolently (ruere) and perish? And yet we can laugh at such things! Therefore, we should pay attention to this commandment as to a lamp, and by it we should recognize how so many people come to ruin. Then we will see that this world is an abominable abyss and very close to hell, and little justice and truth in it; indeed, the Scripture says [Ps. 39:6, 12, 62:10] that all men are "nothing at all" and "liars" [Ps. 116:11], therefore in truth hell is in the world.

The first misery of men, then, is simple fornication, in which not only those who commit it sin, but also those who encourage it, help it, counsel it, and do not resist it.

stand, laugh, clutch, mediate, and especially those who give cause.

But they "favor" those who harbor them in their houses, or even if princes, overlords and judges do not resist it, but allow it. It will not be of any use to them that they themselves do not fornicate, but it will be said to them [Ps. 50:18, 21]: "When you see a thief, you run with him, and have fellowship with adulterers. This thou doest, and I hold my peace; then thinkest thou that I shall be like thee. But I will punish thee, and will make thee see it." And this misery, alas! as a great pestilence it prevails, since everyone instructs his own kind, seduces, corrupts, both among young men and virgins 2c.

But the "mediators" are those who are intermediaries and matchmakers. You can find a beautiful history about this in the fifth section, in the 80th chapter of the "Mirror of Examples". For what the devil alone cannot or would not be able to do, he accomplishes through these people. 1)

But they "do not resist" who do not admonish or punish according to the commandment of Christ, neither have pity on their souls, nor pray for them, as befits Christians. Moreover, they make a joke of it, with telling and laughing at the ruin of their neighbor, while it should be considered, as I have said, a state of great misery.

"Cause", however, those who excite the lusts of others with lewd gestures and impure words or exceedingly splendid finery, especially if they do it on purpose; for excessive adornment is always a cause, though only a secondary cause (per accidens) of evil desire, as happens at dances, in the streets, at banquets 2c. But woe to those who wound the hearts of the innocent with lewd words, as is now going on in a frightening way in the public inns where merchants gather. It is, as they say, not necessary to put lice in the fur, for they grow in it by themselves.

For our flesh is through the first sin

1) Compare the narrative Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. VIII, 544, 8 132, and Tischreden, Cap. 43, 8 40. Walch, St. Louis edition, vol. XXII, 1146.

with a twofold wound exceedingly grievous. The first is the sensitivity to offenses, the other is the evil desire; these two wounds are revealed to us by the commandments, but by grace they are healed. But the worse wound is the evil lusts, and the more dangerous, the less it pains and grieves, but moves in a pleasant way; therefore it is not regarded by foolish men as an evil, though it is twofold worse than the other, so that the Scripture says [Job 40:11.], "His strength is in his loins, and his ability in the navel of his belly." For before (ante) sin there was nothing to offend, nothing to lust after. But now both are there.

Therefore, a Christian man should know that when he feels that he is moved to anger or to evil desire, he should not think otherwise than that he feels a deadly poison and an exceedingly evil sore, and for this he should sigh to the Lord that he may be healed. For it is a certain truth that, though this tickle is pleasant and sweet, yet it is an exceedingly fiery bite of the old serpent, which brings forth the most terrifying anguish of conscience and the utmost bitterness. And thereby he is moved to seek mercy, as the figure in the fourth book of Moses [Cap. 21, 9.] contains in itself, that those bitten by the fiery serpents looked up to the serpent of brass and were healed. So also he who feels the tickle of the flesh should look up to Christ crucified. For by this account is given why the Lord, not satisfied that man is of himself inclined to evil, still uses the devil as a tempter and motivator, namely, [first] since man is negligent in seeking his recovery from God, he urges him by temptations, so that he forces him to seek the mercy and grace of God; secondly also, so that he may not exalt himself in the gifts he has received. This is what he did with the Apostle Paul, with St. Jerome, and with many others until their death. See in the "Mirror of Examples" under the title "Challenge".

However, there are others who are attacked very violently by this evil, but others who are not attacked by it.

linder, nor others even a little. Nevertheless, no one remains chaste (continent) without the grace of God, as it is said in Wis 8:21: "But when I learned that I could not be chaste in any other way, unless God gave it to me (and that was also wisdom, to recognize that such grace is), I went to the Lord" 2c. See how one must seek healing from this disease through prayer, and it is great wisdom that one should know this his malady and the place of the remedy. So also the martyr St. Chrysantus says: He is mistaken who thinks that he can maintain himself in chastity by his own efforts. Therefore, St. Augustine says in the 1st book "On the Sermon on the Mount": Whoever feels that his carnal lust is rebelling against his right will through the habit of sins, by which, if it is not restrained, he is forcibly led into captivity, let him remember, as much as he can, how great and glorious a peace he has lost through sinning, and let him exclaim [Rom. 7, 24. f.]: "I wretched man, who will deliver me from the body of this death? I thank GOD through JESum Christ our Lord." For thus, crying out as a wretched man, he implores the help of the Comforter through his mourning, and the recognition of his wretchedness is no small approach to blessedness. This is a golden saying. For he does not say that one should laugh. To have pleasure and be merry in the tickling, but to bear sorrow, because he feels the poison of death in him. Furthermore, where are those who praise free will? Why do they not immediately desist as they will? nay, why do they not will, and cannot will? Why could not St. Jerome and St. Paul lay aside the sting of the flesh? Because if they had wanted, it would have been badly done, but they could not want sufficiently; therefore they wanted against their will. It is the same with anger. For why do those who are angry not immediately stop it, if they can, yes, if they want to? But they cannot, nor do they want to, because their will is already torn elsewhere and led captive.

Thirdly, 1) this is our comfort, that those who are suffering here should be comforted [Matth.

1) This "third" corresponds to the "serstenns" and "second" at the end of the penultimate paragraph.

5, 4.). For in such a way the most wise mercy of God leads us out in a wonderful way, by driving out the poison with poison, and making a plaster of chastity out of unchastity, since he lets it break in for the sake of it, so that man may feel it, sigh, suffer, seek grace, and thus acquire the greater inclination to chastity. For he is all the more chaste, not the calmer he is, but the more he suffers because he cannot be chaste as he would like. And from this we gather (although all this belongs to the fourth stage, which will be discussed hereafter, yet, lest it slip away from us just as the opportunity presents itself), 1) that those should be comforted who feel that they are tormented by such thorns, lest, out of a foolish delusion, they immediately lower their hands and give themselves over to despair, as if he could not be chaste who suffers heat in his innermost marrow and thoughts. This thought is very dangerous and exceedingly inclined to all sins in the work, because of despair. For so a young man, who has not experienced the carnal thoughts before, and thinks that he cannot be chaste if he is not without them, immediately says: "Why do I hesitate to do the work? for it is all the same whether I do it or not, for the chastity of the heart is lost. Not so, wretched man, not so; chastity is not lost by such thoughts. Rather, you have never been more chaste, if you only feel that you have it against your will. For chastity, like every other living virtue, is so hidden that it cannot be known by him who has it, but only by God. For God hides the whole life of the saints so deeply that they themselves cannot know it, as the first Psalm, v. 6, says: "For the Lord knows the way of the righteous." Therefore, just as the living and true honor of the righteous consists in shame, true wisdom in foolishness, true rest in affliction, true joy in sorrow, true liberty in captivity, true riches in poverty, so also true chastity consists in unchastity and true love in the way of the righteous.

And the more abominable chastity is, the more glorious is chastity. Oh, that this wisdom is unknown to men, how great harm it does! A true sign of living chastity is when a man feels that he is now displeased, not that it is a complete displeasure (for otherwise the tickling would not last), but a mixed one: Sometimes he wants, sometimes he does not want, sometimes he lies above, sometimes below, so that, like a wheel, he is rolled about in the muck by his thoughts, and yet the resolution of chastity remains. For if there were not the living and true chastity, he would not persevere nor resist, but would let his thoughts shoot the reins freely, and would feel no complaint. For because he wants and delights in the thoughts, and yet at the same time feels that he does not want them, they become mixed, sweet and bitter, and thus burdensome to him, since he is not free to go to either side, but is rolled about in a middle state. For the spiritual man, that is the inclination to chastity, remains and preserves chastity, although the outer man stirs up whimsical storms in the limbs and in the heart. Therefore, the struggle for chastity is no different than when a ship is tossed to and fro in the sea by the tides while Christ sleeps in it. Therefore, one must only see to it that he is awakened, and command the sea, which is the flesh, and the wind, which is the devil. For he also often gives the priests such impurities to keep them from the altar; let him be despised, not only in the mere vile objects which he stirs up in the mind, but also when he inclines the will to it and brings forth evil impulses; yea, the more must one run to the Sacraments to obtain grace and help. But I now know many who would not go there unless they had not only rest from such inclinations, but were also free from these shameful objects, as all too foolish obedient servants of the devilish deceit and its wickedness.

So in such a way God uses the mercy and goodness of our adversity, that through it He may promote our best more, so that

1) These brackets are set by us.

[Rom. 8, 28. Everything must serve the elect for the best, even sins; all this [God does] to hide and cover the life and grace that is in us, so that we do not become lukewarm when we recognize it and are satisfied with it; but rather, since we do not know about it, as if we did not have it, we strive and groan for it all the more. But as it is said of chastity, so it is also with all other virtues, which are given most when they are denied, and are there when one thinks that they are most remote, and then man cannot believe otherwise than that they are not there, and that he is lost: hence then comes the groaning, the hatred of oneself, the longing for the virtues, and the pleading for them. Then God gives His grace to the humble, which He then hides and takes away in order to add greater grace, hiding the opposite under the opposite. This is therefore the wisdom that is drawn from the hidden and is in the hidden.

But this chastity is golden compared to that which is without evil thoughts, like patience and gentleness, without incitement [to anger]. For what kind of meekness would that be? For such gentleness even the wild beasts and at least the heathen have. So also is chastity, which is without lust and thoughts in tranquility, even in whores and the worst whoremongers, who are chaste when the flesh, sated, is still. By the way, this rest belongs to the future life. Therefore, chastity is dangerous, since it may lead to hope when it is manifest (that is, when it is quiet); but it may also be dangerous to lust when it is hidden (that is, when it is contested). Since there is danger on both sides, the danger of pride is greater than that of fornication.

That is why both happen. The commandment is not fulfilled spiritually as long as there is still evil desire in us; from this it comes that no one can be presumptuous about his chastity and cannot boast everywhere that he has fulfilled this commandment, but only accuse himself and confess his sin. How

Therefore, it is fulfilled by the fact that the spirit hates this evil desire. Therefore, he is completely pure from it and indeed a fulfiller of the commandment, because he agrees with the law in everything, approves of it and loves it by hating its misery.

But others, lewd people, do not hide their chastity, but rather erase it. So it is nothing that they can boast that they do not know their chastity. They do not belong here.

The second (different work) is common fornication (meretricium), which is a great evil, since unchastity passes into a way of life (habitum) and habit, which are very difficult to get rid of (curantur). For the Scripture says [Ps. 137:9], "Blessed is he that taketh his 2) young children, and dasheth them to pieces against the stone." But he who makes his young children grow to great sneezes, who makes them grow old and strong, how then can he crush them, and is not rather crushed? And parents should instill this exceedingly noble teaching of the Holy Spirit into their children, so that they will not only be kept in check by force, but also willingly drawn to chastity. For the struggle of chastity is in vain if this rule of the Holy Spirit is not kept; namely, the rock is Christ, our young children are the evil impulses, the evil desires. If someone feels them, what should he do? how should he overcome them? Listen: No other way than to smash them on the rock. How does that happen? Just as someone grinds a worm on a stone with his hand, so when the will and the thoughts touch Christ, the evil thought is immediately crushed. Just try it, and you will see how pleasant it is to crush the desires in this way; for as soon as the heart touches Christ, the crucified, all evil disappears. This is how it was once depicted in the Law, Deut. 21:9, when those bitten by fiery serpents were healed by the sight of the bronze serpent hanging on the wood. Furthermore, the fiery serpent is the slippery one.

1) Löscher: "Luther preached the following on the day of the conception of the Virgin Mary (December 8, 1516). - The Exordium Hiezu is found in Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. XII, 1788.

2) In the Vulgate and in our Bible: "your".

and gently creeping pleasure, which the thoughts pretend: Flee, flee this cruel serpent, for she inflames and makes the flesh extraordinarily horny and full of rut. So it is also said in Gen. 3:15 [Vulg.], "She [the woman] shall bruise thy head," that is, the believing soul bruises the beginning and the first stirring; otherwise, when it has grown up or slipped all in, it poisons and kills. Oh, if only we could think of the image of the poisonous creeping serpent at the time when unchastity attacks us, and apply the spiritual interpretation (mysterium) of it, then we would easily flee to Christ with our thoughts.

The third kind is defilement, that is, the weakening of a virgin, which in former times was punished more mildly in the law than simple or common fornication, because the man was required to expel her or marry her. But now it is something very great; for then virginity was an exceedingly great disgrace, but now it is a very high glory, then a damnable dishonor, but now an incomparable adornment, at least for those who have not had the intention to marry. But those who are willing to enter into marriage do not in fact have such a great adornment, but could have it if they were encouraged to virginity. Many have written wonderful things about this, because in fact no virgin can be fully restored. But understand this rightly: Against a virgin who has consented, the violator is not punished so severely (tenetur); but against her will virginity cannot be taken from her; but she can be induced to it, and so it can be taken from her.

<sup>1</sup>) The fourth type is kidnapping. This is punishable by death in the laws. It applies not only to a virgin, daughter or maid, but also to the wife or other person under his care; but the greatest offense is abduction.

1) Löscher: "Luther recited the following on the 3rd Sunday of Advent on the 14th of December in the year 1516".

of a wife. However, the abduction sometimes happens with the consent of the girl, namely when she is persuaded by flattery; sometimes against her will; this is the most serious crime. But one reads many cases where it did not go well. Guarinus of Verona has written an elegiac poem about a miserable case that happened with a certain virgin Alda. She left her parents, followed her abductor, and was finally violated and abandoned by him in a forest. As she was ashamed to return to her parents, she asked him to stab her with a sword. This he did and killed her. This sin also contains a theft, the greatest of all.

The fifth type is adultery. This is the most intricate and severe as far as punishment is concerned, but it is too much neglected nowadays. This sin is the cause of many questions concerning property rights; whether the woman should tell the man that the child is a bastard. See the Angelus in the Summa, 2) which gives rules about this. But who will dare to believe the rules, or who can put a case in bounds? For the minds of men are different; today they think so, and after a year they may think differently, even if in that year they would have patience with their wife who confesses her adultery.

But it is certainly a good reason to be angry that a man has given his body for the body of his wife, and another uses the body for which he has given his own body, for the sake of which he carries on his trade, for the sake of which he does everything, suffers; yes, even he has made himself a slave and bound himself to many things who has bound himself to a wife, and behold, another subjects himself to defile all this: who could bear this calmly? See also the law of zeal [Deut. 5:12 ff.], which once existed; now the wives are freed from it, and are no longer burdened with it; therefore they should rather cling to their husbands.

2) These 8nrmunnamed Luther in the great Interpretation of the Epistle to the Galatians (Walch, St. Louis ed., vol. IX, p32 s 168) a "devilish" one.

The sixth kind is inoostus, which is called in German "Blutschande", because it is a disgrace against the blood friendship and the kinship, to which the greater honor is due, the closer it is. For also in the law the Lord has forbidden certain degrees, and once seven degrees were forbidden. For in the law almost only the second degree of blood friendship and kinship is forbidden, because grace, which cures evil desire, did not yet exist, but the law prevailed, which stimulates and increases it.

The seventh kind is the sacrilegium, where already not only chastity is violated, but also that which was dedicated to God alone is abrogated and the sacred is profaned. But this is with the priests more according to an ordinance of the church than according to the order of God; but with those in the spiritual state (religiosus - monks and nuns) it is an exceedingly grave sin, because they have consecrated themselves voluntarily to the Lord, and again withdraw from Him.

As the eighth kind is added [by some] the excess of the spouses, as St. Ambrose is quoted in the second book against Julianus of St. Augustine: "A too hot lover of his own wife is an adulterer. Of this the apostle says 1 Thess. 4, 3. ff.: "This is the will of God, your sanctification, that you avoid fornication"; this is the first, after that: "That each one may know to keep his barrel (that is his spouse) in sanctification and honor, not in lust, as the Gentiles, who know nothing of God." And 1 Petr. 3, 7: "In like manner, ye husbands, dwell with your wives with understanding, and give honor to the female, as to the weakest instrument," 2c. of which enough has been said above. But it is difficult to give them a rule, except that it is vicious to do enough for one's lust and desire at every stirring of the flesh, for that is called being in the lust pestilence.

Now follow three other kinds: Softness, when a man stains himself while he is awake; sodomy, when a man abuses another man's wife, or a man's wife, or a man's wife; all these are too shameful to be spoken of; cattle-like nature; of which see Deut. 18:23. The other belongs in confession.

Above this are the nightly stains, which in themselves are not sinful, as the law Deut. 23, 10. f. says: If there is a man among you who is stained with semen at night, he shall go out of the camp and not return until he bathes himself with water toward evening, and after sunset he may return to the camp. This has a spiritual meaning: a person so stained (although it means something else) should abstain from the communion of saints (that is, from the sacrament) until the sun (that is, the heat and heat remaining from the stain) is at rest, and so, having washed himself by humble confession, he should enter. But this [defilement] often has a cause that is a sin, such as gluttony, idleness, intercourse with the opposite sex, or thinking about it.

Finally there are also defilements in the waking and in the daytime, but without their will, which happens to many, while they have to do with something completely different than scratching, riding, driving, that is, without them causing it. Of these the Scripture says 3 Mos. 15, 2. ff, 1) that they have a river.

<sup>2)</sup> Now follows the second stage of adultery, which consists of words, as some speak exceedingly shameful words of carnal sins, against which the apostle speaks Eph. 5, 3. f. "But fornication, and all uncleanness, or covetousness, let it not be said of you, as is fitting for the saints; neither shameful words, nor foolish things, nor jesting, which are not fitting for you, but rather thanksgiving", that is, let not the rumor arise that you are such people.

But he has put three sins of the tongue, namely in the "shameful words" that excite evil desire, that is insolence, lewdness, shamelessness in words. This is a twofold sin:

First, by those who make a laugh out of these shameful words, and who

1) Here the Weimar edition, like Walch, has the wrong citation 3 Mos. 15, 16.

2) Löscher: "Luther preached this on the 4th Sunday of Advent, December 21, 1516. - The exordium belonging to it is found in Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. XII, 1790. There, the text should not have been John I, 19. ff. but "Luc. 3, 5.

They speak, as it were, consolationem to each other, as if it were a sweet thing of which they speak. Here one does nothing but show how insolent he too can be by calling the members and the works of the members by name with all shamefulness; but another tells stories that belong to it with all insolence; then one laughs, and it is considered something quite delicious, until one finally also brings up the monks and the priests with their sins. Oh how frightfully this mischief (morbus) prevails in the inns and hostels nowadays, so that it is dangerous or at least deplorable when a clergyman or any other chaste man has to travel overland.

I beg you for God's sake, see what these people are doing. First of all, if they are Christians, as they want to be called, they should love a chaste nature so much that they would not allow such things to be called among them if they could prevent it. Secondly, they should at least be sorry if they could not. Thirdly, they should not grieve over the tales of fallen men, be they priests or monks or princes or persons in authority (for these people's faults are told all the more readily, the stronger an example they give to those who follow them, and the more licentious their conduct), in any other way than over their own fall (for this is what love demands). Yes, the higher a class is, the more one should sigh for them and ask God for them, because that would be Christian.

But now see how far away from Christian behavior these quite tasteless people are. First, not only do they not do this, which they surely owe to Christ, but second, they amuse each other with the most wicked things. Third, they tickle and provoke themselves to evil lust with these fiery darts. Fourth, they stain other people's lives and reputations with this exceedingly grave evil libel, stirring up the stench of the dead, when they should be burying the dead. Fifth, they mock their own and other people's ruin and misery and rejoice in their and other people's damnation.

I beg you, consider when the Lord says [Matth. 12, 36.] that men will have to give an account at the last judgment for every useless word they have spoken, Dear one, where will these remain? Woe, woe, how far this plague reigns!

These people are like, first, the nonsensical, yes, who is so nonsensical that he laughs and is cheerful in his misery and plague? Is not this a pity above all pity? If an ulcer or an eye hurts, the lamenting and sighing does not stop, and everyone has lost his laughter so completely that he hates and detests even those who laugh as the most wicked people; one looks only for one who has compassion and helps or gives good advice. But behold, when the flesh tickles, even the conscience suffers the most grievous pains, furthermore your own soul or that of another, your neighbor, falls away: there is so little search for one who has compassion or gives counsel, so little sorrow is borne and sighed, that even he who has compassion and wants to counsel or hinder is mocked, despised and hated. Great God, when will we open our eyes to see what the world is? Is this not perversity beyond all measure? Is not unchastity the worst of all wounds? Is it not a boil and a plague above all boil and plague? As Jeremiah, Cap. 10, 19, says: "Oh, my sorrow and heartache! But I think it is my plague, I must suffer it." And Isaiah, Cap. 1:6, says of the people of Israel, "The wounds, and the welts, and the boils, are not healed, nor bound up, nor soothed with oil," and again, "From the sole of the foot even to the crown of the head there is nothing sound in him." These are plagues and wounds inflicted not by man but by the devil. See then, a wound made by a man is lamented, but one made by the devil is laughed at and thought to be something quite lovely. But ah, that it is taken for something lovely! But blessed is he who recognizes the wound and realizes that it is a bitter wound, as it really is. For although its bitterness is not felt, it is at last extraordinarily felt in the conscience.

to be perceived as unpleasant. Therefore it says Prov. 5, 2. ff. (Vulg.): "Be not carried away by the deceit of a woman (that is, of the flesh and sensuality), for the lips of the harlot are sweet as honey, and her throat is smoother than oil; but afterwards bitter as wormwood, and sharp as a two-edged sword. And Cap. 23, 31. f.: "It [wine] enters smoothly, but afterward it bites like a serpent and stings like an adder." Therefore we are to learn from God that to joke with such words, to laugh at them, to rejoice in them, is the same as to rejoice in one's own death and sorrow, which only a nonsensical person does, or one who is more than nonsensical.

Secondly, they are like him of whom it is written in Marci 5:2 ff. and Luc 8:27 ff. that he was possessed by a legion [of devils], who wore no clothes, nor abode in any heap, but in the tombs; and being bound with chains and taken into custody, he broke the chains, and was driven of the devil into the wilderness, and was day and night in the tombs and in the mountains, crying out, and smote himself with stones. I hope that if those who speak shamefully would see that their vice is described in this man, they would be more afraid. For what is it that he was naked, but that a man who speaks shameful words also exposes his own shame with words, when he should rather cover it, that he might be healed? Then he does not remain in the house, that is, with the living, and has to do with the affairs of the living, but in the graves, and has to do with the dead, that is, he tells the vices and evil deeds of others, and lives and weaves in them completely. For a grave, spiritually interpreted, is the memorial sign of a dead person, that is, the evil reputation and the nasty story of a sinner, namely a prince, monk, priest 2c. Likewise, he beats himself with stones and cries out, that is, he harms himself, thinking to benefit himself most and in a pleasant way. Thus it is said in Isa. 3:9, "They have not concealed their sin, but have gloried in it, as they did in Sodom." Although this is said of Pharisaic righteousness in spirit, it belongs to but also according to the letter here. Likewise, he has a legion [of devils], so that no one can pass by there because of their rage, that is, they do the work of many devils by harming many people. And where they flatter the most, there they are the most cruel, so that no one can deal with them without danger, as I also said above. But I know that no one is so foolish and senseless that he could laugh if he saw such a man, but he would rather flee as far as he could: and yet he laughs, and one laughs at him, whose figure that man has only been. Finally, this was also said there, that he could not be held with chains and custody, yes, that he broke the bonds, and was driven into the deserts; no one could restrain him. This almost agrees with the apostle Jacob [Jac. 3, 8]: "No man can tame the tongue." So they let themselves be restrained by no man's prohibition, by no words of the Gospel, that they should not "break forth" with an untamed tongue, and roam about where they are wont to roam, naked and torn, and uncover and tear other people in like manner. And that I also speak out roughly against this quite abominable vice: Are not the pigs unclean animals, because they eat human dung? But those people dig with tongue and teeth in their own and other people's dung. Is the dung of the body worse than the dung of the soul? For one must speak to the sows in a filthy way, so that they understand. Now when you see a swine eating filth, think: Behold, a man speaking filthy and shameful words is such a beast. The apostle says very rightly [1 Cor. 12:23] that we do the most honor to the most dishonest members, but those also dishonor the honest members by the dishonest. But who could suffer another to expose his backside or his shame or his disgrace to him with laughter? But what shame is greater than the disgrace of sins against us and our neighbor? But the law has forbidden [Deut. 18] that we should not expose our neighbor's shame.

Secondly, it is also sinned by impolite speech when such things are said in front of innocent people.

Boys and girls are called and talked about. But they find guilty of all the sins and all the blood (mortium) that results from it. For the tender age, inexperienced in such things, is exceedingly easily stained, and, what is worst, it retains very firmly such shameful things as it has heard, just as a stain that comes into a clean and tender garment adheres more firmly than when it comes onto an unclean or coarser stuff, which also the heathen have learned from experience, as Horace says: A new pot long retains the odor of that which is first put into it, and Juvenal: If thou undertake anything shameful, beware with all diligence lest a child be offended thereby; do not despise his youth.

But what do those do who are guilty of this? First of all, since it is a very good thing to take good care of the tender age, to preserve and promote it in chastity and a shamefaced manner, as it is said that it is the most pleasing sacrifice to God, to take care of the souls diligently, all should certainly take the greatest care and watch over it, that they guard and protect the boys and girls, so that they do not learn, see and hear anything that is lewd, since they are already full of heat in their innermost marrow, and one must not be careful how one only adds fire and ignites them, but rather that one pours water over them and extinguishes them. But not only do they not do this, but they also do the devil's real work and corrupt innocent souls with their poisonous talk of shameful things. For the devil is called a corrupter of souls, but he corrupts them no other way than through the service of the tongue of those people who adhere to him and follow him. For how can a boy or a girl eradicate a shameful word that he has once heard? but the seed is sown and takes root in the heart even against his will; after that it grows into strange and weird (incognitas) thoughts, which he does not dare to confess, and yet does not know how to get rid of them. But woe to you who poured this burden, this danger and this poison into this simple mind that did not know such things!

You have done no violence to the body, but the soul, which is incomparably more noble, you have defiled (as much as is in you). For through the ear you have poured it into him and impregnated his soul with the most harmful fruit (foetu). Therefore Baptista of Mantua says: Through the senses, as it were as streams, Venus pours her sharp poison into the mind; if this has taken it carelessly, it causes a wound that can only be healed by the power (dextra) of the deity.

Therefore, the shamefulness (obscoenitas) of these people is greater than those who were mentioned before, because it is not shamefulness but the murder of innocent souls, and they belong to the family of Herod, who killed many children in Bethlehem Judah [Matth. 2, 16]. But behold, is it not so that no father could suffer his children to be slain after the body? Since you did not want it to happen to you in the bodies of your children, why do you dare to do this to the souls of the children of another, even to the children of God? Saint Louis, King of France, learned from his mother that she would rather see her children killed in the flesh than commit a mortal sin. For in this way his mother had also spoken to him.

But the Lord threatens such people in a terrible way, Matt. 18:6, when he speaks the terrible words: "But whoever offends one of these least ones who believe in me, it would be better for him if a millstone were hung around his neck and he were drowned in the deepest part of the sea. See how Christ takes care of the little and innocent children with great concern, that he also ordains a new punishment for those who give them offense; for for no one else did he lay down such a punishment, namely, in expressing his will that they should be martyred before others with a new and peculiar punishment. Then follows [Matth. 18, 7.]: "Woe to the world because of trouble! Trouble must come, but woe to the man by whom trouble comes." And afterwards [v. 10.], "Take heed that ye despise not one of these little ones. For I say unto you: Their angels in heaven always behold the face of my Father in heaven." See, he wants that at least out of consideration for the angels of the children one should spare and show restraint towards them. Now if someone wanted to call such people chaste because they play with words, but are in fact chaste, just as their father Ovid lies: "Believe me, my life is quite different from my poems: My life is honorable, my muse jokes, Christ answers and shuts them up [Matth. 12, 34.]: "When the heart is full, the mouth overflows. As the tree, so the leaves.

This is also the cause of the degenerate state of the church altogether; for if it is ever to flourish again, it is necessary to begin by instructing the children. This is said of the shameful words. But that one speaks here also of "foolish things" and "jesting" [Eph. 5:4] does not belong here, although these two things are now so much in vogue among the most respectable and God-fearing people (religiosissimos) that they want to be considered respectable precisely by that, by which they show that they are doing foolish things and useless jesting.

But "foolish fables" are all useless fables, in which there is no instruction and knowledge (scientiae), as he himself interprets it and says [Eph. 5, 4. Vulg.]: "which do not serve the cause". Christ calls the same "useless words"; therefore one should only speak useful or necessary things. Such are the old wives' tales and the ludicrous farces, the histories of the priest of Kalenberg, Dietrich of Bern and all kinds of talk (disputationes) about things that are far from us and out of our reach. The opinions of the philosophers and the glosses on Aristotle, the chatter about dialectics, and the dreams of the astrologers are also of this kind. For he calls these things "foolish things," because they are words not of wisdom but of foolishness.

Eutrapelia, or "jest," is witty (facetia) or fine conversation (urbanitas), which Aristotle considers a virtue, namely, when things are said that are neither disgraceful nor foolish, but at the same time pleasant and instructive, so that among the amiable intercourse there is also usefulness. Therefore, such an attitude is

It is commendable that the conversation or loquacity, or fine conversation or humorous speech, which is done in order to lift up in the spirit the sorrowful and the afflicted; but that which is done without cause, only to gratify vanity and the flesh, especially since only frivolity is the cause of it, and only the desire to gossip and laugh moves one to it, does not befit Christians. So also St. Augustine says in his "Confessions" that it is not at all Christian to make jokes with friends; that the Christian's nature and words must have to do with well-founded and great serious things, which require a full seriousness and reliability (autoritatem), as the Psalm [Ps. 35, 18. Vulg.] says: "Among a serious people I will praise you." Further, this buffoonery and jesting becomes the more wicked the more sacred the things in which it moves, as then some with the most brazen levity abuse the sayings of sacred Scripture for this shameful activity, twisting it in a ridiculous and witty manner (jucunde) to where they seek their vanity, while yet these sacred words are always and everywhere due the highest reverence and fear.

1) The third level of adultery is that which consists in gestures, one of which the Lord expressed when he said [Matth. 5, 28.]: "Whoever looks at a woman to lust after her" 2c. Behold, even looking, which is a sign of evil desire, is adultery. Is not this law of Christ very hard? But for this reason it is exceedingly wholesome and undefiled and converts souls. But in this gift all others are understood, since sight is the smallest and most subtle sign. Therefore, some have made five subdivisions (lineas) of love: seeing, speaking, touching, then kissing and doing. And here is also understood another talking than the shameful talking, likewise also another touching, likewise also kissing. But we want to deal with the individual pieces more extensively. But there are more than seeing, hearing and talking,

1) Löschner: "The following was spoken by Luther on the day of Thomas [the 21st of December in the year 1516." - The Exordium Hiezu is found in Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. XII, 1794.

Letters, intertricks, groping, embracing, laughing, kissing, but not as if there were as many adulteries as someone gave signs; for someone in one adultery can show all these signs: otherwise the work itself would always be a triple adultery, since it does not happen without touching and evil desire.

The appearance is therefore the first. This is the quickest and most frequent of all these signs, because it does its work far and wide and quickly, and perceives very much and very clearly. This is why so much is said in Scripture about taking care of the eyes, since no sense is so easily irritated by so many objects, nor any other sense so horribly wounds the soul; for the clearer the eye perceives a thing, the more deeply it fixes it in the heart, so that there is also the saying: What the eye sees, the heart believes. And Horace says: That which is delivered by the ear excites less than that which the reliable eyes see; and again: It delights more 2c., as is evident from experience, because he who hears of death is not so moved as he who sees it, nor he who hears shameful, carnal, and worldly things so much as he who sees them. As an example may serve Alipius, the comrade of St. Augustine, about whom he writes in the 6th book of the "Confessions" that he was led to the spectacle against his will, and closed his eyes, because he despised it: nevertheless, when he opened his eyes afterwards, he was so carried away by it that he himself added many afterwards.

Therefore, just as it is the highest adornment for young men and virgins to lower and cast down their eyes, so it is something extremely reprehensible if they let them wander and do not keep them, so that some say that it is a sign of corruptionis that they let their eyes wander; and this is true. Sirach 26, 12. [Vulg.] it is said, "A hurish woman is known by the bold lifting up of her eyes, and by her eyelids." 2c. See there. Either it is a sign of a woman who has already fallen, or of one who can very easily be brought down; for a woman who is in truth chaste stares

The woman does not look a man in the face, but becomes coy, as it is written about Rebekah in Genesis 24:64 ff. that as soon as she saw her bridegroom Isaac, she took her veil and covered herself.

Similarly, one reads of a holy man who closed his eyes when he came to Rome with St. Anthony and did not want to see anything of this great city except the church of St. Peter. Similarly, one reads of Sylvanus that he always walked with his eyes covered and did not want to look at the sun. Likewise Job says, Cap. 31, 1: "I made a covenant with my eyes that I would not look at a virgin," that is, a young girl.

But when Dinah went out [Gen. 34:1 ff] to see the women of the land, she was put to shame. And since Bernard had looked at a certain woman rigidly, he punished himself very severely because of it. And St. Benedict was very severely challenged by the fact that he had seen a woman while he was still in secular life (saeculo). Likewise, what did David encounter when he looked at Bathsheba [2 Sam. 11:2], and the children of Israel when they looked at the Moabite women [4 Mos. 25:1 ff]? Likewise, when another was offended by the sight of a woman, and heard that she was dead, he cured his evil desire by the stench of her corpse.

Therefore, not only does the image of the present excite evil desire, but also the impression of past things remains firmly and long in the memory, and causes strange temptations. That is why Jeremiah says in Lamentations, Cap. 3, 51: "My eye eats away my life," and again Jer. 9, 21: "Death has fallen in at our windows," and 2 Pet. 2, 14: "They have eyes full of adultery." See how he shreds adultery into the eyes. Likewise Eve [Gen. 3, 6.] was first moved by the sight of the apple, that it might be lovely to behold 2c. And of the children of God it is written in Genesis 6:2 that they fell by sight, for it is said, "Then the children of God looked upon the daughters of men as they were fair, and took them wives whom they would." Therefore also the wise man teaches [Sir. 9, 5]:

Do not look into the face of a virgin, lest her beautiful appearance disgrace you. Again, a girl should not look into the face of a young man, because of the same danger.

Therefore John says [1 John 2:16]: "that all that is in the world is the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the life of hope. By "the lust of the eyes" is meant the desire to experience and know many things through the senses.

One reads of Saint Elizabeth that she was suddenly punished by the Lord when she once looked at her husband lustfully (jucunde) in church. What will happen to those who do almost nothing else in church than what Ovid says: They come to see, they come to be seen; nothing but to see, to be seen, to desire, to be desired? But it is, of course, by a kind of natural disposition, peculiar to women that they want to be desired and loved, and peculiar to men that they desire and love, although it also happens the other way around, that a woman madly desires and loves, but a man seeks to be desired and loved.

It is therefore a strange misery that our own senses are so harmful to us, so that Christ says with truth [Matth. 10, 36.]: "A man's enemies are his own household" (that is, his senses), and the 38th Psalm [v. 12.]: "My loved ones and friends stand against me." For what does the forwardness of the eyes do but contend against the soul? Therefore St. Augustine also calls sensuality a serpent, because it is slippery and easily moved by many objects, which is represented by the serpent in Paradise. Therefore, see that Christ did not teach in vain in the Gospel that we should hate and deny ourselves, that we should hate our eyes and all senses and all members, because they take the soul captive to the law of sin, especially the eyes. Hence says Sirach, Cap. 31, 15. [Vulg.], "What is more mischievous created than the eye?"

But it is not only that which evil desire does through the eye that is evil, but also that it is not satiated, as Ecclesiastes says Cap. 1, 8: "The eye looks at itself.

and Prov. 27:20: "Hell and destruction are never full, and the eyes of men are not satisfied. What is the use, then, of appealing to the lust of the eyes, and when the beginning of sight is ended, of producing an endless desire which has no end? It is better that you immediately keep the eye (visum) in check from the beginning, before it opens the maw of its desire so wide that you cannot fill it.

Therefore, as St. Augustine says in his Rule: "Do not say that you have chaste hearts when you have unchaste eyes. For an unchaste eye is the indication (nuncius) of an unchaste heart. Let no one therefore presume that he is not an adulterer, if he does not perform the work, but yet covets with the eye.

Let this be said of the first and greatest sign.

The other is hearing, by which is indicated the evil desire that burns within. To these belong those who either provoke shameful things to be said or sung (and these are the most wicked), or who listen quietly and gladly, even if they do not give occasion for it; for they delight in these things, nor do they turn away from them as from an impurity and a harmful thing. The third would be those who do not prevent such things, do not punish those who listen to them or teach them better things, do not confront and rebuke people, and show their abhorrence of such things to frighten those who listen. Namely, these sin by omission, because they are not concerned about the blessedness of their neighbor, and do not care to pull him out of his ruin, and are less careful than they should be.

The third is talking, namely with a woman or with a man. For the evil desire brings about that they chat with each other, show each other courtesies (salu (tent), to make a fuss with each other; although these are sometimes honorable things, they are not done for honorable reasons. For that is where the laughter, the jokes, the gossip, the conversation comes from, just so that they please each other and make each other feel good.

Love irritates. And women suffer greatly from this fault when they love. But with a girl not only this talking, but absolutely all talkativeness is very indecent (turpissima). Nor is it a sign of constant virginity or chastity when a girl is garrulous and talkative, especially with young men. For behold, when the holy virgin was addressed by the angel with such a great text [Luc. 1, 28.], she said nothing more than this [v. 34.): "How shall this be?" 2c., but, as St. Ambrose says, she did not even return his greeting. Therefore, what do the girls (quae), who like to be heard with their singing or talking, and in turn hear the singing or talking of the opposite sex, do other than prove that they burn with evil desire for that sex? If they did not burn, they would not care for the conversation or seek to see it, as they do not care for other things to which they are not attracted by any inclination. But now most girls seek it with great (tota) levity.

The fourth is touching, as there is the giving of the hands and the grasping, which can also happen honorably according to the appearance, but in that the evil desire is stirred up inside. Here the fire of unchastity is fiercely kindled, so that St. Jerome also says that the evil desire immediately recognizes the sex by touching. Therefore, one must avoid touching as much as possible, as one reads of a priest (I do not remember the name now) that he had his hand cut off when he, as is the custom, offered his hand for kissing, and felt a tickle by the kiss of a woman.

The fifth is kissing. Let's skip that one.

These signs, however, are nowhere more in the swing and in a coarser way than at the public dances. One must wonder how many and how great sins occur there, what sight and hearing catch, what touching and speaking produce. In short, world is world, yes, impure 1) and an enemy of God, and one must not seek anything good to please God in the world: there one drives and heaps sin upon sin, there one sees the wrath of God beyond measure; yet one laughs, dances and is merry, as if they were quite harmless things, yes, good and useful.

The sixth sign, which is no small one, is the foreign and new adornment, which is now eagerly brought about by so many inventions, arts and efforts that one cannot but say: the world is mad, while there is no other cause than that they want to please and make themselves like the world. For necessity or usefulness, yes, even respectability, which alone are just causes [to adorn oneself], does not require such things, but is satisfied with moderate (adornment). But who can sufficiently speak of those things, since they are quite outrageous kinds of expense and dress? But these things are a violent evil and a tinder of unchastity; although one does not care about them. I believe that at last they will go naked, since they already go half naked. But let go, our customs will also have their time: The wrath of God has finally come upon the world [1 Thess. 2, 16.], and good to him who recognizes that the wrath of God has in truth already come upon those people.

I will also pass over the lovers here, that is the nonsensical, 2) madness, who with nightly service wait on their lovers with play, song and music, and offer everything so that they please them, because the world also judges that it is exceedingly great fool's work; therefore we will pass over it.

Finally, the fourth stage is the inward evil air itself, of which enough has been said above. No one is without it in this life, but we are saved by not giving in to it, as it says in Rom. 6:13, 12: "Neither commit your members to serve sin, to obey it in its lusts." For although the completely pure (immaculata) law of God demands that there should be absolutely no evil lust, but a complete and completely un-

3) "msntium - "Montium, a play on words.

In the meantime, God's mercy bears with us and is pleased that the new man fights against it inwardly, so that all unrighteousness does not reign over us. This must be killed over and over again by groaning, watching, work, prayer, humiliation and other parts of the cross, finally also by death.

From all these things it is evident that this commandment does not only forbid, as it can be seen from the words and the letter, but forbids in the strongest way, namely because it forbids chastity and a completely pure abstinence, inwardly and outwardly. But who would be so foolish as to deny that chastity is something that exists in itself (rem affirmativam)? But it is commanded in a negative way, since unchastity is forbidden, so that it may be understood that it is commanded purely, without all admixture of unchastity, as the 12th Psalm, v. 7, says: "The speech of the Lord is pure as silver refined through, proved in the earthen crucible seven times."

But by this it is now clear how through the law comes knowledge of sin [Rom. 3, 20.], for I did not have to say that evil desire was sin, "where the law did not say, Let not thy desire be" [Rom. 7, 7.], namely because the work alone was considered sin. Therefore it is not enough that you do not break the marriage with the work, not enough that you are chaste in words, and with reputation or any other gift; yes, even that is not enough that you do not consent with the heart, if you do not also finally become pure from all evil impulses that bubble up inside. Therefore nothing else remains but that you sigh for the grace of God with the apostle, Rom. 7, 24: "I wretched man, who will deliver me from the body of this death?"

The seventh commandment follows.

1) It should be read here with our Bible and with the Vulgate: cts corporis mortis Kusus. In contrast, all editions offer: äs worts eorporis Kusus, and even the old translation: "from the death of this body".

The seventh commandment.

You shall not steal.

2) We have heard that the fifth commandment: "Thou shalt not kill" forbids the harm (offensionem) of the neighbor to his own person, but the sixth: "Thou shalt not commit adultery", not to harm him in the person who is joined to him and One flesh with him, and both in deed and me in heart, both in thought (affectu) and deed (effectu), so that it is quite evident that the spiritual sense of these prohibitions is the commandment that we should be meek and chaste, inwardly and outwardly, wholly without all bitterness of anger and without the pleasant sensation (dulcedine).

2) Löscher: "The following was preached by Luther on the third day of Christmas lb'or. III. xativ, the 27th of Decembers 1516 preached." The Exordium Hiezu is found in the St. Louis edition, vol. X, 198 and (duplicate) vol. XII, 1800, in both places with the wrong time designation: "Am zweiten Weihnachtstage." The text is that of the third day of Christmas. (Weim. ed. I, 115.)

the evil desire. These two things cannot be had without the love of the spirit, because they are fruits of the spirit, 1 Cor. 43, 1. ff. and Gal. 5, 44. Therefore the love of the law is fulfillment [Rom. 43, 40.]. For it is gentle and does no harm to anyone, but benefits all and desires to be of service to all. It is also chaste and holy; therefore it defiles no one.

Now follows the prohibition that one should not harm one's neighbor's goods, which likewise cannot happen without love, at least in the spirit. Therefore, it should be noted that this commandment is understood in two ways:

First, according to the letter and the wording. Thus, only the work of stealing itself is forbidden here, for it says, "Thou shalt not steal." It does not say: You shall not teach [theft], you shall not instruct [it], you shall not desire [it], but you shall not do it. This is how the Jews understood it, and they are h offährtig ge-in their own righteousness, as if they were not guilty of any transgression. Therefore, when Christ Himself stated the right understanding of this commandment in Luc. 16, 9. 13. and said: "You cannot serve God together with mammon", and: "Make friends with the unrighteous mammon", the Pharisees, who were stingy, heard all this and ridiculed Him, and He said to them [V. 15.], "It is you who justify yourselves before men, but GOD knows your hearts; for what is high among men is an abomination in the sight of GOD." See how He requires hearts in justification, which comes from His commandments. Finally it follows how the law is spiritual, since he says: "The law and the prophets prophesy until John; and from that time the kingdom of God is preached through the gospel, and everyone enters it by force. But it is easier for heaven and earth to perish than for one tittle to fall from the law." Behold, "doing violence" is necessary in God's commandments, for not only shall not the bowl of words perish, but not one tittle shall perish 2c.

Secondly, according to the spirit and the intention of the one who has it. According to this, he forbids here all desire of the heart in such a way that it is impossible for you to fulfill it unless you are spiritually poor, as it says Matth. 5, 3: "Blessed are the spiritually poor." That is why Christ's faithful are called "poor" in the Psalms, as it were, by their own name. Ps. 10, 2. [Vulg.]: "Because the wicked man is rash, the poor man must suffer." And again [Ps. 9, 10. 1: "And the LORD is the poor man's refuge," and [Ps. 9, 19.): "For he will not so wholly forget the poor man; the hope of the wretched (pauperum) shall not be lost for ever." Therefore, the spirit of this letter is poverty in spirit. Therefore, it is quite obvious that no one fulfills this law without the grace of God, since man is covetous by nature, for which the first sin is to blame.

Corollary.

It follows that the fulfillment of this law in its letter is nothing but a kind of self-deception, as it says Ps. 5:10 [Vulg.]: "Because in their mouth is not the truth.

so their heart is vain." In the Hebrew it is said: "Because in their mouth is not what is right," namely because in this commandment he teaches only the shadow and the letter of the work, "so their inside is falsehood" (insidiae), because they deceive themselves, thinking they are righteous, deceived by the appearance of works, so that they do not recognize the evil of their covetousness, therefore they do not sigh for mercy, nor confess their sin, but live along in security (stant). Therefore Paul says against them Rom. 2, 21: "You preach that one should not steal, and you steal", namely through desire, even if not in works.

The jurists, however, do not interpret this commandment as extending so far, but remain within the limits of theft; but before God all that is called doing, with which the will has to create, even if the work should not follow. For God tests the kidneys and hearts, Ps. 7, 10. Therefore, we must go over the whole area (latitudinem) of the works that lust has in its wake. But oh, dear GOD, how far does this extend! For who has not heard the many complaints about avarice and its various kinds?

The first work now according to the wording of the text is the theft itself. This is again divided into five types, namely simple theft, theft from the church, embezzlement of funds, driving away livestock, and theft of human beings, which the lawyers deal with. For this commandment they do according to the letter exceedingly abundantly and carefully in all its kinds, as their own speech testifies that the legal faculty has to do with the acquisition of bread: Take away mine and thine, then no more right is necessary; and indeed this desire [of other people's property] gives these people an infinite amount of trouble. Now theft is the appropriation of another's property against the will and without the knowledge of its master. If this is done with the goods of private persons, it is simple theft; if it is done with sacred things, it is sacrilege; if it is done with public property, it is peculatus; if it is done by taking livestock and other animals, it is abigeatus; if people are taken away, it is plagiatus. As is well known, the laws of today punish

In ancient times, however, the law did not make theft punishable by death, as we read in Exodus 22:1,4, but for a sheep four were given back, and for an ox five, but only if the stolen animal had been sold or killed; but if it was found with him still intact, only two times as much was given back; but if he could not give this back, he was sold. This law would certainly be good even now; for it is too severe, not to say unjust, that one should take life for the sake of good, and the soul for that which is for subsistence. "Is not the body better than raiment, and the life more than meat?" [Matth. 6, 25.] Hence also the Proverbs Cap. 6, 30. ff., which follow the law of Moses [Vulg.], say, "It is not a grievous fault if a man steal," and this is true if it be theft alone. Hence it follows what kind of theft he means, since he says, "For he steals to satisfy his soul, because he hungers. And if he be apprehended, he restituteth it sevenfold, and layeth up all the goods of his house, and can make himself free: but he that is an adulterer, because his heart is poor, shall bring his life to destruction." But adultery is nowadays punished quite mildly, which is certainly quite unreasonable; theft is punished immensely severely; this should be much more mitigated than that of adultery, especially for theft that occurs because of bodily lack and poverty.

Furthermore, the theft of the church is punished even more cruelly than all, namely with the wheel, while a sacred thing and a secular one are the same, as far as the value and the use are concerned; but because the reverence for the sacred is put out of sight, such a severe punishment is applied. But here, too, there is a superstitious severity among the superiors, who thunder and curse against nothing so much as against those who steal their wretched things (regularum), their income, their possessions, namely gold and silver. Here they have a hundred times as many eyes as [the hundred-eyed] Argus, and are more watchful than the most watchful. But that meanwhile so many thousands of souls are neglected, that they pollute the whole church by profanation, adultery, and other shameful fornications, besides the pool of their insatiable avarice, with their simony, and intrigues, and innumerable frauds: this no one punishes, but rather those are held in honor who do such things. Or do they perhaps punish the lesser things so severely for the sake of it, because it is not for them to punish such serious things, but it is for God to punish them most severely? And I believe that it is certainly true that the harsher they apply the same in lesser things, the harsher punishment God reserves for Himself in the exceedingly severe things. How much safer they would be if they spared the thieves and the church robbers, as they wanted God to spare them. But if they spared them, then they would certainly be forced by poverty to lead a better life. Therefore, they do not spare, so that God will not spare them. But let them go, they are blind. For the other three types of theft, I refer you to the jurists who deal with civil law.

The second work is highway robbery, which is a much more serious crime than theft, because it does not happen because the lord [of the estate] knows nothing about it, but in his presence, and with obvious violence robs foreign property. But these are rather to be called robbers (raptores) than murderers (latrones), because latrocinium includes murder in itself. This sin, however, is now an adornment and a title of honor among nobles, and is sometimes punished in those who cannot defend themselves or offer resistance. Merchants know this sin well enough and know how serious it is, namely those who have already had to suffer from it.

The third work is usury, of which the Roman censor Cato said: The small (privati) thieves must spend their lives in prison and fetters, but the great (publici) thieves go in gold and purple. Therefore a usurer is called a blood hedgehog of the people, and he is described by this simile: As a worm in an apple or a soot destroys the whole inside, so a usurer devours the fortune of a city.

in many strange and secret ways. The Jews suffer from this vice so much that they think they are allowed to do it, even that they are commanded to do it in the law, where it says Deut. 23:19 ff: "Thou shalt not usury in thy brother, neither with money, nor with food, nor with anything that is usurious, but in a stranger; but unto thy brother thou shalt lend all that he hath need of, without usury." At that time, the Jews were allowed to do this for the sake of their hardness, so that they would be all the more willing to refrain from usury against the Jews, since they could practice it very freely against the Gentiles. But the Christians are considerably worse than the Jews, because they also usurp their brethren; and this evil is so common that in the 15th Psalm [v. 5] it is also cited as a rare praise of the righteous, that he does not give his money to usury. Now when many abstain from it, they do so out of fear, not from the heart, for avarice is an exceedingly deep corruption.

The fourth work is deception in trade. It is written in 1 Thess. 4, 6: "Let no man defraud his brother in trade, for the Lord is the avenger of them all. But this extends so far that it cannot be shown now in the individual pieces, for how could I remember all the individual dealings and trades, how one does too much in them, remains in the right middle, or does too little?

Therefore, the rule of love, which the Lord gives in Matthew 7:12, should be observed by all in general: "Whatever you want people to do to you, do it to them. Therefore it is necessary that each one, in everything he does, first see how he would like it to be done to him if he were in another's place, and act in such a way, and then he will be safe. This is called the law of nature; indeed, it is the law of love. For it is love that looks at what is in the other's place, and first considers what he would like to be done to him, so that he may do the same to his neighbor. For this reason the Lord added this to his speech: "This is the law and the prophets," for the law and the prophets are fulfilled by love alone. Therefore, when sman says that] it is a law of nature, the healthy and uncorrupted nature will which is the same as love. But he who does not observe this rule easily commits fraud before he realizes it, because in all business there is a danger that fidelity will be violated if it is not kept with all power (vi aliqua) and with diligence alone.

But how many scams there are nowadays! Every house and every alley is full of them, and everyone complains about it. For even the peasants, who are otherwise simple-minded, are very skilled in cheating. And indeed, this one commandment alone sufficiently shows what the world is, that it is nothing but one robbing another of his goods. And, what is still more to be deplored, deception has become so common that people do not even feel conscience about it, even think that they have done something good when one has deceived and cheated the other. But woe to the world!

So now go through all the individual transactions in their work (officia artium) and count the frauds, since new ones are invented every day, so that it is something very dangerous to have dealings with people: they turn the light into darkness and the darkness into light. Yes, it has come to the point that all sellers demand more and the buyers offer less than the thing is actually worth, namely because no one believes the other's word, since it is the custom for one to deceive the other.

But what is said of the works of this commandment and of its spiritual meaning, namely that poverty of spirit is its true intention, so that the insatiable beast may be killed, the cursed hunger for gold, avarice, the love of money and greed for money, the root of all evil, as the apostle says [1 Tim. 6, 10.], which today has laid innumerable snares and is making more and more of them, is not to be understood from poverty in fact, but according to the disposition to it (affectu). For even beggars and monks can be very rich in their covetousness and inward avarice, and before God the greatest thieves, envying those who have something and coveting their goods. And the apostle calls [Col. 3, 5.] this vice idolatry, as also the 78th Psalm [v. 58. Ps. 106, 36.] says that they worship idols.

(sculptilibus) Canaan served, that is, the pennies. For Canaan is called a merchant and a trader; now how could we believe that by his idols (sculptilia,) something other than gold and silver, which is melted, coined and minted together, is represented?

Finally, that the worshippers of gold are also the servants of it, is also shown by the 76th Psalm [v. 6. Vulg.], where it says: "And all the men of wealth found nothing in their hands." He does not say: riches of men, but "men of riches," so that you understand that the men are possessed [of riches] (possessors viros) who possess riches (possidentes divitias); those serve, this one is served; therefore those are servants, this one the master. 1)

Since this vice is exceedingly well known to all, I will now briefly summarize the matter in conclusion. This commandment is fulfilled if you not only abstain from the work, yes, it is also not enough that you do not desire with your heart, but it [is necessary that you also] bear it quite indifferently if someone takes away what is yours. For it is of no use if you do not desire other people's good, but love yours in an ungodly way. Just as in the fifth commandment a man can be a murderer in himself, even if he kills no one else, or is angry with no one, and in the sixth commandment he can be an adulterer with his own wife, as has been said, so also in his own goods he can be a thief and a miser, by loving his own too much. But who should not believe that a man who kills himself will not also kill another, or at least not grant him life? and whoever abuses his own wife to unchastity, who should not assume of him that he will also defile another, at least in his evil lust, since he is completely raging with unchastity? In the same way, who will believe that he who loves his own too much does not also desire other people's good? Therefore, a man should behave quite indifferently with regard to any goods.

1) This paragraph is missing in the old translation; perhaps because of the difficulty. For also otherwise difficult passages are omitted.

(neuter esse): he shall not grieve when they are lost, he shall not rejoice when he obtains them, according to the words of the 62nd Psalm [v. 11. Vulg.]: "Rely not on injustice, nor set your desire on robbery; if riches come to you, do not set your heart on them." But this the corrupt nature cannot do, but must fetch it from Christ, who became poor for us.

Yes, a man should not stop at this stage either, but also see to it that he is much more willing to share his goods with others than to covet other people's goods; for this brings about love, which alone fulfills the law, that he not only keep completely away from his neighbor's goods, but also becomes his neighbor by sharing his goods if he can. For there is no doubt that everyone would like people to act in this way toward him, namely, to share with him, and that no one should desire what is his own, but should grant him everything with a sincere heart. And in this commandment, which is given for such intricate dealings, no better rule can be given than that each one, in all that he has to do with his neighbor, should first of all keep in mind this word of Christ, which is the spiritual interpretation of all commandments [Matth. 7:12], "Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them"; and the saying of Tobias [Tob. 4:16], "Do not do unto others as you would not have them do unto you." For anyone who considers this will easily be able to see what and how he should do in any case that may arise in connection with this all-encompassing commandment. For if thou grant thyself riches, but not thy neighbor, then thou hast already no love, but evil desire, and hast sinned against this commandment. For you are a thief before God, because you have taken from your neighbor what you owe him, namely, that you grant him his goods.

From this it is evident how many people have an abhorrence of thieves and theft, who are themselves much greater thieves, since without grace there can be no one whose heart is not defiled by avarice. But those thieves the emperor hangs, these however the creator of all things will spoil. Therefore, this commandment is not only a prohibition, but also a commandment.

The commandment is exceedingly strong, namely, that man should be charitable, willing to give and generous toward his neighbor; but he cannot be like this if he is not completely pure in spirit from theft. Therefore, this prohibition is stronger than if it were in the form of a commandment, since someone could be generous, namely, when he begins to fulfill this commandment (ut in statu incipientium), but not yet without covetousness (for other people's goods); therefore, he does not yet fulfill this law perfectly. A perfect fulfiller of the commandment must be generous out of a pure heart. 1)

2) The question is also raised whether gamblers are thieves and must return what they have won. That gamblers sin through covetousness and greed (at least those who gamble for the sake of gain), and are therefore thieves before God and covet other people's goods, is quite obvious. For no one plays with another because he wants to give him what is his (for he could do that even without playing), nor so that he might lose what is his, nor to seek the other's benefit as if it were his own, and therefore the play is always contrary to love and proceeds in evil covetousness, for he seeks his own with the other's harm, or at least what is the other's, not as his own. But still he is not held to restitution, because he does not steal from men, nor does he take other people's goods against the will of the master, who rather gave his consent to this by the agreement that they wanted to play (per pactum ludi). For both put their own at risk with knowledge and will, therefore the losing party loses with knowledge and will. For it is a quite just law that he who loves danger perishes in it, if they do not play fraudulently. But the best punishment would be, if it could happen that both of them because this would be the right of the game, since each of them gives free rein to his lust against his neighbor at his own risk; or at least that the treasury (fiscus principalis) would deprive both of their profit, because by gambling they act against the commandment [of the prince] and the spiritual law of the church. But it is obvious that it is not necessary to return such things, because there would be no other cause for it than that such profit is obtained with sin and against the law. But if all such things were to be restored that are obtained with sins, then also the whores would have to give back their profit, yes, everything would have to be restored by the merchants and traders that is sold or bought with lies, false deception (whereby, by the way, deception against one's neighbor and false statements [dolo] regarding the thing in question must be excluded) and evil desire. This would be quite inconsistent, because in these things no wrong has been done to the neighbor, but GOD has been offended and the law transgressed. Therefore, he owes restitution, not of what he has brought to himself, but that he let go of his evil will, which he let run its course there; this happens through repentance and penance.

The same is to be said of priests and religious who either do not perform their prayers, or do not perform their satisfactions, or possess more benefices than one; they are not guilty of restitution, but that they repent of the abuse, for the pope has the power to bestow these goods; but you who obtain them or force your way into them, only beware. In times past, people fled from the priestly office and had to be dragged into it, therefore they were loved by the people; but now they rush into it, while the people would like to keep them out of it, therefore they are hated. But this avarice grows nowadays in a frightening way when taking sinecures. But if benefices are obtained without fraud, there is no need for restitution, although it does not seem quite possible that anyone can impose himself without fraud, especially on the office of pastoral care (curarum).

1) The foregoing was preached by Luther on the Day of the Innocent Infants (December 28) 1516. To this belongs the Exordium, which is found in our edition, Vol. XII, 1804. However, we do not know at which point Luther began with it, since Löscher does not indicate it. (Wein., Ausg., Vol. I, 504.)

2) Löscher: "Luther preached the following on the Feast of the Circumcision [1 January] in 1517. The Exordium belonging to it is found in Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. X, 1276.

because the pope and the people will be deceived if he is not such a man as such an office requires. But who would dare to say that about himself? And yet one is not ashamed to ask for such an office for himself.

Finally, the contract of redemption now also serves avarice, to the great detriment of the whole world, since interest (census) is only bought for the sake that the profit may increase and the property (substantia) be secure without work and danger, not so that they can serve God all the more undisturbed or escape necessity, while one can see that the Pope's intention was and still is not that they should be idle; for Genesis 3, 19. 3, 19. labor and sorrow are laid upon all men: "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat thy bread," and Job 5, 7. it is said [Vulg.], "Man is born to labor, as the bird is born to fly." Therefore let us indicate some causes on account of which interest may justly be purchased. Namely, first, if they are old people, children and sick people,

Secondly, those who are occupied with other work [by which they can acquire nothing], namely, those who serve God, as religious, priests and prelates, who have to do with study and the word of God; then also those who serve the commonwealth and foreign need, as princes, councilors, the rulers in cities and villages. Otherwise, when God returns to each one according to his work, what will the idlers receive who misuse their money only for profit, profit only for idleness, idleness only for pleasure, pleasure only for sin? So those are not safe who serve only themselves with the purchased interest; not as if buying interest were so evil, but because it is sin that one serves avarice in it and seeks nothing but secure wealth.

The eighth commandment follows.

1) Added by us.

The eighth commandment.

You shall not bear false witness against your neighbor.

<sup>2)</sup> This is the vice of the tongue, which the apostle James calls a world of iniquity. It is the most sinful member after the heart, and no member sins in so many ways except the heart, which sins in every way. For the sin that the tongue commits by swearing, vowing, praying, teaching, taking the name of God in vain 2c. is forbidden in the first tablet in the second commandment, that is, every word that is outright sinful against God. Likewise, it is forbidden in the third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, and now eighth; indeed, in all the commandments except the first, ninth, and tenth, which concern only the soul.

2) Löschner: "The following was preached by Luther on the Sunday after the Feast of the Circumcision [January 4, 1517]. The Exordium Hiezu is no longer available.

For against the third one does, if one does not pray, does not give thanks, does not read [God's word] on the feast day; against the fourth, if one addresses the parents in a hopeful manner, answers them disrespectfully, scolds them 2c.; against the fifth by cursing, speaking ill of the innocent 2c. Against the sixth by unchaste speeches; against the seventh by counsel and incitement to steal, by excusing and defending the theft; against the eighth, as we shall now see, by lying, flattering, 2c. As it is therefore forbidden to do harm to one's own person, or to the persons belonging to him, to his earthly (corporalium) goods, so now all harm is forbidden to the goods concerning good reputation, praise, honor, name.

Sin against this commandment:

Firstly and quite actually the scholars, but especially the theologians and all those who have the

Both of them do so in two ways, either knowingly or unknowingly, and according to this they sin more seriously or more easily. First of all, I will say about the theologians, because of all they sin most seriously against this commandment, when they pervert the holy scriptures and the word of God and interpret them wrongly or do not apply them correctly. For this is why something that is spoken falsely kills souls or at least tortures unhappy consciences.

Among the first of these are the heretics and those who invent peculiar opinions out of their own heads, 1) who adapt God's word to their opinions and imprison it in their obedience, while they should act just the opposite, namely in the things concerning faith and blessedness. This is considered by God to be such a great sin that no other sin is so frequently and so sharply punished in Scripture by all the examples and prophecies. Therefore the 4th Psalm, v. 3 [Vulg.] says: "Children of men, how far goes your hardness of heart! How fond you are of vain things, and how you seek after lies!" and the 5th Psalm, v. 6. f.: "Thou art hostile to all evildoers; thou destroyest liars," where it speaks of such teachers, as is evident from what follows [v. 11. Vulg.]: "Let them fall from their thoughts," that is, from their pretensions 2c. And in the first Psalm it is said, "Blessed is he that walketh not in the counsel of the wicked, nor treadeth in the way of sinners, nor sitteth where scoffers sit." And everywhere the Scripture speaks of the false and of false tongues, and punishes these false martyrs, that is, the false tongues.

Therefore I say: Are they excused, since they do this in good opinion and out of zeal for God? For this is how heretics excuse themselves, as our neighbors, the Picards in Bohemia, do. I answer: Not at all. Rather, they are only the more accused because this zeal arises from arrogance, that they do not want to be taught and do not want to listen, because they have become their own masters. Therefore

1) In all editions: Hlonü singulares. Instead of Monü, Löscher suggests Xlomi. The Weimar edition remarks: "It is probably the Greek

Rom. 10, 2: "I give them the testimony that they are zealous for God, but with ignorance", and Gal. 5, 10: "Whoever causes you to err will bear his judgment", and Gal. 1, 9: "If anyone preaches the gospel to you otherwise, let him be accursed" 2c. For such people have a good zeal, but they are not afraid, because they are sure of their zeal, as if they were not mistaken, because they have the good opinion, and they chat that all sin is in the free will (est voluntarium), and as the opinion is, so is the work (intentio nominat opus). But we, they say, have a good opinion and a godly will; and so they become obstinate and sure. To these it must be answered that they have an altogether evil will and an exceedingly poisonous opinion. I do not say of the one they feel and assert, but of the deeper one that makes them proud and deaf, that they do not want to hear anything but their good opinion, and believe no one but their godly will. For they do not want to see this inward pride of theirs, and adorn it with the fictitious and violent good opinion and the godly will. For the right good opinion and the thoroughly good will never stands in safety and without fear, for he fears, like Job [Cap. 9, 28. Vulg.], because of all his works, yea, because of his words and thoughts, therefore he does not base himself on his good will and godly opinion, and is always more ready to yield to others than to believe himself, however exceedingly beautiful an appearance his opinion may have. Through this fear it happens that he does not bring anything new on the track, preserves unity, keeps peace and promotes harmony.

The second are those who do not teach falsities so as to kill, but teach only superficially and less than they should. Therefore they are crucifiers of consciences and tormentors of souls. Among them are those who leave faith in Christ untouched, but teach the righteousness of works; rarely faith, more often works. Of these, the Revelation Cap. 9, 5. seems to me to say that the locusts did not kill men, but tormented them for five moons, namely because they teach that that by works they have done enough for their sins, and yet by these they never have rest of conscience, which faith in Christ alone gives.

Since the holy Scriptures are to be handled in fear and humility, and since they are to be penetrated more by study under fervent prayer than by keen understanding, it is therefore impossible that those who teach them should not harm themselves and others. Therefore, it is impossible that those who rely only on their intellect and fall upon it with unwashed feet, like swine, as if it were only a kind of human science, should not do harm to themselves and others whom they teach; so much so that they make no distinction and treat it without any reverence. Hence it comes about that so many so soon submit to be teachers, who immediately after having learned grammar, without having studied anything at all, set themselves up as teachers of theology, and say: Ah, the Bible is something quite easy. But this is especially done by those whose bellies are swollen with the trumpery of swine, that is, of philosophers. Therefore St. Jerome complains about these people, who interpret the Scriptures, which dispute against them, according to their will, and already a proverb has become from it: the Scriptures have a waxen nose. This is what these tasteless and unrhymed dreamers have brought about, who play their game with the literal, figurative, moral and higher understanding 1) of Scripture, and are called scholastic teachers, and that by their very proper and right name. For they are scholastics, 2) that is, ridiculous people and children of play (lusores), yes, also people who make a mockery of themselves and others (illusores), who have not recognized either what is letter or what is spirit. And the treatment of the Scriptures according to this fourfold interpretation would still be tolerable, if it were regarded only as a first instruction for the beginners. But now they put in this playfulness the summit of erudition, and never come to the right understanding, which can never be attained without purity of heart.

can. But also the most godless people do this quadruple. See St. Jerome's preface to the Bible on the same sacrilege of those who treat the Scriptures.

Secondly, the jurists are to be spoken of, because they act against this commandment according to your letter, when they seek nothing else in their labyrinth, that is, in their Hadermarkte (foro contentioso), than to win. They lead everything, they search for everything, they take everything that can serve for them against the adversary, where then by a new miracle one and the same text must serve for things that are just opposite to each other, and this study has become full of exceedingly many dangers. But they say: No one is guilty of making a confession about himself and accusing himself. But what does the Lord say? "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor," citing that for thyself, ivas against him whom thou knowest to have a righteous cause. But the lawyers have a great privilege, that no one may speak against them or judge them; but this is: that no one may justly punish what he does not understand. But the understanding of law is infinite and inexhaustible, and one has not yet found a jurist who knows everything. If, therefore, one were not allowed to judge them until one had understood all their matters, one would never be able to judge, for they would always say that one does not understand what one punishes.

But one thing must be said, which is also contained in the rights themselves, although one almost does not pay attention to it, namely that the purpose, the life and the power of all laws consists in establishing peace, love and harmony. If someone does not have this in mind, he does not use the laws, but abuses them. For he who for this reason seeks an evasion in a gloss against the text, in order to prolong and increase the strife: do you think that he has the living law? Rather, he seeks the letter of death and works against peace. But whoever does not do this nowadays, it is to be wondered at if he is long taken for a lawyer, or becomes rich. For if they sought peace as much as strife, they would not need so many books and so much work.

2) a person who has nothing to do, The one who goes around daydreaming, or who gets silly ideas; the drip, the simpleton, the fool.

Nor where and how you can twist them and keep them in suspense (ponderare), but look at what they intend, namely to put an end to the dispute and to kill the discord. But here it would be quite suitable to look at the sixth chapter of the first Epistle to the Corinthians, where the apostle rebukes them [v. 3. 7.], that they were right with one another for the sake of worldly things, that is, for the sake of temporal things, which serve to support themselves, and did not much rather let deceit pass over them. Likewise Christ commands that one should also give the coat to the one who takes the skirt 2c. [But it is said that these are counsels, not commandments, which are only to prepare the heart. But I do not understand this strange preparation of the heart, which never comes to light and comes to work. And St. Augustine, who cites the example of Christ, that when he received the stroke of the cheek before Annas, he did not also offer the other cheek, is, I think, not rightly understood, and thus they are defended very badly.

1) These may also include the wretched people who deceive and struggle with the extremely false pretence (nomen) of Aristotle's philosophy, since they neither understand nor teach Aristotle himself, 2) and in the meantime take and leave the believing souls with false and fictitious interpretations, yes, rather deceive them, since they believe that this is philosophy, which it is not, and have to do only with fool's antics. And the poets and any fable tellers are much better off than they, especially since the poets, even if they tell fables, as St. Augustine says, do not believe that they are true, but only have their amusement in the trivial matter; but these believe that their fables are true. For if Aristotle were to be read according to my advice, a man of mediocre intellect could learn him in half a year; but then one should not read it, as has been done until now, with the same faith and devotion (religione) as the holy Scriptures, or even with greater reverence, but like some other minor and remote object (extranea materia), just so that one would know it, not that one would defend it. For truly, we have been seduced by Aristotle and his little friends, and if there were no other reason [to set Aristotle aside], 3) this would be one reason enough that in this pagan beast there are so many sects and heads, which is like the serpent (Hydrae) in the Lernaean swamp; for there are the Thomists, the Scotists, the Albertists, the Modernists; and Aristotle has become four-headed, and his kingdom divided into itself, and it is to be wondered at that it is not laid waste; but its desolation is at hand. For how is it possible that the truth should be there, where so many opinions pass confusedly through one another? For since they are contrary to each other, they must necessarily be false.

But if these teachers and masters sin and act against this commandment, where will those dreamers and wicked people stay, who preach false miracles, show lying legends, fabricated relics, pretend their blasphemous faces? Here one boasts with an insolent brow that he talked and laughed with Christo and his mother; I mean, he will have danced [with her] too. Another has hay on which Christ lay; but it grew this year and was gathered up in a barn. I have heard as a fact that a certain woman, at the instigation of the devil and out of God's decree that she should have such a foolish follower of such a superstition, cut off the hair on her pubis, gave it to him, and persuaded him that it was the head hair of St. Catherine, which had been brought across the sea. That monk (cucullus) believed it and held it out to the people as a relic to be kissed and worshipped. And behold, what happened? The hair from the shameful place also began to perform miracles, and not unjustly, so that the people who had been touched by Lies are deceived that do not serve the truth [2 Thess. 2:10, 11]. Behold, this is so unclean and shameless that it cannot even be told in front of chaste people; yet it happens. Now these speak false witness, not against men, but against God and His saints who are already in glory (regnantes). Such is also that recently a certain man is said to have shown hay, which he found by chance, and said that it was the hay on which Christ or I don't know which saint had slept. Now such fables are multiplied everywhere by the unlearned priests, but still more by the monks who go about as relic merchants (stationarii), 1) and the parish priests take great delight in the fables of legends and indulgences and all things that can only be said, except the Gospel, because those things bring profit, while the people turn their ears away from the truth and turn to fables. But woe, woe and woe upon such fable preachers! Here a very great reformation of the church would be necessary, so that it should not be permitted to preach anything, however godly and good, unless the certain truth and according to the right faith have been invented (authenticum et canonicum). For under such a pretense of godliness, those strange fables are equally torn down, so that the preachers of the church almost surpass the pagan poets in fables and lies. Yes, I would venture to say that it is not quite certain that proven legends and miracles are preached in such a way as to give rise to the custom of setting aside the Gospel altogether. For they are not to be considered the most important part of the sermon, but only to be interspersed with the preaching of the Gospel, where they serve the matter, but not to be dealt with in a whole sermon.

Secondly, every lie is forbidden, that is, false testimony against one's neighbor. The lie, however, as St. Augustine distinguishes, is threefold: the joke lie, the white lie (officiosum) and the harmful lie.

The joke lie is actually not a lie, because you immediately perceive that it is a lie and also the one who lies in this way is eager to speak in such a way that one can see that he is speaking the untruth and joking. Nevertheless, it is sin, for it is shameful speech or foolishness and useless gossip. But it happens that some are so simple-minded that they are also deceived by such things, especially when this joke happens in sacred things (religionibus), as when it is said: If you have lost something, give a warm roll as alms, and sprinkle consecrated salt on it, namely on the lost thing, and you will find it. This is what the simple understand, that the salt should be sprinkled on the bread, and they believe that they will then find what they have lost.

A white lie is one that is told to someone as a service or favor, for oneself or for one's neighbor's salvation and benefit, without harming anyone, as if a woman's chastity were in danger and someone said she was not where she was, or something else of the sort. Such a lie was told by the wives of the Hebrew women in Egypt. Likewise Michal, David's wife, against Saul. See both stories in their place [2 Mos. 1, 19. and 1 Sam. 19, 14.]. To the question whether one may make use of them, Augustine answers: By no means, but he tells the truth as far as he can, in other words, as he says of a certain bishop in his book "of the lie", who answered a judge who questioned him because of an accused who had fled to him: I will neither lie, nor be a traitor. But this is not a mortal sin if the white lie is told for a reasonable reason and in sudden consternation.

The harmful lie is the one that does harm. For a falsehood is told in order to harm another, and the one who lies in this way deceives his neighbor in such a way that he would not want to be deceived himself. About this the Lord says through Zechariah [Cap. 8, 16. Vulg.]: "Speak the truth, each one with his neighbor", and again [v. 19.]: "Love truth and peace" 2c. For this is what pleases me. This evil reigns nowadays exceedingly wide, harmful and mighty in mercantile dealings, han-

1) Cf. Tischreden Cap. 27, § 143. Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. XXII, 923.

The people have forgotten this rule in their contracts, covenants, letters, seals and in all their dealings with each other, as Hosea says: "Lying, stealing 2c. has become rampant," because they have forgotten this rule: What you want done to you, do to another, and what you do not want done to you, do not do to another, for they have become blinded by selfishness 2c.

0 But behold what an abomination is the human heart. Even if all other sins do not defile man,' yet this vice is most contrary to man's nature. First, what does every man by nature desire more than to know [the truth]? What is more repugnant to him than to be deceived? As St. Augustine says that the soul desires nothing so much as the truth, and yet man does it against it, and does it gladly. Secondly, although man has in common with many animals gluttony or indulgence, anger, envy, sloth, covetousness, he, together with the devil, surpasses them in this vice, because man alone is a liar, and the devil is the father of lies. For man alone is given reason and speech, whose office it is to speak the truth. And therefore I believe that among all malicious words none is more bitter than to say that someone is lying to his face. For this word is more grievous than to say that a man is a dissolute, a drunkard, a wrathful man, a proud man, and I believe that nature feels this more easily because lying is the most unnatural vice for man, indeed, the greatest enemy of human society.

Third, against this commandment is sinned against by flattery, under which are included the ear-blower, the "two-tongued" man, and the false tongue, and all the vices of the tongue. You can see other things in the fifth commandment. But no man is free from this vice, unless he will soon be beaten to death and incur the hatred of all people, viz.

1) Löscher: "The following was recited by Luther on the day of Paul's conversion f25 January in 1517." The Exordium Hiezu is found in Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. X, 976.

He who, because his heart is right, does not conceal the truth from any man, as the fifteenth Psalm, v. 4, says: "He who does not respect the wicked," that is, who does not fear any wicked man, however powerful, rich, wise, just he may be (for before him there is no respect of person, nor does he care for any man), but who brings honor to the fearful, however weak, poor, and foolish they may be. Therefore, one must either flatter the world or suffer the hatred of the world, which has been sufficiently shown to us in Christ and all the saints. Although this vice prevails everywhere, it nevertheless has the greatest, undisputed dominion (triumphat) in the courts of princes and in the whole camp of bishops. For there are people who wear soft clothes and have delicate ears, and there is certainly no place in the world from which flattery should be farther away, and yet where it is more frequent and exercises greater power than elsewhere), since if a prince is seduced to evil, or he is kept from doing good, all subjects necessarily suffer harm, and there is no more harmful ruin for kingdoms and countries than a flatterer at court. For what do we complain about wars or swords or weapons? The tongue of the flatterer is above all swords; therefore, flatterers should be driven away from the courts as much as possible and punished most severely. One reads that the Emperor of Rome, Alexander, was so hostile to flatterers that when he saw someone flattering him in a groveling manner (molliore gestu), he would not let him go unpunished, or at least ridicule him if it was a gentleman. And when Diogenes was asked which of all animals was the most harmful, he answered: Among the wild animals a tyrant, among the tame a flatterer.

One finds few outstanding flatterers and examples of them in Scripture, perhaps because it is such a heinous vice, for the first and foremost above others is Doeg the Edomite, who, as 1 Sam. 21:7. and afterwards [1 Sam. 22:9, 10, 18, 22.] are told, flattered Saul in all things and was the cause of all the priests in Nob being slain, but then also many other brought suffering upon David. Then follow the Siphites [1 Sam. 23, 19], who betrayed David, finally Siba, the servant of Mephibosheth, who also betrayed King David [2 Sam. 16, 3]. But one should pay attention to the end of Doeg and Saul [1 Sam. 31, 4. f.] whom he flattered; but also his son, who unhappily followed his father in flattery, was immediately killed by David, 2 Sam. 1, 13. ff. Therefore the whole 52nd Psalm speaks thundering words against this Doeg [v. 3.s>: "Why do you defy that you can do harm" 2c. The flatterers may hear what follows [v. 6. f.]: "You like to speak everything that serves to ruin with a false tongue. Therefore also shall GOD utterly destroy thee, and break thee in pieces, and pluck thee out of the tabernacle, and cut thee off from the land of the living." Behold, with how dreadful imprecations he goes forth against the flatterer! For they love words of destruction, that is, words by which they may overthrow their neighbors, bring them to ruin, displace (absorbent) them among the princes, that they alone may reign and stand in favor 2c.

Finally, false testimony is used to sin in the public courts, which was also discussed above. Here we are dealing with the danger in which lawyers, notaries, legal advisors, advocates and judges stand. Here even the most sacred rights suffer the fate of the rose, from which the bee gathers honey, but the spider poison, and they say fine to excuse themselves: To him who is vigilant, rights come to his aid; and again: One must take refuge in the remedy of law. These are two very useful rules, first, to postpone the execution of justice, second, to sow discord, third, to fill the purse of the lawyers; not as if those rules were bad or wrong, but because they are are almost nowhere in good use. This becomes evident if you pay attention to what they mean by "remedy of the law" and "take good heed of the law," namely, that if someone has a very bad or at least a doubtful matter, even according to the testimony of his own conscience, he does not listen to the counsel of the spirit: Keep the certain and let the uncertain go, but rather is only concerned about how he can make a very good thing out of the exceedingly bad thing, namely, because the thing is sick, he applies the remedy of law to it, and this is their watchfulness. For "they watch over wickedness," as the prophet says [Isa. 29, 20. Vulg.], and so it happens that they draw poison and honey from one and the same text of the law: the one who defends unjust things. Poison, the other, which promotes the just cause, honey.

But what shall I say here? I can only deplore the misery of Christians, who put all their efforts into quarrels, lawsuits and judgments, and no one is willing to pay attention to the word of Christ [Matth. 7, 12]: "All things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them. I beseech thee, dear man, try, examine, inquire of thyself, if thou hast any matter against thy neighbor. Do you not want him to let you go in peace, not to be right with you, not to believe you? So you want another to do this to you: why do you not do the same to him and give way to him? But, you say, it is a counsel, not a command. I answer: How can it be a counsel and not a commandment, since Christ immediately added, "For this is the law and the prophets"? Is a law then only a counsel? Does there then remain no commandment, no law? What follows from this but that we forget both Christ and the law of nature and grope in the midst of darkness? Therefore, the study of law today is extremely dangerous, since it does not serve to make peace, not to settle disputes, but to incite and prolong them.

But, you say, if one had to act in this way, it would soon come about that we would be trampled underfoot and robbed of everything we have. Here I say, this is what the Scripture wants. For this reason it calls us little children, orphans and widows, poor and oppressed, because we who keep the gospel suffer much evil for the sake of his word, since we do not take revenge, do not repay like with like, even pray for those who persecute and slander us, so that we may be children of our Father in heaven, because he is also kind to the ungrateful and evil [Matth. 5, 44. f.]. And we should rejoice that we are esteemed worthy of the name "little children" because Christ is their protector. If we now reclaim and quarrel, how can we then be little children? But they have also turned these salutary commandments into counsels for us, saying that they are to be understood from the preparation of the heart, and do not take into account that cases keep coming up to put this preparation into practice, and yet they do not do so. And here see God's exceedingly mighty wisdom and His exceedingly wise power. He has said [Luc. 21, 33.]: "My words will not pass away" and [Matth. 5, 18.]: "Not one jot of the law will pass away until it is all done." Behold, I say, how true it is [Ps. 33:9.], "As he speaketh, so it is done."

Those who do not want to give the skirt to the one who takes their coat, are forced to give him 1) the shirt as well, against their will, because they did not give the skirt willingly, and thus the commandment is fulfilled by them against their will, which could not be fulfilled with their will. For it happens very often when two people dispute about a matter that they would both be satisfied by a part of the disputed matter by making an amicable agreement with each other and each yielding to the other, while if they agree with each other they consume far more about it and waste twice as much on the advocates as they should have yielded to the opposing party. But how does it work now? Some have to spend twice as much on the matter as it is worth, and still lose the matter itself. Here it is time to sing [Ps. 119, 137]:

1) We have adopted Mi with the Basel, the Wittenberg and the Jena editions, instead of ilis in the other editions.

"Lord, you are just and your judgment is right. Give twenty guilders to an ungrateful, foreign lawyer, who also mocks you, for the trial, because you did not want to let your brother off ten guilders for the sake of peace. For who is to be blamed here other than you, a completely blind man, who squander your money on unworthy people with sins, which you could have left to your brother, who is your adversary, whom God has counted worthy to have it? Even if you win, you still have your victory with sins, and you will be found naked in twofold death.

But this is said of private persons, for public persons must watch that no one is wronged and, if called upon, avenge wrongs done. But to demand this is permitted to the weak, but forbidden to Christians.

Finally, it should be noted that, as the apostle Peter says, no one should suffer as a thief or an evildoer [1 Pet. 4:15], that is, he should not confess that it is right for him to do so if he is innocent, but should report his guilt to the one who takes something from him and leave the sting of conscience with him. For this is what the holy martyrs Attalus and his companions did. When the accusation was made that all Christians secretly eat children, they constantly denied it until death. Thus Zechariah, when he was killed by King Joash [2 Chron. 24, 22.], said, "The LORD will see it and seek it." And St. Thomas of Canterbury was killed, not because he did not want the goods to be taken, but because he said that those who took them had no right to do so. For he allowed the goods to be taken without resistance, and did not oppose them in any way. Yes, St. Stephen also declared so strongly that his persecutors did not do right, that he also prayed for their sin. Thus St. Jerome writes of the woman who was struck seven times [by the executioner with the sword], that she did not fear death or anything else, but wanted to maintain her innocence. Yes, for this reason Christ gave Malchus a harsh answer, denying that he had spoken evil [John 18:23], so that he might not to think that he had acted rightly. That is why he answered Caiphas that he was the Son of God and refuted their false testimony, and yet he allowed his life to be taken, indeed he wanted it. So we too should let our goods go, but uphold our righteous cause.

Now let us repeat it and summarize it in a summa: This commandment is fulfilled if we not only do not speak false testimony, but also do not want to hear or allow anyone to be talked about (as those do who either believe the flatterers or agree with the slanderers). Yes, he is still guilty of this commandment who is not eager to excuse and cover up his brother's wrong, shame and disgrace, or at least, if he can do no more, to belittle them, to contradict those who speak evil, accuse, slander; for every one would have it done against him. And so he becomes a child of the Spirit of God, who is called the Comforter, because he speaks good things for us, and bears witness to our spirit against all the testimonies of the devil and of our own conscience. Furthermore, one should also teach those who do not know God and do not know God's will, who do not know God's will.

Admonish the erring, resist the deceivers and heretics and other deceivers of souls, as the apostle says (Tit. 1, 9. f.). Therefore, this commandment requires a truthful, just, wholesome, harmless tongue that is completely at the service of the brother, and in such a way as to do him good from the bottom of the heart. This is the love that does not drive the will to anger and is not jealous (1 Cor. 13:4). Therefore, although it is not necessary for you to confess to the priest, if you have not excused your brother, since he has been accused, defiled with false testimony, oppressed by flattery or slander, and are perhaps satisfied that you have not done so, you will still be condemned before God as a culprit because of such ungodly silence and evil disuse of your tongue, which was given to you for such distress of your brother and for his service. But again, if you do this, you will bring everything down on your neck and will soon be killed. And this is what God wants, so that the sooner we will be cast out of the world and killed for the sake of His word, and the sooner we will receive the crown of righteousness. This is the right and spiritual understanding of this commandment.

The ninth and tenth commandments.

You shall not covet your neighbor's house. Neither shall you covet his wife, his manservant, his maidservant, his ox, his donkey, or anything that is his.

1) This is included in the sixth and seventh commandments, since according to the interpretation of Christ all desire and coveting of the wife and the goods of the neighbor is forbidden there. For "whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her hath committed adultery with her in his heart" [Matth. 5, 28]. He also condemned covetousness and the coveting of goods to such an extent that he also commanded to give the skirt to the one who took the cloak [Matth.

5, 40.). But in my judgment, it seems to me that by these two commandments the tinder and the insurmountable desire are forbidden, I mean, the very root of evil thoughts; so that it must be understood that in the sixth and seventh commandments the assent of the heart and the gestures of the members are forbidden, the word of the mouth and the work of the evil body, but here also even the first stirrings together with the tinder, which is the origin of those. For we must become so pure before we can enter the kingdom of heaven that there are no evil impulses in us, nor any tinder that tends toward evil, but complete health of body and soul, absolutely without any infirmity, which, of course, is not possible in this life.

1) Probably the sermon on the day of the Purification of the Virgin Mary [2 Feb. 1517] is the exordium to the following piece (Weim. Aug.). This introductory sermon is found in Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. XII, 1266.

is not in our power. For who can boast [Prov. 20:9] that he has a pure heart? Who can quench this deep inward fire? For even the apostle complains of "the law in his members" and of "the law of sin" [Rom. 7:23. f.]. And therefore we resist the eyes, the ears, and all the senses, inwardly and outwardly, lest sin should reign in us; but the evil desire no man can resist. This is why the merciful God decided to turn our bodies into ashes and to burn them by the great fire of the last day (universal fire), so that all the infirmities of our flesh would be consumed by fire: that is how much God hates this impurity. And from this it follows that it is these two commandments alone that no man, however holy, fulfills even to some extent; all others fulfill them because they forcefully curb the work, the word, the consent, but here they remain guilty and sinners because they fulfill none of these commandments, because they are infected by the insurmountable evil lust of the flesh and the desire of goods: therefore they are "sinners all at once and lack the glory they should have in GOD" [Rom. 3, 23]; therefore all pray, "Hallowed be thy name, thy will be done, forgive us our trespasses"; therefore all despair of their merits for fear of their impurity, and put their trust in the mercy of God, that in such a way it may be established that the Lord is pleased with those who fear him, who wait for his goodness [Ps. 147, 11^

This also puts an end to the dispute of the scholastic teachers as to whether these two commandments forbid something different from the sixth and seventh, as well as whether they are two different commandments. And they labor in vain in understanding these two commandments of the works of the heart, since they cannot deny that these are forbidden in the sixth and seventh commandments, and that then the same would be repeated here, and these two commandments would be set in vain, since they would be the same with those. Nor can they say that the work is forbidden there, the thoughts here, or the hands there, the heart here, because Christ himself teaches against this, saying.

that those two commandments are to be understood by both.

So it only remains that we follow the apostle Paul, who combines these two commandments into one and says: "I did not know of lust that it was sin, where the law had not said, 'Do not lust'", Rom. 7, 7. And there he explains in detail that all saints are affected by this commandment, including himself. So here the evil of tinder and, that I say so, the essential and causal impurity in us is forbidden. Whoever therefore lets himself think that he has fulfilled all the previous commandments, sees at least here that he is unclean and needs the purity of Christ, who was sacrificed for him and accepted by God, the Father of mercy.

But what the Jews, or rather the sows, understand here is not worth mentioning in the discussion of these commandments. For they say that in the sixth and seventh commandments only the work is forbidden, and in the ninth and tenth an outward attempt and an obvious sign that one intends to do the work, just as among the jurists the attempt (conatus) is punished, as if someone has made preparations (inciperet) to kidnap someone's daughter, or has stood after another's life, he is beheaded. And so thoughts and words are free with them, which are full of malice and anger and bitterness and, as Christ says [Matth. 23, 27. f.], "full of all filthiness," because they keep pure what is outside, but their inside is full of avarice and all unrighteousness. Therefore, the synagogue is the woman who, because of her shameful nature, has received a letter of divorce and has been cast out.

These are "the ten words", as Moses says, in which every salutary commandment is completely contained, and although they can be brought to a smaller number of huts, they could also have been divided into more commandments. But it pleased God to give them in the number ten, which is the number of a complete whole (universitatis) and of a perfect sum, so that, as once everything happened in the model (figura), also this number ten of the commandments was chosen for the sake that it should represent the sum of all commandments.

Now that the Ten Commandments have been completed, the many kinds of sins must be included among the commandments, because there is no sin that does not go against a commandment of God. For I do not know whether it is of use to those who want to confess that they burden their memory with so many different kinds of sins and tire the priest, as there are: 1. by doings and omissions; 2. by the heart, by the mouth, by works; 3. by the five senses; 4. by the six works of mercy; 5. by the seven sacraments; 6. by the seven deadly sins; 7. by the seven gifts [of the Holy Spirit]; 8. by the eight beatitudes; 9. by the nine strange sins; 10. by the ten commandments; 11. by the twelve articles of faith 2) 12. by the twelve fruits of the Spirit. In addition to these, there are the four main virtues and the three theological virtues, as well as the dumb sins, the heaven-sent sins, and finally the sins against the Holy Spirit. I beg you, what is the use of such confusion and distraction of the mind? This is done in such a way that it is considered necessary to enumerate the names of these different divisions and distinctions, of course only to waste time, to stupefy the confessor and to confuse oneself, so that one spends more effort to remember these things than to think of true repentance, then also to hinder others. Due to the ignorance of the teachers, this untidiness (tumultus) has arisen in confession, while confession should be short and open, so that both confessor and child could soon be finished.

Now let us first consider the deadly sins, whose number, as it seems, was taken from John Chrysostom. For he also interprets the seven nations of the Canaanites 5 Mos. 7, 1. in a moral way (moraliter) as seven vices, by wanting all sins to be understood under the same, more on the basis of the seven number, which is a whole.

. 1) Löscher: "The following was preached by Luther on the Sunday of Septuagesimä [February 8, 1817]." The Erordium belonging to it is found in Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. XII, 1816.
2) "The twelve articles of faith" are the apostolic creed. Cf. Table Talks Cap. 54, 8 13. Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. XXII, 1358.

than that the names contain such things in themselves. For some make eight, others nine mortal sins, adding disobedience and vain teaching; still others divide mothers into daughters, and genera into species, the whole into parts belonging to it (integrales) and subordinate (subjectivas): from these they have derived an infinite number, yes, whole seas of sins, but in the meantime have not taken care of the right understanding of the commandments.

Therefore, there are not only seven deadly sins, but this is an arbitrary division, which has no necessary reason nor proof [from Scripture], but there can be both fewer and more, depending on a different figurative speech (tropologia) occurring in Scripture. Therefore, St. Augustine divided it into two parts, namely, a kindled fire and a suppressed fire, that is, love, which ignites evil, and fear, which humbles in an evil way.

The first mortal sin is hopefulness, which is twofold: the external, which takes place in physical goods, and the internal, which expresses itself in spiritual goods, and is therefore always against the first commandment. This is obvious, for to have no other God means to trust in nothing, to have no pleasure in anything, to rejoice in nothing, to delight in nothing, to enjoy no thing but God alone. But hope puts its trust now in wealth, now in strength, now in beauty and clothing, now in power and honor, now in noble lineage; likewise inwardly in wisdom, art, understanding, justice, virtue, holiness, takes pleasure in them, and honors these created goods in such a way (eo actu) as is due to God alone. For pride always entails two things: first, that one may please oneself; second, that one may arrogantly despise others. For this reason it includes vain honor within itself; if this breaks outwardly, it is all the worse. That is why the arrogant one, who sees something good in himself, does not honor God in it, nor does he thank Him for it by praising God, but stands on himself, takes pleasure in himself, and is vain in his thoughts. But then, at the same time, he pays attention to the one who does not have such gifts; if he now compares him with himself, it follows with necessity

He despises him and says: he is something, he is nothing, and the word Rom. 1, 22. is fulfilled: "Since they said they were wise, they have become fools"; since they speak in this way (namely inwardly, to themselves) that they are righteous, beautiful, rich 2c., they have become unrighteous, ugly, poor. Revelation 3:17: "Thou sayest, I am rich, and am full; and knowest not that thou art poor, and miserable, and bare."

Thus, hope has no real essence (substantiam) in itself, except that the hopeful can compare himself with a lesser one, and looks down, as it were, from above. On the other hand, the essence of humility is only there where the humble man compares himself with a better one, and looks upward, as it were, to the highest things. That is why this horny and cowardly calf has four feet, namely:

|---|-----------------------------|----------|
| Ignorance of his bishop. Knowledge of His GoodGod               | Thus is the right ignorance |          |
| Ignorance of the foreign good. Knowledge of the foreign evil of |                             | oneself. |

The antithesis of this quadruped has four feet of humility, 'namely:

|                            |                               |         |
|----------------------------|-------------------------------|---------|
| Ignorance of his good.     | Knowledge of His EvilGod      |         |
|                            | This is the right knowledge < |         |
| Ignorance of foreign evil. | Knowledge of the foreign good | itself. |

Therefore it is not necessary that you confess that you are inclined to hope, because we are always all hopeful, and no man is without all hope, but only when you have obeyed their evil desire and consented to it by word, work or heart. The rest you have to complain to God in secret sighing and hidden confession in the closet, so that he by his grace eradicates this evil, the old root.

It has been said of godliness, as it was forbidden under the first commandment, for godliness is the beginning of sin, or, which is the same thing, the beginning of sin is to fall away from God, namely, to become an idol to oneself, to please oneself, to delight in oneself more than in the Lord, and thus to honor in oneself another god. This is the most serious and first sin, although there is no one who has come from Adam, as long as we live, who does not in some way practice this idolatry in himself, and for this reason must always repent and groan about pleasing himself.

Now it is necessary to speak of avarice, which is a craving and, as the apostle says

[1 Tim. 6, 9. f.] says, likewise "a root of all evil," "for they that desire to be rich fall into the snares of the devil, and many foolish and hurtful lusts."

This vice is forbidden in two, even in three commandments, namely in the seventh: "Thou shalt not steal" and in the last: "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's goods" and in the first. For since in the seventh commandment (as has been said) all taking (tractatio) of other people's goods is forbidden, and every commandment (as has also been said) is so spiritual that it forbids not only the work and the fruit and the leaves and branches, that is, the works, words and deeds, but also the root and the sap, that is, the evil desire from which such things come, it is evident that covetousness is forbidden under theft, since in a thief and a covetous man there is the same root, that is, covetousness. Likewise, since in the last commandment the coveting of one's neighbor's good is forbidden in the letter, it is evident that the source and head of this coveting is also forbidden in the spirit; but this is avarice. Therefore, the very last commandment actually forbids the last and most vital vice, which is reborn in the elderly and is alive in the dying.

But the apostle Paul, who wrote Eph. 5, 5.

in his mind goes higher, says that a miser is a servant of idols, that is, a worshipper of them, and so he puts this under the first commandment. The same is done by Baruch, Cap. 3, 17: "They that gather silver and gold, in them men put their trust." And the 78th Psalm, v. 58. [Ps. 106, 38.], says in spirit, "And they served the idols of Canaan." Canaan means a merchant; what could their idols more appropriately mean than money and coins, gold and silver vessels, houses and other possessions? Yes, therefore we are chiefly forbidden in the law not to make gold and silver gods, and the first idolatry of the people was with gold, under the golden calf [Ex. 32:4, 1, but in like manner also the greatest idolatry in the days of Jeroboam, under the golden calves [1 Kings 12:28.]. Therefore the apostle correctly understood by gold an idol, calling the miser a worshipper of idols, and in Latin aurum sounds almost like auarum; auri auro, auari auaro are merely different in One letter, so that aurum [gold] seems to have received its name from auere [to desire fiercely]. Now since the apostle calls the miser an idolater, he thereby sufficiently interprets the first commandment, that the heart of man should trust in God alone. For on the same opinion he says that also the gluttons and the unchaste are worshippers of the belly, and says [Phil. 3, 19.f: "To whom the belly is their god." But in this sense all the commandments are contained in the first commandment as in their head. For every sin is a contempt of God, and just thereby against the first commandment, and no commandment can be violated without at the same time also violating the first, which contains all of them in itself. For God's will is transgressed in all the commandments and is made inferior to our will [, if one does against them], and thus God is not honored, but rather another [God] is honored instead of Him. But the apostle has actually stated that avarice is against the same, because it delights in the images of gold and silver, very similar to right idolatry. All other sins, however, do not have such idols and images.

Therefore, we must again conclude that no one is completely pure of stinginess, as Isaiah and Jeremiah say [Isa. 56:11, Jer. 6:13], "They are all stingy. Small and great." But blessed is he who for the sake of this follows less this inclination of his depraved nature. All must therefore groan before God, but only confess the work, whether internal or external, before the priest. And whoever would say that he does not have this desire would certainly arrogate to himself the highest perfection of purity in great arrogance. Therefore, blessed are those who mourn [Matth. 5, 4], for they have reason (materiam) in themselves to mourn over themselves, as the Lord said to the women who followed him [Luc. 23, 28].

1) The third mortal sin is unchastity, the types of which are sufficiently indicated under the sixth commandment, "Thou shalt not commit adultery," and no one doubts that it belongs there; therefore, it may suffice that this is indicated.

The fourth is eating and drinking, the sister, indeed, the inducement and the suitor and servant of unchastity, as the pagan also says: Sine Cerere et Baccho friget Venus [Without food and drink, unchastity thrives nothing. The apostle Phil. 3, 19. puts this vice under the first commandment by saying: "Whose belly is their god." He does the same in Rom. 16, 18: "For such serve not Christ, but their belly." But it can simply be placed under the sixth commandment, for where unchastity is forbidden, surely all occasion and stimulus to unchastity is also forbidden. But among all stimuli to unchastity, the greatest and strongest is eating and drinking. The cause of this is that this is something internal; everything else, as looking, talking, hearing, touching, is external. But eating and drinking makes the veins swell and moves the whole body to unchastity. For even the pagan Pliny says that drunkenness is followed by terrible unchastity. And St. Jerome says in his writing to the Eustochins and elsewhere, that nothing so moves to unchastity as undigested food. Therefore, a gluttonous man (gulosus) willingly gives himself up to unchastity. In the same way, idleness and laziness, sleepiness, soft bedding and all other things that arouse unchastity are forbidden, which can undoubtedly be seen from the sixth commandment. And if a man who has overdone in eating and drinking (gulosus) does not immediately occupy himself with much work, he will be taken in by insurmountable unchastity and tickling. Hence St. Jerome says: A belly that glows with wine soon seethes with unchastity. See how unchastity is, as it were, the natural foam of gluttony, just as smoke rises naturally from fire, and foam rises from wine that has just been poured in, and boiling water throws out bubbles. Who can prevent this, except with the greatest violence? Therefore, he who commands chastity undoubtedly commands the means that serve chastity, such as temperance, watchfulness, work, prayer, reading, reflection, study, serving one's neighbor, cold, heat, poverty 2c.

Here, however, this is to be noted: Many people have a greater conscience about vomiting than about binge drinking and drunkenness, just as many consider the nocturnal defilement to be something greater than the cause of it, the evil thoughts and gluttony. But surely vomiting is not evil, nor is it ever a sin, since it takes place both against one's will and in pain. Therefore, the drunken should not only not flee vomiting, but even seek it, as Sirach Cap. 31, 25. says [Vulg.], "If thou hast been compelled to drink much, 1) stand up and cast it out, and it shall refresh thee, and thou shalt not bring sickness on thy body." This advice of the wise man is to be accepted, and not without reason. For he says, "It will refresh thee," that is, it will relieve thee. For the purpose of this discharge is that the veins may not be so distended and tickling of the flesh may arise, since the little that remains may be more easily consumed.

dant. For it is better to escape unchastity by vomiting than to fall into unchastity by being full.

Secondly, because sickness of the body is avoided, as, injury to the head and all the senses and powers. But who should not believe that it is a greater sin for the whole body to be injured by being full and keeping the comrade, than to be freed from this danger by vomiting? For to shorten life is a greater sin than to vomit; yea, to vomit is no sin, but that is evil, that thou hast filled thyself and overcharged thyself so as to vomit. And would to God that a law were given that all drunk and full people were forced to vomit! I hope that they would finally abhor drunkenness, knowing that they would soon have to spit out what they drink. Even though they soon have to leave the water and go to the chair, they do not turn back to it. But that the Scriptures sometimes punish spitting, as [2 Petr. 2:22]: "The dog eats again what he has eaten," and Isa. 28:8: "All the tables are full of spitting," is understood by the spitting out of the good and wholesome word, which he should have kept.

Thirdly. If someone has drunk poison or something else that is harmful and spits it out without sin, why should he spit with sin who has drunk wine or another drink in such a way that it causes harm similar to the poison? Therefore, one must have a conscience about the pouring in, not about the giving out, since there one serves many evil things against God's commandment, but here one serves many good things, against no commandment, yes, for God's commandment.

I pass over the types and differences of gluttony because they are not always mortal sins, since eating and drinking are not always mortal sins either, indeed rarely, unless they have become a habit.

The fifth mortal sin is anger, about which enough has been said in the fifth commandment.

The sixth is hatred, which should not have been distinguished from anger [as a special sin], since it is nothing but ingrained anger, as St. Augustine says in his Rule: Do not let anger become hatred, and make a beam out of the splinter. For anger is a young rice, but hatred is a tree and a great beam. Therefore this also belongs to the fifth commandment, for which we have the apostle John as a guarantor [1 John 3:15]: "He who hates his brother is a murderer."

The seventh mortal sin is sloth, which is the disinclination to do good, laziness, Greek This is twofold. One is in the figurative and external worship, such as attending church, hearing the Word, praying, reading, contemplating, singing, and in this way this vice is forbidden under the third commandment: "You shall keep holy the holiday," as is sufficiently evident. The other is more subtle and inward and takes place in the whole service of God and in every kind of it, and in this way it is nothing other than trusting in the righteousness begun and carelessness in increasing; that one stands still in the way of God, is lukewarm, becomes secure, forsakes the fear of God. All Scripture speaks of this vice of the hypocrites. For this slothfulness makes sure saints of works, before whose eyes there is no is the fear of God, and "the judgments of God are far from them" [Ps. 10:5]. Afterwards it will be worse with these people than before [Luc. 11, 25. f.], because the devil finds their house decorated, but empty and safe. Therefore the devils go in and dwell there. O what an exceedingly dreadful word, that the devils dwell there, because men who are of this sort, after their righteousness begun, become much more hardened than before, as we see in experience, that they are not moved to what they hear, but think it does not affect them, and in truth have become a brood of vipers [Matt. 3:7, 12], a chaff prepared for the eternal fire. So this sin is found in all the commandments, since one should increase in each one. But I do not know whether one should confess it. I believe that one should not do it, because it is a spiritual infirmity, which one should open to God alone, who alone can heal it.)

D. The Ten Commandments of God

with a brief interpretation of their fulfillment and transgression.

Made by D. Martin Luther, Augustinian.*)

Anno 1518.

The first commandment.

You shall not have other gods.

To have one GOD, that is, to have one from whom he provides, to be promoted in all good, to be helped in all evil; that wants to be, and is, the one true GOD Himself.

The other commandment.

You shall not put on the name of God your Lord uselessly.

For God's names are also these: Truth, Wisdom, 2) Kindness, Power, and Everything

2) "Wisdom" is missing from Weimar's.

*) As we can see from the beginning of the immediately preceding sermon on the seven deadly sins (Col. 1344), confession had become a cruel torture of consciences due to the infinite multiplication of types of sins. Therefore, Luther wrote for the poor afflicted souls at the beginning of the year 1518 an instruction, how one could briefly arrange the confession according to the holy ten commandments, both in Latin and German. The Latin writing has the title: Instructiv pro conkcssionc pscatvrnm adbrsvianda ssuncuin ckcoalAUin. Author v. Zl. luitü. äнно HlvVIII. and is found in the Latin Wittenberg edition (155V), Dom. I,

Good name is his name; let no one attribute it to himself.

The third commandment.

You shall sanctify the holiday.

The best celebration is that the soul waits with all activity of the same day for Him who fills the hungry and the single with goods, Luc. 1, 53. For celebration means to be single.

The fourth commandment.

You shall honor your father and mother.

The honor is not in greeting or inclination alone, but in doing and not doing everything that is their will or need.

The fifth commandment.

You shall not kill.

Not only does the one who causes death or harm kill, but also the one who does not resist them and comes before them, as Augustine says.

The sixth commandment.

You shall not commit adultery.

He calls the worst fruit of the lust of the flesh alone, to prove how evil all lust is, from which such vice comes.

1) Weimar edition: "hn"; likewise in the immediately following "short resolution of the ten commandments": "yr yn", that is: their them.

The seventh commandment.

You shall not steal.

To take foreign goods is a fruit of avarice and covetousness; therefore the tree with the fruit is forbidden here, avarice and what may follow from avarice.

The eighth commandment.

You shall not bear false witness against your neighbor.

The ninth commandment.

You shall not covet your neighbor's wife, daughter or maid.

The tenth commandment.

You shall not covet your neighbor's house or goods.

A brief resolution of the ten commandments.

Christ Himself says: "Whatever you want men to do to you, you do to them, that is the whole law and all the prophets," Matth. 7, 12. For no one wants to suffer ingratitude for his good deed, or to leave his name to another. No one wants to show hope against him. No one wants disobedience, wrath, unchastity of his wife, robbery of his goods, lies, deceitfulness, and the like.

col. 199; Jenaer (1579), IVnn. I, col. 1753; Erlanger, SXSA. opp., IVnn. XII, p. 219 and in the Weimar one, vol. I, p. 257. The only single Latin edition of this writing, which is given in the Weimar edition, appeared only in May 1520 with Silvanus Ottmar in Augsburg under a title modeled on that of the German edition. The German edition is, as can be seen by comparing the writing: "Kurze Form, die zehn Gebote, Glauben und Vater-Unser zu betrachten" (Walch, St. Louiser Ausg., Vol. X, 153-159), by Luther himself; in the latter writing, he only changed the first part completely, but expanded it in the indication of the transgression and fulfillment; in all other respects, it agrees with our writing from word to word. "A special edition of the German adaptation of 1518 cannot be proven, but we have an imprint within the following writing of Caspar Götzel: 'Jhesus. Ein fast fruchtbar Buchlein von Adams wercken, vnd gottes genade mit vnterricht wie recht beichten, bussen, vnd das hochwirdigst Sacrament selig tzu empfaen im Augustiner Closter tzu sandt Anne vor Eisleben dise heiligste fast gepredigt vnd gegeben. 1518.' (Printed by Melchior Lotther in Leipzig.) Here the instruction is found in German, Bl. Ciiij u - Dij b, in the middle of the fifth chapter; it was thus already in print in the Lent of 1518." (Weim. Ausg.) In the Weimar edition, under the title we have given, nine individual aliases are listed, none of which appeared in Wittenberg. Several of these are without date, namely two with Jobst Gutknecht in Nuremberg, one with Adam Petri in Basel, one with S. Otinar (Ottmar) in Augsburg, one with Jörg Nadler in Augsburg; in 1519 one with Wolfgang Stöcke! in Leipzig, one in 1520 with S. Otmar in Augsburg, and there in 1522; one with Hans Froschauer in Augsburg in 1523. In the collections: in the Eisleben one, vol. I, p. 21; in the Altenburg one, vol. VIII, p. 894; in the Leipzig one, vol. IV, p. 86; in the Erlanger, vol. 36, p. 145 and in the Weimarschen, vol. I, p. 247. In the various editions there is a great difference in the arrangement of the text, which stems from the fact that in the lost original text (as well as in the Latin Wittenberg and Jena editions) several sentences were printed in the margin from top to bottom, or inverted, which were then arbitrarily inserted here and there by the editions. Also the conclusion of the bids is differently placed. The Weimar edition has indicated in its introduction a reconstruction of the original. We have subsequently given the sentences their position at the end of the relevant sections and have made them recognizable (just like the Weimar edition) by having them printed indented. These pieces must be thought of as being printed from bottom to top in the sections preceding them (the commandments themselves, their transgression and their fulfillment).

1) To suffer after-talk; but to invent love and friendship, thanksgiving and help, truth and faithfulness from his neighbor. All these things are commanded by the Ten Commandments.

So the commandments teach.

Transgression of the Ten Commandments.

The transgression of the first commandment.

Who in his repulsiveness seeks sorcery, black art, devil's confederate. Who uses letters, signs, herbs, words, blessings and the like. He who practices divination, treasure conjuring, crystal seeing, cloak driving, milk stealing. He who directs his work and life according to chosen days, celestial signs, and the diviners' discretion. He who blesses and invokes himself, his cattle, house, children, and all kinds of property against wolves, iron, fire, water, damage, with fictitious prayers. Who ascribes his misfortune and repulsiveness to the devil or evil people, and does not receive with love and praise all evil and good from God alone, and brings it home to Him again with thanksgiving and willing serenity. He who tempts God and puts himself in unnecessary danger of body or soul. He who is hopeful in his piety, understanding or other spiritual gifts. He who honors God and the saints, forgetting the distress of his soul, only for the sake of temporal benefit.

The transgression of the other commandment.

He who easily swears without need or out of habit. He who swears a false oath or breaks his vow. He who vows or swears to wrongdoing. He who swears in God's name. He who speaks foolish fables about God, and recklessly perverts the words of Scripture. Who does not call on God's name in his repulsiveness, and does not give prayer in love and sorrow, in happiness and unhappiness. He who seeks fame and glory and name from his piety wisdom 2c. Whoever calls on God's name falsely, as the heretics and all hopeful saints.

The transgression of the third commandment.

Who eats, drinks, plays, dances, is idle and unchaste. Who laziness, office of God oversleep, miss. He who takes a stroll, or engages in useless chatter. He who works and acts without special need. He who does not pray, does not consider Christ's suffering, does not repent of his sin, and desires mercy, thus only celebrating outwardly with clothes, food and gifts.

The transgression of the fourth commandment.

He who is ashamed of poverty, infirmity, contempt of his parents. He who does not provide them with food and clothing for their needs; much more, he who curses them, beats them, talks after them, hates them, and is disobedient to them. Who does not think highly of them from the heart for the sake of God's commandment. Who does not keep the commandments of the Christian church with fasting, feasting 2c. He who dishonors priests' status, insults them. He who does not honor his lords and authorities, being faithful and obedient, be they good or evil. Herein are all heretics, apostates, apostates, exiles, hardened 2c.

The transgression of the fifth commandment.

Whoever is angry with his neighbor. Whoever says Racha to him, these are all kinds of signs of anger and hatred. Whoever says to him fatue, you fool, these are all kinds of shameful words, cursing, blasphemy, backbiting, judging, judging, taunting 2c. He who reproves his neighbor's sin or infirmity, and does not cover and excuse. He who does not forgive his enemies, does not pray for them, is not kind, does not do good. And herein are all the sins of wrath and anger, as deaths, war, robbery, burning, quarreling, strife, mourning his neighbor's happiness, rejoicing in his misfortune. He who does not practice the works of mercy.

The transgression of the sixth commandment.

Whoever weakens virgins, commits adultery, 3) incites bloodshed, and works such unchastity. Who unnatural way or persons (the are silent sins). Who with shameful words, songs, histories, pictures, the evil desire äugēt 1) or shows. He who tempts and defiles himself with sight, grasping, willing thoughts. Who does not avoid the cause, as eating, drinking, temperance, laziness, sleeping, and female or male companionship. Whoever incites others to unchastity with other jewelry, ornaments 2c. He who does not help to preserve another's chastity with counsel and action.

1) Weimarsche: "wars". This reading seems possible to us after the "rsksl lionsm" in Latin, but not probable, because the Wittenberg and the Jena have in the corresponding place of the "short form to consider the ten commandments, faith and Our Father"; "triegen".

The transgression of the seventh commandment.

In addition to thievery and robbery, usury is also a great sin. He who uses weights and measures falsely, or spends evil goods for good. Whoever takes unjust inheritance and interest. He who withholds earned wages and denies guilt. He who does not lend to his nearest needy, or lends without any allowance. All who are stingy, and hasten to become rich, and how else foreign goods are kept or brought to themselves.

The transgression of the eighth commandment.

Who keeps silent and suppresses the truth in court. Whoever lies and witnesses harmfully. All harmful flatterers and ear-blowers, two-faced people who cause dissension and discord. He who misinterprets and reviles his neighbor's good life, works and words. He who gives way to the same evil tongues helps and does not resist.

The transgression of the ninth and tenth commandments.

These two last commandments do not belong in confession, but are set as the goal and the time for us to get there, and to work towards it daily through repentance, with the help and grace of God. For the evil inclination does not die thoroughly until the flesh becomes powder and is created anew.

The five senses are included in the fifth and sixth commandments. The six works of mercy in the fifth and seventh. The seven deadly sins, truce 2c. in the first and second. Unchastity in the sixth. Wrath and hatred in the fifth. Gluttony in the sixth. Sloth in the third, and probably in all. The foreign

The sins are in all the commandments; for with hot, counseling, and help, against all the commandments may be sinned against. The calling and silent sins are against the fifth, sixth and seventh commandments 2c.

His own love, and God's and neighbor's contempt.

Take from God what is his and take from him what is hers.

Take from your neighbor what is his, and do not deprive him of what is yours.

So does nature, left to itself, through Adam's first sin.

The fulfillment of the ten commandments of GOD.

The fulfillment of the first commandment.

God's fear and love in right faith and firmly trusting, standing quite purely, loudly, calmly in all things, be they evil or good.

The fulfillment of the other commandment.

Praise, honor, dedication, and invocation of God's name, and to destroy his own name and honor altogether, that God alone may be praised, who alone is and works all things.

The fulfillment of the third commandment.

To prepare oneself to God and to seek grace. This is done by praying, listening to Mass and the Gospel, and considering Christ's suffering, and thus going spiritually to the Sacrament. For this commandment requires a spiritually poor soul, which sacrifices its own nothingness before God, 2) so that He may be God, and receive His work and name in it, according to the first two commandments.

The fulfillment of the "fourth" commandment.

Willing obedience and submission to all violence, for the sake of God's good pleasure. As the apostle St. Peter says [1. Ep. 2, 20.], without all barking, complaining and murmuring.

2) This sentence reads in the Weimarschen: "die do yres nicht sein vor got opffert". In the Wittenberg and in the Jmaer this sentence is printed in the short form: "die da jres (nicht sein) für Gott opffert". The meaning is: who sacrifices her own, namely "not being", to GÖtte. At the conclusion of this passage it is thus expressed, "The love of God 2c. deprives him of her mere nothingness."

The fulfillment of the fifth commandment.

Patience, meekness, kindness, peacefulness, mercy, and above all, a sweet, kind heart, without all hatred, anger, bitterness toward any man, even toward enemies.

The fulfillment of the sixth commandment.

Chastity, discipline, shamefulness in works, words, verden 1) and thoughts. Also moderation in eating, drinking, sleeping, and everything that is conducive to chastity.

The fulfillment of the seventh commandment.

Poverty of spirit, gentleness, willingness to lend and give one's goods, living without all avarice and covetousness.

The fulfillment of the eighth commandment.

A peaceful, wholesome tongue that harms no one and pampers everyone, that atones for the disagreeable, excuses and defends the reviled; that is, truth and simplicity in words.

The ninth and tenth fulfillment.

This is perfect chastity and contempt of temporal lust and goods thoroughly accomplished in that life alone, amen.

The love of God and neighbor, and his own contempt. Abstains from the goods and names of God, and deprives Him of their mere nothingness. Abstain from your neighbor's goods and deprive him of yours and yourself.

So does the grace of God through Christ our Lord.

Note that it is a great error for someone to go to the Holy Sacrament relying on the unfaithful pretense that he has confessed, prayed, and is not aware of some mortal sin. For they themselves will receive judgment [1 Cor. 11, 29.]

not become pure nor worthy by such their works or consciences; rather, by such presumptuous purity they become impure. But he who believes and trusts that he will obtain grace and purity in the sacrament, this faith and trust makes him pure and worthy, who does not rely on the above-mentioned works, but on the pure, faithful and kind word and promise of Christ, when he says: "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden with sins, and I will refresh you." In these comforting words of discretion and sure confidence one should approach, and those who approach in this way will not be put to shame. For we can never be sure from our works whether we are without mortal sin, and yet he who wants to go to the sacrament without harm must certainly be without mortal sin. Therefore the certainty stands on the word and promise and call of the faithful Savior of Christ, as it is said.

Paul also means this [1 Cor. 11:28], saying, "Let every man examine himself, and then eat of this bread." But he that examineth himself aright, forgetting another man's evil, and judging not, but feeling himself to be laboring, and burdened with many sins and infirmities, and so becoming desirous of the grace and help of Christ; this is the very noblest and nearest preparation for the Sacrament. For, as St. Augustine says, "Food seeks no more than a hungry, alive soul; neither do they feast, for those who are full and hopeful, who judge and [dim] one another, than those to whom the apostle writes these words. For if the apostle had charged us in these words that we should search ourselves until we were sure whether we were without mortal sin, he would have charged us with impossible things, and deprived us all together of the sacrament of salvation. Therefore, it is enough that you do not know a mortal sin, in a certain gross way, or a certain intention to commit mortal sin; put that behind in the grace of God, and let your faith be your purity, and you will be sure."

III. interpretations on the fourth book of Moses

The blessing,

When one speaks after Mass about the people, from the fourth book of Moses at the sixth chapter, interpreted by D. Martin Luther.*)

Preached probably in 1527, published in 1532.

Deut. 6:22-27 And the LORD said unto Moses, Say unto Aaron and unto his sons: Thus shall ye bless the children of Israel, saying: The LORD bless thee, and keep thee. The LORD make his face to shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee. The LORD lift up his countenance upon thee, and give thee peace. For they shall put my name upon the children of Israel, and I will bless them. The LORD bless thee, and keep thee.

1. the first part of this blessing concerns bodily life and goods, as Genesis 1:28 and elsewhere is often said: "And God blessed them, saying, Grow, and be fruitful." Hence also in Scripture (Gen. 27, 34. 36. 38.) the common way is to say, "Give me a blessing." "Hast thou no more blessing?" that is, Give me something, as goods, bread, raiment 2c. For all things are the gift of God, and by His blessing we have what we have; and therefore also is called a blessing, that is, a gift from God that He gives us through His blessing.

2 This blessing wishes the people that God may give them happiness and all good things, and also protect and preserve them, namely, that they may first of all be fruitful in their own bodies, have a faithful spouse, food, clothing, and everything that is necessary for this bodily life, be it house, farm, field, livestock, and servants. And when he gives it, and we have it, that he also keep it and preserve it; as, the body from sickness and plagues, the cattle, house, field from fire, water, storms and all kinds of damage.

3 And such blessings teach us that we should be thankful and realize that our body and life, together with all goods and necessities, are not made or won by our work or labor, nor are they preserved or maintained by our diligence and care, but it is all God's blessing, God's guard and care [Ps. 127:1, 2],

In the twenties, Luther preached continuously on all five books of Moses, as we can see from the beginning of the book: "Auslegung über etliche Kapitäl des fünften Buches Mose". However, nothing is preserved from the sermons on the third book of Moses, and from the fourth book only the present writing. It appeared in 1532 under the title we have placed above it in two individual editions; one with Nickel Schirlentz in Wittenberg, the other with Kunigund Hergotin in Nuremberg. If this writing belongs to Luther's continuous sermons, we can assume with considerable certainty that it was preached in 1527. In determining this time, we base ourselves on the following: In Buchwald's "Andreas Poachs handwritten collection of unprinted sermons by M. Luther" we find Vol. I first half, p. XXIX in the index to Poach's lost sermons in 1528 twenty sermons listed, which Luther preached on the fourth book of Moses: on March 8, 1528 he preached on the 15th chapter of this book, and on December 13, 1528 he stood at the 31st chapter. Therefore, we may conclude that Luther preached on the sixth chapter in 1527. Because Luther preached only in the afternoon on the books of Moses, but the index in the years preceding the year 1528 only rarely mentions an afternoon sermon, so the news about it is missing in it. In the collections we find this writing: Wittenberger (1556s, vol. V, p. 245; Jenaer (1566s, vol. V, p. 480d; Attenburger, vol. V, p. 956; Leipziger, vol. IV, p. 89 and Erlanger, vol. 36, p. 155. This writing is also translated into Latin and is found in the Latin Wittenberger edition (1554), Vorn. III, col. 111>. We give the text according to the Erlangen edition, which brings the original print, comparing the Wittenberg and the Jena.

Not that we should therefore walk idly, neither working nor tending, but should do our part, working and tending, yet knowing that God must give prosperity and good in our work and care, as St. Paul teaches 1 Cor. 3:6: "I planted, Apollo watered; but God gave the prosperity."

(4) For we see how innumerable sicknesses and infirmities can befall our own bodies, wives, children, and servants, how innumerable journeys and plagues can befall the cattle, how innumerable damage and vermin can befall the fruits and other goods, and befall them daily, that it is not possible for us to preserve or keep a chicken or a piglet, or even a grain or a small stalk, by our power or wit, let alone that we should make or create it. The Creator, who creates and gives it all to us, must also keep and preserve it all; without our having to work, and not to be idle nor idle.

V. 25 The LORD make his face to shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee.

The other part concerns the spiritual being and the soul, for cattle and goods are not susceptible to such blessings, but remain in the first part, since they have the common blessing with us after the body.

(6) And here we must learn Hebrew, and be accustomed to the language. For it is nothing at all in German when I say, "God enlighten his face upon thee. And yet it cannot be given in any other way, nor can it be translated, so we must repeat it in Hebrew and leave it at that. And in German so much is said: God the Lord show Himself to you kindly and comfortingly, do not look at you sourly or angrily, do not make your heart afraid, but laugh at you cheerfully and fatherly, so that you may be glad and confident of Him, and have a joyful, heartfelt confidence in Him. This happens when he forgives our sin and does not reckon with us, but by his Word and Spirit absolves our sorrowful, stupid conscience, so that our heart may feel how God will not look upon our sin, but will forget it forever, and will always be gracious, kind, comforting and gentle toward us.

7. just as the dear sun, when it shines on

When she goes and scatters her rich radiance and mild light in all the world, she does not do otherwise than illuminate her face over all the world; that is, she shines brightly and joyfully, and delights not only men, but animals, birds, and everything that is in heaven and earth, she makes light and equal to newly created. But when she hides her clear, lovely face or goes down, all things look sour, sorrowful, gloomy, black, as if they were dead and in hell.

8 So you should also understand the text of the blessing here. When God gives His word, He makes His face shine joyfully and brightly upon all consciences, and thereby makes them joyful, bold, light, and as new hearts and new people. For it brings forgiveness of sins, and shows God as a gracious, merciful Father, who mourns and pities our sorrow and grief. But when he takes away his word, then he hides his face, then it becomes dark, black, afflicted, sorrow and grief in the conscience, then one feels vain anger and no mercy.

(9) This blessing (if I may pronounce it in German) desires that God may make His gracious word shine abundantly to us and thereby make our consciences joyful, that sin, conscience, law and devil do not frighten us, nor make us despondent, stupid and sorrowful, that we do not feel His wrath, but His favor and love in our hearts. This is the right, spiritual, great blessing that gives spiritual and eternal life, which cannot be given to animals, cattle, birds 2c.

10 But he adds, "And be gracious to you," and does not let it be enough that he makes his face shine or shine upon us. For there are also two parts in this blessing, which St. Paul is wont to call differently, gratia et donum, grace and gift. The first is grace or favor, when he turns his wrath and looks upon us graciously through his word, and forgives us all sin, and so makes our heart secure and joyful toward him. After this he also gives the rich and various gifts of his Spirit, by which we do much, both in ourselves and in all the world; as, teaching, comforting, counseling, helping, baptizing, administering the sacrament, performing miracles, and the like; as 1 Cor. 12:4 f. Paul tells us.

(11) Just as the sun, when it rises, not only makes all the world happy with its lovely, beautiful light, but also works, gives, and helps so that both men and animals can do all kinds of things, work, walk, stand, and use all their limbs; it warms and drives all kinds of plants and fruits until it makes everything ripe and perfect. So the blessing also says here that God not only wants to shine brightly for us with the word of grace, and make us happy through the forgiveness of sins and the display of His favor toward us, but also to be gracious to us, that is, to graciously press upon us, to strengthen us with spirit and gifts to do all His will. Therefore this word "to be gracious" means as much as to pardon or to give graciously; as the archfather Jacob, Gen. 33, 5, uses this word, and says to Esau: These are my children, whom the Lord has pardoned, given, or graciously given to me.

(12) And this blessing teaches us once again that we should be thankful and realize that we cannot get rid of our sin by any merit or work, nor can all the holiness and wisdom on earth, all the other preachers and teachers, whoever they may be, still or comfort a single conscience in the least sin, but the light of the divine word alone must do it. Not that we should therefore do no good works, or live wickedly, but that we should practice good works, and yet know that a happy conscience comes from no other way, for where God lets His face shine upon us, that is through the forgiveness of sin, out of pure grace and mercy; Nor are we able to preach or confess, nor to undertake, much less to accomplish, any truly Christian work or word, where He is not gracious to us, that is, where He does not graciously grace, strengthen, and drive us with His gifts.

V. 26. May the Lord lift up his countenance upon you and give you peace.

The third part also concerns the spiritual being and the soul, and is a desire of comfort and final victory under the cross, death, the devil and all hellish gates, along with the world and other evil lusts and desires.

of our flesh. For although he has been gracious to us, forgiven our sins and graced us with his spirit, we still have to fight against the devil and other sins.

For the devil also, when he perceives that we have God's gracious word, and are plucked out of his kingdom, and become the children of God, he also becomes mad and foolish, and sets upon us the power of the world with sword, fire 2c., and the wisdom of the world with heresy and error, and the holiness of the world with false brethren and hypocrites: that it is necessary not only to begin to enlighten us, and to give us the Spirit, or, as St. Paul says in Romans 8:23, the firstfruits of the Spirit, but to continue over us, that we may obtain the fullness of the Spirit, and at last all the victory. For not he who begins, but he who perseveres will be saved, Matth. 24, 13.

(15) And here we must learn to speak Hebrew, for it is nothing in German when I say, "The Lord lift up His countenance upon thee afar off. And it cannot well be given in German. For the opinion should be this: If God lets His face shine upon us, then the temptation and persecution of the devil, of the world and of our flesh make such a storm in our hearts that it seems to us that the dear light of the divine word wants to go down and leave us in darkness.

16. Just as when the sun rises beautifully and finely, shines joyfully and shines sweetly, and yet a cloud and storm rises against it and takes away its light, so that one no longer sees the sun, and it is as if it wants to sink, and let the storm overcome and suppress it, so that one may well say to the sun: Hold fast, dear sun, and do not let the clouds and weather oppress you, or turn the day into night; but raise your beautiful light above all clouds and weather, and preserve the day for us, so that the clouds and weather do not retain the victory with their darkness, but you prevail and retain the upper hand with your beautiful light. So here also this blessing wants to wish that God the Lord will raise the light of his word over us, and thus keep it that that it shines higher and stronger in our hearts than all the temptations of the devil, death and sin, despair, despondency, fright and all misfortune can be. For if he does not do this, the devil with his weather and clouds is too powerful for us, and darkens and obscures for us the dear light of his word that we have begun with, and brings us so miserably about it that [it] becomes worse with us afterwards than it ever was before; as we see and experience daily in those who fall from the word, pressed by force or seduced by heresy.

For, as Christ says, "When the unclean spirit has been driven out, it comes back with seven worse ones, so that it is necessary to bless and pray, to call and wish that God would lift up His face over us, that is, to keep the light of His precious Word in our hearts and let it soar against the murderer and liar, the devil, who wants to suppress and dampen the same Word in us through murder and false doctrine.

18 And this third part of this blessing also comprehends two, namely. Lifting up of the countenance, and peace. For he desires not only that we be strengthened and comforted by the lifting up of his countenance against the devil, 2c, but that he also give us a peaceful heart and good courage in such struggle and turmoil, so that we may not only endure and finally succumb, but also have peace in the midst of the struggle and turmoil, praise and thank God, and not grumble nor become impatient against his divine will, as St. Paul says. Paul [Col. 3, 15] teaches: that peace should have the victory in our hearts, that we should do nothing against God or man through impatience, but both inwardly and outwardly, toward God and man, quietly and peacefully.

until the final and eternal peace comes.

19 This blessing is not far from the other common blessing given in the Latin language, which in German reads: God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit bless you, Amen. For to the Father is committed the work of creation, which this blessing of ours also touches, and expresses more clearly, as it says: "The Lord bless you and keep you," that is, he graciously gives you life and limb, and all that belongs to it. So, to the Son is assigned the work of redemption, which this blessing also touches and declares, saying, "The Lord make his face to shine upon thee," 2c., that is, he help thee from sins, and be gracious to thee, and give thee his Spirit. And to the Holy Spirit is assigned the work of daily sanctification, comfort and strength against the devil, and finally the raising from death, which this blessing also touches and declares, saying, "The Lord lift up his countenance," 2c., that is, he would strengthen and comfort thee, and finally give thee victory, as said above [§ 13 ff].

20. But the fact that God commands them to use His name over the children of Israel when they bless, is due to the fact that He wants to forbid the blessings of the idols, such as the god Baal, the god of Dan, and the like, with which the false prophets, under the appearance of the true God, used to bless the people, as one hears lamented from time to time in the prophets; just as in our country the priests and monks have blessed us by the holy names, as one finds in the collections, where they pray unashamedly: May God give us this and that for the sake of this and the saint. These are idolatrous prayers and blessings that are not made in the name of God alone, as they should be 2c.

IV. Interpretations about the fifth book

A. Luther's Notes on the Fifth Book of Moses. *)

Presented to his monastic brothers from February 23, 1523 to the beginning of 1525. Published before May 1525.

Newly translated from the Latin.

[Luther's dedicatory letter.]

Grace and peace to the venerable father and Lord in Christ, to the Lord Georg von Polenz, the righteous bishop of the church in Samland, to his father who is to be highly honored in the Lord Christ.

I have resolved, revered father, to dedicate the fifth book of Moses, which I have treated for my brothers in casual conversation at home, and which is to go out publicly at their request, to your name and to offer it to your reverence. This I have had in mind for a long time, but have been prevented by business; now at last I do it also through this Brie, since God has graciously permitted it; not thinking as if all that my humble self has attempted on the most distinguished and principal source (auctore) of all sacred books were of such a great man, because the prestige and majesty of it should rightly deter me and any man from the interpretation, as it is written [Ps. 50, 16. Vulg.]: "To the sinner God has said: Why do you declare my rights?" But necessity and the consideration of salvation have forced me to submit to it, in order to learn and teach godliness and worship (religione).

But in order to finally show my heart's attitude towards you, I have taken this opportunity, so that I may at least somewhat belong to those who bear witness to your sincere faith in Christ and your active love for his brothers. So we believe, if the Lord should deign to do so that, inspired by your so new and extraordinary (singulari) example, also some other bishops and princes may delight the Church of God with a new miracle, rejecting the statutes and human opinions, and accepting, honoring and spreading the pure Word of God, as their profession and office requires. For, praising the gifts of GOD in you, we do not praise you, but extol the glorious wonder of the grace of GOD, which, ivie we see, is strong, reigns, and triumphs in you, and hear it with joy that, as Amos speaks [Cap. 3, 12. As a shepherd snatches two knees or the lobe of an ear from the mouth of a wolf," so the Lord has chosen you alone among all the bishops of the earth and has delivered you from the jaws of the devil, which he has opened wide like hell and devoured them all. For we see nothing else in the other bishops (although I hope that there are still some people like Nicodeinus among them) than that, after the emperor and kings and princes have turned (subversis), they rage and rage against the returning or rather rising gospel, so that they may fulfill anew the word of the second Psalm [V. 2]: "The kings of the land rebel, and the lords counsel with one another against the Lord and His anointed," by which they at the same time cause God to fulfill in them what follows [v. 4]: "But He who dwells in heaven laughs at them, and the Lord mocks them. He will one day speak to them in his wrath, and with his fury he will terrify them."

But you have been given the very special and wonderful grace that you not only accepted the word and believed it, but also freely confessed it publicly, taught it and, according to your episcopal standing, saw to it that it was taught in your entire diocese (dioecesis), you also provided abundantly for those who work on the word: when the wicked see this, they are angry and gnash their teeth and harden themselves about it in vain. This grace that God has shown you, I could not pass over with silence, but had to apply it, as Paul does [1 Cor. 8, 1. ff.] with the Macedonians against the Corinthians, to every

I have not shied away from spreading, praising and singing your praises for the glory of God, for the spreading of the Gospel, for the growth of faith, for the consolation of the weak and of those who suffer in various places among us, for the uplifting of the fainthearted; finally also for the terror and disgrace of the enemies of the Word and of the idols who sit in the place of the bishops, who know nothing else nor can do anything else than to exercise tyranny over the wretched people. I have not been afraid to burden you with the hatred and envy of the other bishops, kings and princes by this praise, or even to put you in danger of your life, since nowadays no shameful deed is so great as this one, and is considered equal to the highest desecration of the sanctuary, namely that one confesses the Gospel of God, for the sake of which many have already shed their blood with the greatest constancy. Among these, especially Heinrich and Johannes stand out, who were burned to death by the Louvain Sophists, and after them our Heinrich von Zütphen, the evangelist of Bremen, who was killed by the Ditmar beasts not only with a fire or a kind of death. God knows what is still waiting for us, if we should otherwise be worthy to become comrades of them, and also to suffer disgrace for the sake of the name of the Lord. I say that I have not shied away from exposing you to this danger, since I am firmly convinced that He who honored you with the word of the cross will also strengthen you with the spirit of the cross, and will also triumph in your flesh, not only over the blasphemies of your name and the hatred and rage of the powerful in the world, but also over the powers and violence (if it should be necessary to suffer them) of Satan with his whole kingdom. For we know that he who is in us is greater than he who is in the world [1 John 4:4].

Moreover, so that this grace and gift of God would be even more abundant, the Lord has added this and provided it by His goodness, that you have a sovereign who loves the Gospel with all his heart, that famous hero Adelbert, from the lineage of the Margraves of Brandenburg, the Grandmaster

Prussia, which is given in the same spirit, to speak with the words of the prophet [Is. 32, 8.], to have princely thoughts. Thus it happens that under the Christian protection of both of you, the people of Prussia, who perhaps have never had the Gospel other than obscured or falsified, now, as it runs far and wide and produces fruit, hear it quite purely and clearly through the ineffable beneficence of God. For I believe that up to this time the Gospel has never come to Germany completely clear and shining in full light, although I do not doubt that the Lord has always known how to save His own everywhere, even in the midst of Sodom and Gomorrah. And behold the strange fate: to Prussia the gospel runs in full course and with full sails, where it was not called and where it was not sought, but in Upper and Lower Germany, where it came and arrived of its own free will, it is blasphemed with all fury and nonsense, pushed back and driven away, so that one can see fulfilled in this the remarkable (egregiam) fate of the gospel, of which Paul Rom. 10, 20. f. (Is. 65, 1. 2.) says: "I am invented by those who did not seek me, and I appeared to those who did not ask for me." But of Israel he says, "All day long I have stretched out my hands to the people who will not be told and who contradict, who walk in ways that are not good." But I will return to you.

Therefore, dear bishop (praesul), let this booklet be attributed to you, so that through you and in you Christ may be praised on this occasion, and at the same time, under your name, those may be served who have not previously understood the fifth book of Moses as well as it is given to me. For there are many, and among them some, who have made themselves believe that they are certainly the masters of all, who consider Moses and the whole Old Testament to be of very little value, since they think (velut) that one should be satisfied with the Gospel; from their opinion every Christian man should keep completely away. For it is certain that, just as the wise of the world say that Homer is the father of all poets, the source, indeed, a sea of all learning and wisdom and eloquence, so our Moses the is the source and father of all prophets and holy books, that is, of heavenly wisdom and eloquence. But since at this time (hoc saeculo) everything is beginning to be restored, as if the day of the restoration of all things were at hand, I have come to undertake this, whether perhaps Moses also could be restored, and I could lead the little books back to the source. For it is very sweet and, both for the understanding and to support the memory, very convenient and useful to see the footsteps of the later prophets in Moses, as they have read him, learned him, taught him and had him in their hands day and night. From his cornucopia (copiae cornu) all their treasures are taken, so that they themselves can also say about him: Of his fullness and abundance we have all received, as he himself saw beforehand and foretold that it would come to pass, in his song [Deut. 32, 2.]: "Let my teaching drip like the rain, and my speech flow like dew" 2c.

But I have taken care that I first of all treat everything in the most simple way, and have not let myself be carried away to the (so-called) secret interpretations, if sometimes, as it seems to some, inconsistent and foolish laws occur. First of all, Moses teaches the right godliness by preaching the faith in detail and abundantly, with attached! very beautiful ceremonies, by which the ignorant people must be caught and held, so that they do not invent their own, which God hates. Then he has to deal with the order of the civil regime and the preservation of love among each other, by establishing everything with very appropriate and reasonable laws and making decrees about it. There is nothing foolish or void, but everything is necessary and useful, which will be easily understood by those who know what it means to hold the office of authority among a people that is very free (paulo liberiore) and wise in its own eyes, as this Jewish people was, where necessity not infrequently compels one to order and do and permit such things, which otherwise would be laughed at and ridiculed with good reason.

I also don't believe that GOd will come out of a

He said that he wanted to form this people by such ceremonies for another reason than because he saw that the great house of the people would be most moved and taken in by these larvae and outward appearances. In order that they should not be empty larvae and a mere spectacle, he added his word, as it were, as a weighty content and essence of the larvae, so that they would become serious and important (graves), and they [the Jews] would know that God himself liked what they [the ceremonies] contained, lest, if they set up others without the word itself, they should become mere games and buffoonery. Such are our ceremonies in the kingdom of Pabst, which are devised after the example of the Mosaic ones. Because these have no command in God's words, by which they become serious and important, they are nothing but quite meaningless and ridiculous imitation of the Jews.

However, I have subsequently also added short allegories, almost in every single chapter, not as if I cared much about it, but in order to forestall the foolish efforts of some who have a desire to deal with allegories, as we see in Jerome, Origen, and other ancient writers that they had a not at all happy and wholesome way of using all allegories.

They have been concerned only with allegories, i.e., with speeches about distant things (alieniloquia), so that readers might be deceived by a false pretense of allegories. In order that the readers may not be deceived with a false semblance of allegory, I have thought it worth the trouble to show them that they are rightly concerned with allegories when they find in them, as much as possible, the service of the Word or the course of the Gospel and of faith. For all the figures and meanings in the law and in the people of Moses, however many there may be, go to this.

But the Lord, who works all things in all, who has also begun his good work in you, keep you and let you increase, so that you may become a truly great bishop in the word of God even in this life, and in the life to come, when the arch-shepherd of shepherds and bishops will come, receive the unfading crown [1 Pet. 5:4]. To him, I pray, commit me in your holy prayer, and in his grace prosper you. Amen. Wittenberg 1525.

Notes by M. Luther on the Fifth Book of Moses.

This book is called Deuteronomy, that is, the other law. For this is what Moses himself calls it in Deut. 17:18 ff, where he commands the one who would be king in Israel to take this other law from the Levites and read it every day, and in Deut. 31:10 ff he commands that it be read before all Israel for seven years at a time, when the year of Jubilee is celebrated, at the Feast of Tabernacles, in the place the Lord would have chosen.

But it is called the other, not because it is different from the one given on Mount Sinai, but because it has been repeated anew in a new covenant through the ministry of Moses before those who have the

The first time that the Lord's words were spoken in the wilderness, the first time that the Lord's words were spoken in the wilderness, the first time that the Lord's words were spoken in the wilderness, the first time that the Lord's words were spoken in the wilderness.

Therefore this book is a short epitome [of the books] of Moses and a summa of the whole law and the wisdom of the people of Israel, in which, with omission of that which concerns the Levites and the priests, only that is taught which is necessary for the people and the common people to know. And if you want to call this booklet really for our use, you can rightly call it an exceedingly rich and quite excellent interpretation of the holy ten commandments. If you know these, you will not lack anything that is necessary for the understanding of them.

It is necessary for the people to know the ten commandments. For it teaches this people to live rightly according to the Ten Commandments, both spiritually and physically, and orders the inner realm of the conscience, at the same time also the worldly rule concerning

The first is the way in which the goods are presented, and the second is the way in which the ceremonies are performed with divine fairness and wisdom, so that in the whole area of life there is nothing that is not ordered in the wisest and cheapest way.

The first chapter.

V. 1. 2. These are the words 2c.

This is a description of the land. The Hebrews use one and the same word "beyond" [XXXX, trans] when they want to say on that (ultra) or on this (citra) side of the Jordan, so that one can only judge from the position which the speaker and the hearer take whether one must say "beyond" or "this side".

Furthermore, a desert is called with them not because there are no people or things there, since in the Scriptures many cities which are situated in the desert are described, but because it is a woody place. The Hebrew XXXXX. is therefore correctly translated with "Gefilde", because it actually means a plain, where without forests and mountains flat areas (campi) extend far, from German: ein Feld. And see that Moses [4 Mos. 22, 1. 33, 48.] here makes "the fields of Moab" in the desert, by contrasting, as it were, the fields of the desert, as if it were a field in a wooded area (silvestribus).

"The red sea" it is called by the Greeks, but in Hebrew: the sea that is called, which is full of reed grass or rushes. It seems that Jerome [in the Vulgate translated the word XXXXX] wrongly: "Where there is a lot of gold", since it is more probable 1) that "Disahab" is the proper name of a place, which means abundance of gold. For also elsewhere the same man makes generic names out of proper names and vice versa. This mistake can easily occur in the Hebrew language.

But the following description of the country,

Since he says, "toward the Red Sea, between Paran and Thophel, Laban, Hazeroth and Disahab, eleven days' journey from Horeb, through the way of Mount Seir to Kadeshbarnea," let us leave it to the inhabitants of those places, so that we will not labor in vain over uncertain things.

V. 3-5. And it happened in the fortieth year 2c.

This is the description of the time. The fortieth year here is the exodus from Egypt; in the eleventh month, ain first day of the month, namely at the end of the life of Moses, who should still be with them almost two months, in which he makes his will and tells them valet.

But notice this: "He spoke to the children of Israel all things as the Lord had commanded him. He speaks nothing but what the LORD commanded him, for he repeats it and inculcates it to the utmost, so that he teaches that one should speak nothing among the people of God but what one is sure is the word of God, yes, even that is not enough, that one is sure it is the word of God, but by the commandment of God each one must be compelled to proclaim the word of God, as he says here: "All that the LORD had commanded him." He does not say: what the LORD had inspired him with, as ungodly men vainly please themselves 2) because of the inspiration (afflatu) of the Holy Spirit, since they make themselves believe that they do not err in their essays and counsel. For what is said here: "It was Moses' task to interpret the law" also includes that he spoke nothing but what God commanded.

1) Instead of vero simitius in the editions we have assumed Vrsiniilius.

2; It seems to us that plaount is better read instead of placonilb. After that ww have translated.

V. 6. The Lord our God spoke to us at Mount Horeb, saying: You have been long enough at this mountain 2c.

Here begins the narrative, in which he repeats the whole story beautifully and summarizes it briefly, citing the benefits and miracles of God and at the same time the works of ungodly men, so that he may praise the glory and honor of God, in order to entice the people, instructed by experience, to trust in the goodness of God and fear His wrath, so that they may in this way be sent to receive His law from the heart. For this is the very best preparation for hearing the law, and for stimulating the listener, which is done through the evangelical praise of God's mercy and wrath.

"Horeb" and Sinai are the same. Furthermore, Jerome is somewhat obscure here, since he says [v. 6.]: Sufficit vobis [It is enough for you], likewise [v. 7.]: Revertimini [Return]. For he does not command them to return, but after they had stayed at Sinai almost a whole year, during which they had received the law, built the tabernacle, and ordered the priesthood and the authorities for the right government of the people, When the people had been divided and numbered into bands and armies, and everything had been put in order, he commanded that they should set out in the second year, in the second month, and go in order and armed on a straight road to the land of Canaan, where they could come by the way of Mount Seir in eleven days. This is what he says here, "You have been long enough at this mountain; turn, and go, that you may come to the mountain of the Amorites." And so they departed and came to their twenty-third camp at Pharan or Kadesh, which is also called Zin, as the 4th book of Moses [Cap. 20, 1. and 3.], 36.] teaches.

V. 7. f. To the mountain of the Amorite 2c. (Ad montem Amorraei).

Let it be said here once and for all for unlearned people that mountain (montem) here and at

1) According to the counting of the camps in the 33rd chapter of the 4th book of Moses, the twenty-first camp was at Kadesh after the exodus from Sinai [v. 16.s.

The word Ephraim is taken in similar passages, in which it indicates countries and peoples, for mountainous regions, or rather for a whole country in which there are various mountains. Therefore we often read: On the mountain Ephraim, on the mountain Juda. So also here: "The mountain of the Amorite." Then the singular Amorraeus stands for the plural or for the name of the people, not for a single person.

V. 9-12. Then I spoke to you at the same time 2c.

Namely, while you were still at Mount Sinai (of which he had said [v. 6]: "The Lord spoke with us at Mount Horeb"). But he said this 2 Mos. 18, 14. on the input of Jethro, before they had received the law. Therefore this subject is set later in the narrative, which in fact happened earlier than the previous.

Dear one, note here that one looks around for persons and authorities rather than the laws are given, because laws are made in vain if the people are not there who administer and execute them; and at the same time that the authorities are an office which must bear the work, burdens and quarrels of the people, that they recognize themselves as a servant and do not consider themselves a master, as love requires. Those, however, who seek their benefit, idleness and rest in the magisterial office, wrongly bring it about that the people must rather serve them, and use the people's disadvantages for their own good will.

"Toil" [v. 12.] he calls the constant busyness and perpetual (paratam) affliction for the people to govern them, by which they [the rulers] are deprived of rest and repose.

He calls "burden" the exceedingly kind patience in bearing the weakness and uncouth customs of the people. If a person in authority is not gifted with this, and wants to enforce everything according to the severity of the law, he will rather spoil the people than raise them up. One must know the saying of the Emperor Frederick the Third: He who cannot see through the fingers cannot govern.

"Hader" are the trades that the people among

2) We have adopted xsrvarss with the Wittenberg and the Jena instead of parvorsii in the Erlanger.

In order to settle these, the authorities are necessary. Thus nothing comes from the people to the authorities but trouble, care, patience, complaint and work, as that Bias rightly said: Regiment shows what kind of man one is, yes, as the scripture says, they are called gods [Psalm 82, 6.], because they shall shine in completely divine virtues, far above the pale of men, because they shall blessedly provide for the weak and manifold common people (varium corpus vulgi) under the empire of Satan in hostile country.

The interpolated words [v. 11]: "The Lord make you many thousand times more" 2c., are also in use with us, and indeed even Christianly, where one says of children or of cattle, about which it is well: God keep you, or God bless you. Namely, this has been handed down from time immemorial, or taken from this example of Moses, where immediately after saying that the people were multiplied like the stars of heaven, he adds: "God make you much more," as if he feared a spell, as our women are wont to suspect when the little children are praised to their faces by someone.

V. 13-16. Create wise men from among you 2c.

The animals are governed by force and art. Men must be governed by wisdom and understanding, because man has his strength (viaget) in reason, which cannot be attained by putting a rope on him or thrusting a sword into him, but by the word, which comes to him through the ear; but when reason is taken captive by the word, the whole man is drawn and governed [and brought] whithersoever thou wilt.

And here you see that the authorities are to be chosen by the votes of the people, which also reason prescribes. Therefore also here the people is caught in this way by the word of Mosi, obeys willingly and praises Moshe. For that the authorities are imposed on the people against their will is dangerous or harmful. He calls them "well known people", because the people should know them, much but more, because they are supposed to be people who are experienced and knowledgeable in things, so that you must understand that the "well-known" and the "knowledgeable" (scientes) people are the same. "Wise" are those who understand divine and human things, namely, who know the laws and rights and all that is necessary for the life of men. "Wise men" in Hebrew are called those who are observant and observe with keen judgment, or who have a watchful mind, so that they can make a right and sound judgment about all things, and understand what equity requires. For many things lead the wise astray if they are not also understanding, and many things deceive them if they are not experienced and knowledgeable.

So you see that in divine law no consideration is given to the rich, powerful, noble, strong, friends, in the administration of a magisterial office, as the world is wont to do, but to the wise, understanding and experienced, even if they are poor, despised and weak 2c.

And one has rightly (sane) raised the question whether it is better for a prince to be good but not understanding (imprudens), or for him to be understanding but at the same time also evil. Certainly Moses here requires both [that he be good and also understanding], however, if one cannot have both, it is better if he is wise and not good, than if he is good and not understanding, because a good [prince] absolutely does not rule in anything, but only lets himself be ruled, and that only by the very worst people. Even though a wise prince does harm to the good, he rules the bad at the same time, which is more necessary and suitable for the world, since it is nothing else than a great bunch of bad people. Moses also seems to approve this opinion here, since he first deals with the wisdom of the princes, and only afterwards with whether they are good.

V. 17, 18: Do not look at any person; likewise, do not shy away from anyone's person.

This is the highest and most difficult virtue of princes, namely equity and impartiality (simplicitas) in the court. For it is easy to judge the poor and the ignoble,

But to condemn powerful people, rich people, friends, to put blood relationship, honor, fear, favor, profit behind, and to look only at the matter, that is divine virtue. No prince does this who has not been made brave by the Holy Spirit through faith in God. That is why the world is full of princes, "but who will find one who is righteously pious?" says Solomon [Prov. 20:6]. How often this saying is repeated in the prophets, where they are accused of oppression and injustice against the poor, orphans and widows.

For the office of judgment is God's.

This passage is also strong for the civil authorities. For just as he says afterwards Cap. 32, 35, that vengeance is his, he also says here that judgment is his order. He says this for the comfort and admonition of the authorities, so that they may know that they are not doing their own thing, but God's, and that they may be sure that they are God's servants and are doing God's work and are in a blessed (salutis) state, so that they may dare to judge rightly and badly (simpliciter).

See also this, that before the law was given, he appointed judges to lay equity to our hearts. For the judges find living laws or the soul of the law. Therefore they are more and higher than the laws and also than the sword. Therefore, although they are to pass sentence according to the laws and execute it with the sword, they are to have both the law and the sword in their power, so that they do not use the laws against the laws, like those foolish people who stare unblinkingly at the law, do not look at the circumstances of the matter, and have only this in their mouths: Thus it is written, so let it be done. But of this elsewhere.

V. 19-26 [v. 20] You have come to the mountain of the Amorites.

Kadeshbarnea is near the land of Judah at noon. Therefore, when they had already reached the borders of the land of promise, Moses encouraged them and soothed their faith by repeating the promises.

so that they would go in without fear. But here faith falters, and unbelief overpowers the people, [us] to a miserable example, so that when they were already at the entrance of the land they were to take, they had to go back for punishment, and wander in the wilderness for thirty-eight years, until they all perished and no one entered, except Joshua and Caleb; only two of such a great number.

But this falling into unbelief began with a small and beautiful looking doubt, since they pretended that it was necessary to send scouts to explore the way; and they do not trust in the word of God, who had given them the promise, who had also led them through the Red Sea, where a way was impossible; as if he could not or would not also lead them in an open land well provided with ways. Thus do those distrust God in small things who had believed Him in great things, so that you may know that faith is not a work of free will, but of God's grace alone.

But this work of God is also wonderful, as are all His works. For the Jewish people had to fall, since they were already on the neck of the Amorites, so that the long-suffering of God would be praised, which would give those Gentiles, who were already to be killed, room for repentance, and they would be converted. Thus, with harm and danger for His own people, He also cares for the Gentiles, by striking the one, sparing the other, so that He may show that He is not only God of the Jews, but also of the Gentiles [Rom. 3, 29]. However, this kindness and long-suffering of God becomes a snare and an offense to the Gentiles because of their blindness, so that they harden themselves and add impenitence, so that the wrath and the righteous judgment of God must come upon them in multitudes [Rom. 2, 5].

For who doubts that the Amorites, when they saw that the enemy had retreated and perished in the desert, and that they were now safe and free, accepted this conviction that they had God for themselves as a fighter against their enemies? And this work of God will be a trap for them, so that they will be measured because of their merits, and the wrath of God will be far from their hearts.

to other peoples, so that they now continue in their sins without fear. This is what the Psalm [Ps. 66, 5. Vulg.] says: "He is terrifying in his counsel over the children of men," and we see here an example on both sides of what unbelief and the blindness of men do in the world.

In the fourth book of Moses, Cap. 13, 2. f., Moses writes that the spies were sent by order of the Lord. How then does he say here that they were sent at the urging of the people? The whole of Scripture is like this, that it wants to interpret itself by comparing the passages from everywhere with each other, and that it wants to be understood by being the master (magistra) alone. And this is the most certain way to investigate the meaning of the Scriptures, if one strives for the right meaning by comparing the passages and observing them closely. Thus Moses said above that he had said, as it were, of his own accord: "Create wise men from among yourselves", while according to 2 Mos. 18, 17. he said this at the suggestion of Jethro. So it is certain here that the spies were sent because the people in their unbelief insisted on it, and that the Lord saw their weakness and gave in, and so said to Moses, Deut. 13, 3: "Send" 2c.

But the people sinned through this anxiety, and they began to base themselves on human counsel, not on the word of God alone. That is why such a great fall followed this little doubt, and, as Paul says [1 Cor. 5:6], "a little leaven leavened the whole dough". Thus the serpent struck down Eve, who at first doubted only a little, and soon was completely struck down by the unbelief with which he corrupted the whole human race. The word of God and faith are not to be joked about.

V. 27-33. The LORD is grieved for us 2c.

Behold, what a great fall is finally brought about by that very slight beginning of doubt and reliance on human counsel.

For now they have completely forgotten all the promises and miracles of God, have drowned in their counsel alone, and have become worthy of hearing false messengers and preachers, and, as Paul says 2 Thess. 2, 11: "God sends powerful errors to those who have not believed the truth." Those preach greater things than the thing itself, and these believe it, and instead of the right word of God they base themselves on the lies of men.

Only now the walls are built up to the sky, now the people are big and high, now there are Enakim, now the land eats its inhabitants [4 Mos. 13, 33]. After the word of God is lost, unbelief rages, and in vain Joshua and Caleb inculcate in them the promise and truth of God. The godlessness wins, and the lie gets the upper hand, the truth is beaten to the ground. Here is the fruit of human prudence and virtue in divine things.

At last they proceed to blaspheme, saying, "The Lord is grieved with us." Now this is the gratitude for so many miracles that have been shown to them. And who can duly magnify this exceedingly wicked example of unbelief? Notice, then, that unbelief makes the dangers more and greater than they are, but it regards the word of God as nothing. On the other hand, godliness considers all, even the greatest dangers, to be nothing, and considers the word of God to be a power of God, Rom. 1, 16, as Moses also says here [v. 29]: "Fear not" 2c., promising God's power and repeating the past examples to build up their faith, and contends powerfully by the word of God; but he does not judge anything.

Note: If Moses, who was equipped with so many words and signs of God, is not believed, but is forced to abandon the whole people to unbelief, why are we surprised that few believe us today, and the whole world rages in unbelief? Out of such a great number, only two adhere to Moses; yet even then he does not desist, or leave the ministry of the word and cease to be their leader (ducatus), but preaches in vain to the unbelievers. This is a great history and an excellent example of the divine word.

and human counsel, in which one can see how the almighty power of the Word stands in the world.

V. 34-39. But when the Lord heard your cry, he was angry and swore 2c.

From this passage is taken the verse in the 95th Psalm [v. 11]: "I swore at them in my wrath" 2c., and the example of this history is gloriously acted in the epistle to the Hebrews. But what is it that Moses [v. 37] says that the Lord was also angry with him for the sake of the people, since he had deserved this through his own sin, as is written in Numbers 20:12? Of course, he is hinting at a secret here. But according to the history I understand it in such a way that Moses, caused by the fact that he had to govern such a rebellious and unbelieving people, finally fell into unbelief, and he describes this here in such a way that the anger of the Lord struck him for their sake.

But this again is written for our learning and comfort, that we may not despair when we have sinned, since in this temptation not only many of the people, no doubt great and holy men, have fallen, but also that excellent man and exceedingly great leader of the people, Moses, together with his holy brother Aaron, that we may fear the Lord and mistrust Him, since we are all that we are by His power alone.

V. 40. But you turn and go 2c.

This is the plague, that they are forced to go back from the entrance into the land to the Red Sea, not to Egypt, but to the desert, so that they would be destroyed there in thirty-eight years.

V. 41-46. We have denounced the Lord, we want to go up 2c.

This one passage would be enough to refute free will, that we could know that nothing else is good for anything but what God works in us, as He says here [v. 42]: "For I am not among you." For what do they omit here that human counsel and strength can do? They have remorse, it does them

They are ready, they take up arms, they go up, and there is absolutely nothing lacking here that man can do. And yet, not only is it useless, it does no good, but it is also forbidden and condemned. Likewise, even after the punishment, and after they have suffered the defeat and weep and lament, he does not accept them, although they did so without hypocrisy out of all the powers of free will. But because they presumed to serve and please God by themselves and their work, and to deserve grace according to equity or justice (de congruo aut condigno), and did the works that were chosen by them, not commanded by God, they did everything in vain.

But this too was done to harden the Amorites, so that by multiplying their sins they hastened their downfall, since they came out victorious and believed that GOD was favorable to them. And behold the unsearchable judgments of GOD: to his people, who are presumptuous of their own strength, he allows nothing to go out happily; he allows them to be defeated and beaten, as if he were not their GOD; But the enemies, the Amorites, who trust in their own strength, he allows to be fortunate and victorious, so that you may know that it is more to be feared and a conspicuous sign of the constant wrath of God, when the wicked prosper in his way and gain victory in things that God has neither commanded nor works, but which he arranges according to his own counsel and in his own strength, as God has hitherto allowed to those who have been fortunate in their deceitfulness with human statutes.

Of the secret dentitions (mysteriis) in this chapter.

What I have often reminded elsewhere, I repeat here and want to remind again that the Christian reader, above all, applies his effort well by seeking the so-called literal sense, which alone is the whole essence of faith and Christian theology, which alone stands firm in tribulation and temptation, and overcomes the gates of hell with sin and death, and triumphs to the praise and glory of God. The

But allegory is often uncertain and unreliable and not at all certain to support faith, since it often depends on human guesswork and opinion. If someone relies on it, he relies on the cane of Egypt. Therefore, one should beware of Jerome, Origen and similar fathers, or read their writings with free judgment, yes, also of the whole Alexandrian school, of which the Jew Philo mentions (as Eusebius and Jerome testify) that it once excelled in such efforts for allegories. For the example of these, which has been praised and accepted too much, later writers have imitated in an unfortunate way, and at their discretion made and taught everything from the Scriptures, until some have drawn the words of God on the most incongruous oddities (monstra), and, as Jerome also complains about his time, bring the Scripture with itself in contradiction by inappropriate (incongrua.) testimonies; of which misdeed he himself was also guilty.

Such people are those who nowadays interpret almost all the Scriptures of the Holy Virgin, where they find only one word that is of the female gender; Likewise, those who build monasteries out of the little town of Martha, make magistros nostros of the strong in Israel in the high schools, and similar, innumerable sillinesses (portenta), until at last one is found who has applied the whole Metamorphoses of Ovid to Christ, about which Jerome is justly indignant in the Epistle to Pauline, and calls them circulatores.

Therefore, Paul's rule must be followed here, that allegories should be regarded as something subordinate (secundo loco), and that they should be used to strengthen, adorn, and emphasize (locupletanda) the doctrine of faith, or, as he says in 1 Cor. 3, 11. f., that they are not the foundation, but are built upon the foundation, not as hay, wood, and stubble, but as silver, gold, and precious stones. This happens when prophecy, as Rom. 12, 7. prescribes, is similar to faith.

1) Luc. 10, 38. stands the word oustünui, which is, a fortified town. In Greek which is translated in our Bible by "market".

is that you take a certain saying before you that is found somewhere in Scripture, which is acted upon in the literal sense, and only then apply your allegory, which comes to the same thing (idem sonantem), not as if the allegory should prove or support the saying, but that it should be proved and supported from the saying, just as a building does not support the foundation, but is supported by the foundation.

In order for us to be able to allegorize safely, Paul has preceded us in 2 Cor. 3, 7. ff. where he deals with the whole of Moses in a very rich allegory by comparing the clarity of the face of Moses with the clarity of the face of Christ. According to this example, you can make an allegory in the right way by making the office of the law and sin and death out of Moses, just as the office of the gospel, grace and life out of Christ, as Paul teaches beautifully in the fourth and eighth chapters of the letter to the Romans. Furthermore, Paul makes of the One Face of Moses 2) one that can be seen in two ways, one veiled and one revealed. The veiled one he attributes to those who are only brought to works and hypocrisy by the service of the law. These never understand the power of the law, but their hearts remain blinded by the reading of the Old Testament, so that they neither recognize the glory of Christ nor sigh for it. He attributes what is revealed to those who do not do works through the law, but recognize sin and are killed, so that they long for grace.

The description of the place and the description of the time means the place itself, where the law is taught, that is, the people of the law, namely the synagogue, to which all words are appropriate, which Moses puts here, namely: 1. "Beyond the Jordan", that is, since one has not yet passed from the law to grace, the gospel is also not yet taught publicly. 2. "In the regions of Moab," because there is the people who boast that they come from the fathers. For "Moab" means from the father. "We are Abraham's seed," they say. And "the fields

2) Instead of Lloss in the Erlanger and the Jenaer is to be read with the Wittenberger Llosi.

Moab" are what they have from the fathers, namely the name, the customs, the goods, the lineage and the promise of things to come. 3. "In the wilderness," because it is a barren and uncultivated people, when compared with the revelation of grace. 4. "Against the Red Sea" because this people has an abhorrence of the cross and the killing of the old man who was drowned in that sea. (5) Paran means boasting and glorying, and comes from the Hebrew, for this is what the generation of hypocrites is wont to do. (6) Tophel means falling, because they fall more and more every day, and it becomes worse with them, as the Christians are renewed every day. (7) Laban means white, indicating their beautiful appearance of godliness. (8) Hazeroth means courts, because the righteousness of the law is in the flesh by heart, and is never admitted to the sanctuary of the Spirit. 9. disahab is abundance of gold; the righteousness of works swallows up the riches of the world. (10) Eleven days' journey is but one removed from twelve; for the ministry of the law is very near to the apostolic ministry of the gospel, and yet it is distant from it. 11. "The way of the mountain Seir" is the way of the laborers of the law, which is hard, mountainous, and rough, and "Seir," that is, full of brushwood; but the way of Christ is lovely, easy, and pleasant in the spirit of grace. 12. "The kings of the Amorites," who are slain beyond Jordan, mean that through the ministry of the law of God the efforts of men are outwardly rejected, and that they boast of the law of God alone, but still cannot reach it in spirit. For "Amorite" means an eloquent or garrulous man, namely philosophy and human theology, whose first king is "Sihon", that is, a desolator, because this kind of teacher devastates the Scriptures of GOD in an unbelievable way with various interpretations (aequivocationibus) and perverting the words to their opinion. The city "Hesbon", which in Hebrew means arts and reason, or everything that is conceived by reason and art, undoubtedly denotes the rational (rational) wisdom and (like one says) verbose (verbosam) theology, which is imputed to the words of God; which makes godless Amorites, that is verbose seducers, and devastates everything, as then the Pharisees, and as now the high schools and the papacy do. The other is "Og", which is a cook who takes care of the belly. "Bashan" means fatness, because the kingdom of the Amorites with its godlessness and talkativeness deserves riches and abundance for the belly, as the examples are before our eyes.

"Ye are long enough" 2c. (V. 6.). That here the Lord commands that they should go from KadesBarnea to the land of promise means that another doctrine would be, that of the Gospel, to which the Law and the Prophets bear witness, to which the Jews were to enter at the time of the New Testament. For "Kades" means something holy, "Barnea" a wandering or unstable son, as the people are, who trust in a worldly sanctuary and in uncertain works, but never have rest in their conscience. Therefore, this word was fulfilled at that time when John the Baptist and Christ began to teach that they should move from the righteousness and holiness of the flesh into the kingdom of God, saying [Matt. 3:2], "Repent, the kingdom of heaven is at hand," that is, the right land of promise.

This is where the wretched apostasy of the unbelieving synagogue begins, and all the disputatious men die under the wrath of God, as the epistle to the Hebrews treats in a dignified manner by giving this example of the unbelief of those who did not want to enter into the rest of God, pointing fingers, as it were, at KadesBarnea, the restless holiness. But the Jews did just this also in the whole time of the law, as often as they did not believe the holy prophets who commanded them to go out from Kadeshbarnea to the true righteousness, to the righteousness of faith; but especially this happened under Christ.

"The spies" who were sent out were the masters and teachers of this people who saw the glory and riches of the promise, but through distrust and out of fear of the cross and unwillingness to accept the

They went back to kill the flesh and turned the people away from the faith by ungodly teachings. Even during the whole time of the synagogue, they did not go in themselves, and resisted those who wanted to go in: There are giants, enakim, fortified and large cities, a great and tall people. So the Jews said [Joh. 11, 48.]: "Lest the Romans come and take away our land and people", because they fear the power of the world. What "Enakim" and others are, we will see hereafter.

The second chapter.

V. 1-6. And compassed the mountain Seir a long time 2c.

This is (as he himself says in the text) thirty-eight years, so that the godless murmurers would perish gradually and the Gentiles would be given room to repent, and the unbelieving Amorites an annoyance, that they would be hardened by this weakness of God's people. But this journey was in stony Arabia (for Idumea is the largest part of it) from Kades-Barnea at the border of the promised land in the south to the Red Sea; after that, after a long journey, they turned back to the east to the Moabites. Then follows:

"Ye have now compassed the mountains enough; turn ye toward the north," [v. 3.] namely, leaving the Edomites on the left, and the Moabites and Ammonites (who dwell east of the promised land) on the right, so that they turned straight way northward to the Amorites, but afterward, when the Amorites were conquered, turned westward, and passed over Jordan into the land of Canaan, as may be well seen in the map (tabula). But Moses writes in this place that the three nations, the Edomites, the Moabites and the Ammonites, were exempted by the Lord, while he says in Numbers 20:21 that the Edomites forcibly prevented Israel from passing through. But this happened in different places. What is written in the fourth book of Moses happened in Kadesh, on the border of Edom and the Amorites, where they could cross over to the Amorites by a short way. But the

The Lord made it so that the Edomites refused. In this passage he writes about the border of the Edomites and Moabites, after the very long detour in the mountains of Edom, through the way of the Red Sea, where those nations, already frightened by the miracles and the power of God, which had been shown in Israel, needed the protection of God. But the Lord took care of them because of what their fathers Lot and Isaac had earned, who had believed in God, so He did not want their name to be blotted out.

But sweetly and kindly he commands that they not raid and plunder the Edomites, inculcating and telling them of the benefits and promises God has received:

V. 7-23 For the LORD your God has blessed you 2c.

As if he wanted to say: It is not necessary for you to be full of worry or stingy, and do not let it be burdensome for you to buy from them what is necessary for you, because you have superfluous that you can buy 2c.

Notice, however, that the history of this people, when viewed in detail (in specie), seems to be like the pagan histories, for in the same way victory and defeat alternate, soon there is abundance and soon there is lack, and even if miracles are shown so often, God hides himself so much that it seems as if everything is governed by human cleverness and chance. Without a doubt, this is how it appeared to all the godless pagans, which is why they set themselves against them and acted against them as if there were no God.

God would be in Israel. Therefore, 1) the histories of this people must be separated from all the histories of the Gentiles as far as heaven is from earth. In the histories of the Gentiles one can see either the greatness or the littleness of the works, but in this one only this one thing is to be admired and revered, namely the word of God, by whose guidance and according to whose will everything is carried out and happens. Yes, they are truly called holy histories, not because those things are done by holy people, but because they are done according to the holy word of God, which sanctifies all things, and in his holy name and in God's stead.

Therefore, although the deeds of all pagans are also nothing but miracles and works of God, they do not have the testimony of God's word and pleasure. Therefore, their things and histories are only testimonies (testes) of God's wrath, very terrible manifestations of God's terrible judgment. Therefore, the histories of the whole world, if taken in a heap, are incomparably less than a single one, and that is the very least history of this people. And that is why the arrogant and carnal people are deceived by the simplicity of the things in the Scriptures, because they do not take God's word into consideration and only take the things into account.

"He knoweth thy way" [v. 7. Vulg.] is a figure of speech (idiom) peculiar to the Hebrew language, as Ps. 1:6: "The LORD knoweth the way of the righteous"; Matt. 25:12: "Verily I say unto you, I know not your way." This is a word of excellent consolation, by which faith is kindled, as we say in German, "Er nahm sichs an," he recognized it and made it his concern, so that it denotes the heart rather than the mind, as is implied by the word-formation and the words of this sacred language. For if you show by deed that you know or do not know someone, then in truth it can be said of you that you know him or you do not know him.

"Elath" and "Ezeongaber" [v. 8] are cities of the kingdom of Edom, situated at the Red Sea, which are also famous in the holy scriptures. "Ar" [v. 9] is the capital of the Moabites, like Rabbah that of the Ammonites, and Sela, that is stone, that of the Edomites, from which the stony Arabia has its name. Further, Moses here makes a distinction among the giants, who in Hebrew are called by a common name Rephaim (XXXX). Those who were driven out of the mountains of Seir by the Edomites he calls "Horites" [v. 12.]; the Moabites called theirs, whom they had driven out, "Emim" [v. 10. f.], the Ammonites theirs "Sammesumim" [v. 20.], the Cananites theirs "Enakim" (v. 10.). Therefore the same tyrants were called by different names by different people. With this agrees Gen. 14, 5. where he mentions that by the king of the Elamites the giants were defeated in Astharoth (which later belonged to the kingdom of Ogs in Bashan), and the Susin and Emim and Horites on their mountain Seir. Likewise Gen. 6, 4. he calls the giants before the flood Niphlim.

But the Rephaim have their name from healing (XXX), namely because those noblemen and heroes of the country also wanted to be called fathers of the fatherland and saviors. Emim comes from XXX, which means terror; they are called terrible and fearful people, because they rage with violence and weapons. Horites (XXX) are called noble, distinguished, shining (candidi), the best (optimates), of the white color (candore), either because the princes in the Orient wear white clothes, like the Latins wear the state dress (trabea.) and purple, or because they are handsome before others. Sammesumim comes from m, which means crime or shameful deed, namely because they were outstanding murderers and robbers, and subordinated everything to themselves as they pleased. Enakim comes from wearing a necklace, as if they had been provided with a necklace (torquati). Niphlim comes from fall (XXX), because they invade, prostrate and oppress by force.

Of that Moses writes that the "Avim" [v. 23.] were driven out of Hazerim by the Cappadocians, One does not know for certain what he unless he sets an example by which he wants to show that when the Lord commands and changes the kingdoms as he wills, one people drives out the other, so that he is God not only of the Jews but also of the Gentiles, as he says here [v. 9, 19]: "For I have given it to the children of Lot to possess," and [v. 5]: "To Esau I have given the mountain Seir." For that almost all here make the Cappadocians out of "Caphthorim," I know not whether they are guided by the resemblance of the name, since the Cappadocians are in Asia; unless they mean that only a small crew of the Cappadocians broke out against the Avim. Furthermore, those whom Jerome calls Avim (Έvαιοs) are not the Hevites (Hevæi) in the land of Canaan, which were handed over to the children of Israel, because these are called Hivi (XX) in the XXX, written with n, but those Avim (XXX), written with X. With this name Jos. 18, 23. also a city in the tribe Benjamin is called. "Hazerim" but seems to be the same as Hazeroth, one of the storehouses, Num. 33, 17. of which ersuch said above Cap. 1, 1. "Gaza" is certainly the city in Palestine. So it seems that the Avim dwelt between the land of Canaan and Egypt, at the back of Mount Seir or Arabia, adjoining the Midianites.

1) Here begins the postscript to the prefatory sentence begun in the beginning of this paragraph: "although the history of this people" 2c. Here, instead of "therefore" (läso), "nevertheless" (bumsn) should be placed.

V. 24. Go over the brook Arnon.

Everywhere the words read as if "Arnon" was the name of a brook, although Jerome says it was the name of a high rising rock between the Moabites and the Amorites. If this is true, then the brook must have been in the cave under the rock, to which Moses also alludes in 4 Mos. 21, 28. where he tells that one sang in the folk song: "The fire has devoured the citizens of the height Arnon", and at the end of this chapter [V. 36.] he seems to separate "the brook" from "Arnon", since he says of the city, which lies at the brook, and does not add "Arnon".

V. 24. 25. Behold, I have given Sihon into your hands 2c.

The promise is renewed, and God's word is sent ahead, according to whose command and direction the matter is to be carried out in faith.

not by presumption or human counsel, as we have said. But it is a glorious promise that the king Sihon is given into their hands, so that they are sure of victory, and not only this, but that he predicts that also the terror of the name of Israel will come upon all nations, so that they can be sure everywhere that there will be no enemies either from the side or from the back to come to the aid of the Amorites, and that the Israelites should not care about anything but how they kill the Amorites.

V. 26-29. Then I sent messengers from the wilderness of Kedemoth.

"Kedemoth" is listed in Jos. 13, 18. among the cities of the tribe of Reuben, although others want to infer from this passage that it is also the name of a desert. But I believe that Moses wants to say: I have sent messengers from the desert, which belongs to the city Kedemoth, so that it is only the name of the city, namely that Moses wants, he was not in the city, but in the desert near the city, namely in the beginning of the area of the Amorites.

But you see here that peace is also offered first to the enemies, of whom 5 Mos. 20, 16. is commanded that they should be completely destroyed, so that everything is killed, which is why the whole community (vulgus) in the book of Joshua Cap. 9, 18. grumbled against the rulers, because they had made a covenant with the Gibeonites. This must therefore be understood in such a way that they first had to offer peace to all; whoever rejected it was to be killed; but those who surrendered were to become interest-bearing [Deut. 20:10 ff].

V. 30-35. The LORD your God hardened his spirit.

Here the glory and power of the free will is praised, namely that it is nothing but nothing, as it is also said in Rom. 1, 24: "God has given them over to the desires of their hearts," and Cap. 9, 18: "He stifles whom he wills. So if he is able to do anything, let him do it, so that he will not be hardened by the Lord. But to harden means to allow the hearts to be stiff, proud, and and become secure, or be not afraid, that they may be presumptuous of all things, fearing neither wrath nor judgment.

V. 36. 37. From Aroer, which is on the user of the stream near Arnon.

He mentions two cities, Aroer, which is situated higher than the bank of the brook (super ripam), the other one at the brook. I understand this to mean that Aroer was on the summit of Mount Arnon, as Jerome says; this mountain has a stream flowing down the valley to it, on which the other city was located. But Aroer he [Moses] gave to the tribe Gad, Jos. 13, 24.

Notice here how there seems to be a great lie in Moses. The king Sihon had only a kingdom so large that two tribes, Reuben and Gad, took it, that is, a people about six times smaller than that of Moses. What a glorious victory, then, that such a numerous people should have been able to take the kingdom.

people of Israel overcame such a small nation? What need was there here of the promises of God? or where is here the so beautiful appearance of a great miracle? But, as I have said, for these forty years he had humbled his people in the wilderness, and had ruled them, as it were, as a fugitive; after that he had permitted them to be smitten at times by the Amalekites and Canaanites. Therefore the enemies, the Amorites, were puffed up and forgot themselves to defeat them with small crew. Meanwhile, however, the people of God had learned to rely on the power of God alone. This is how the Lord always governs His people, so that it seems as if they are completely defeated and their enemies have completely gained the victory, and this is how He fulfills His miraculous deeds.

We have seen the secret interpretations of the kings and the names in the first chapter. And the killing certainly means the killing of sin by the word of God.

The third chapter.

(V. 1-17. [V. 2. Fear not 2c.] 1)

Again, a promise is made beforehand, when they are to fight with Og, the king of Bashan, so that the history may be sanctified by the word of God, and the cause may be directed by the wisdom of God alone. Everything else is clear, for the names of the places and the mountains, Argob, Bashan, Gilead, Hermon, which is also called Sirion and Senir [v. 9], and the rest also occur very often in the following books.

King Og must have been a particularly large giant, who alone, even after he had heard that king Sihon was defeated, dared to fight with the Israelites, did not come to the aid of king Sihon, namely because he trusted in the size of his strength, as it is written here that he was nine cubits 2) long. And

1) Inserted by us.

2) A cubit is the measurement from a man's elbow to the tip of his middle finger, which is a foot and a half long.

Without doubt, not only was he so great, but his kingdom was ruled by such giants, each of whom presumed to kill many of Israel, as they say of "Enak's children" (Enakim) in Numbers 13:34: "Compared to them, we appeared as locusts." If the Enakim were many, it is believable that the giants of King Og were also many, so that the work of faith in the people of Israel and the wonders of God's promise would be the more conspicuous. For under Saul all the Israelites fled from One Giant, which Og also hoped would happen here, and it would have happened if the faith of the people and the true promise of God had not worked a miracle.

That which we have interpreted: Sub scatebris Pisga [unler den Quellen Pisga^, has Jerome: Ad radices Phasga [at the foot of Phasgah] and reads in Hebrew: Affedoth Pisga. And it is not yet certain whether it is a proper name or a generic name, although I am inclined to think that I almost believe it is.

It would like to be the name of a city, moved by Jos. 13, 20 [Vulg.], where among the cities of the tribe of Reuben Assedoth Pisgah is enumerated, that is, Assedoth at the foot of the mountain Pisgah. But also Jerome says in the book "of the Hebrew localities" (locis) that it is the name of a city. Otherwise it means gushing water, springs, outpouring.

V. 18-20. Now therefore go armed before your brethren, the "children" of Israel.

This he says to those of the tribe of Reuben, Gad and Manasseh. But this reads as if he wanted them to wage war out of their strength. But this is done so that there may be room for faith and the divine promise, and so that God may not be sorely tried. For although God creates, nourishes, sustains and governs all the children of men, He does not want anyone to be idle, but has given the members by which one is to beget, nourish and govern the other, by which God is given the opportunity to create, nourish and govern, so that it may be perceived by faith that the hidden power of God works everything under the human work, and the unbelievers are deceived, who only look at the work of man and do not know the power of God.

So also here they are commanded to use weapons, and yet they are forbidden to trust in weapons. They go along in God's works with their powers, and yet they are not presumptuous of their powers. What, then, where faith and the Word prevail, are human powers but a kind of larvae of God, under which, hidden, he works his wonders, while by the weakness of them he challenges against himself the trustworthy, the strong, the wise, and the holy? and when they have begun, he soon destroys them, and triumphs over them, and makes a public display of them [Col. 2:15]. Blessed is he whose members and arms serve God in this way! Yes, he who recognizes that God's power and wisdom is such, trusts completely, not in the larva of God, but in the word, which is mighty under the larva.

and is able and does great things, yes, all in the Lord. Thus it will happen that he will be able to walk freely and securely, far from (in medio) presumption and despair, so that he will not tempt God, since he has what he can use, nor despair if he lacks what he could use. For God, who works with him among the things he has, will also work with him without these things when he has nothing, so that in this way he has neither abundance nor more when everything is present, nor lack or have less when everything is lacking. For he has GOD on both sides, as Paul [Phil. 4, 12.] says: "I have learned to have abundance, I have learned to suffer lack" 2c. But the ungodly are puffed up by the goods at hand; if they lack, they are beaten down, because they alone grasp the larva of goods; the rest, who will not use what is given them, tempt GOD.

V. 21-29. And Joshua I commanded 2c.

He repeats the promises of future victories and the appointment of a leader, and at the same time he inculcates the past in order to strengthen their faith both by the promise of future things and by the reproach of the past, since he himself was not to go over the Jordan with them, nor could he obtain this from the Lord through his supplications. And so in this chapter he concluded the story he had begun, in which he briefly repeated the entire history. In the following chapter he begins to exhort and interpret the law, and Deuteronomy begins.

But why is Moses not heard, since it is likely that he prayed in the spirit? This is written for our example and comfort. For although the Lord does not hear him, because of which Moses realized that he was angry with him, as he says here, yet he does not leave him and commands him to go up to the mountain and see the land, and to give the command to Joshua. So we too should not be surprised if we are not heard, since we do not know how to pray, but at the same time we should also look at

Do not doubt in any way that we are pleasing and dear to God, and take hold of His goodness under wrath, so that we will not be despondent.

Secret interpretation.

The fact that Moses does not cross the Jordan into the promised land, but is commanded to leave this to another leader, is the great secret that, as it says in the letter to the Hebrews [Cap. 7, 19], the law could not make anything perfect. For the law also does not give the spirit of grace, therefore it does not lead into the kingdom of God, where the right inheritance of the Lord is. Moses indeed kills two kings on the other side of the Jordan, that is, the law humbles sinners and shows that they are killed, and leaves nothing alive, that is, no trust in any thing, for it leads to hell and is an office of death, but leaves the cattle and goods unharmed, which become a prey. For the law does not kill a man bodily, but only the confidence of the heart; when this is killed, all that the man is and has, into the service of the law as a bark, and it lives the wretched man with all his powers as a prisoner of the law.

But because it does not preach the forgiveness of sins, which it has stirred up through its service, it must die in the land of Moab outside the kingdom of God. For it is not fitting that the people of freedom should be taught the constraint of the law that kills, but the gift of the Spirit that gives life. Therefore, the whole law falls here, so that nothing is left of it, so that even man does not know where it is buried.

Joshua, who means Christ both in name and in deed, although he was a servant of Moses, nevertheless, after his master died, he leads the people in and distributes the inheritance of the Lord. Thus Christ, who was first put under the law, served it for us; but at last, when it came to an end, he instituted another ministry, that of the gospel, by which we are led by him into the spiritual realm of a happy and secure conscience toward God, where we reign forever.

V. 1. And now hear, O Israel, the commandments and the statutes 2c.

After the narration and short repetition is finished, he has addressed an exhortation to the hearers of the law in this chapter, which he will begin in the following chapter. But it is a very rich exhortation and, as is the nature of this language, also in many words. For here, as elsewhere, he repeats it so often that if a carnal reader were present who did not understand what it was about, he would be annoyed. But it comes to us to hold down our displeasure, because we know that it is God's words that we hear. But to hear God is blessedness, even if He speaks one and the same syllable over and over again, how much more so if He speaks so many and so diligently? Therefore, it is due to us, to pay attention with fear not only to the words, but much more and above all to the person of the one who speaks, namely God.

But this frequent repetition serves that we, who because of our flesh always fall, are always cold and lazy to do good, always inclined and disposed to evil from our youth, may constantly have a disciplinarian and driver who keeps sin in check. At the same time, this shows the actual nature (virtus) of the law, to which it is peculiar that it persists, presses, and, until grace comes to the rescue, does not cease from weariness, accusation, condemnation, as the apostle says [Rom. 4:15]: "The law only causes wrath."

In Hebrew there are about six or seven words for law: XXXXX, XXXXX,XXXX XXXX, xxxx, xxxxxx.

Firstly XXXX actually denotes the law, and has its name from teach (XX), therefore it is called teach.

XXX is a commandment, as is often read in Moses, "As the LORD commanded me."

refers to ceremonies, and I like that. For actually it means the custom and the manners in holy things, which I call commandments (statuta), as in the 2nd Psalm, v. 7.1 will tell the commandment of the Lord", where in Hebrew it is said: "I will preach the custom and the statute", namely the new way and the right ceremony, which is to believe in Christ, the Son of God, as follows there, in whom all (omnes omnium) ceremonies are fulfilled, and to whom they refer.

XXX, that is actually what the Latins call mandatum, in German: "befehlen". For the verb XXX means to visit, to appoint, to order, to judge (censere) and to command in general. Hence in the 109th Psalm, V, 8th, XXXX, which is called in Greek XXXXXXX or xxxxxx.

"And his bishopric shall another receive" [Acts 1:20], that is, the office or government commanded him. Our translator renders it almost everywhere by justification.

XXXX is testimony that God testifies by His law and word that He is present and cares for us, so that we have an awareness (conscientiam) of God, whom we otherwise neither see, nor feel, nor recognize.

XXXXX translate it constantly by judgment, and not badly, only that it is necessary to know how far this word extends in Hebrew. For it likewise signifies the office or administration of justice, as in the first Psalm, v. 5: "The wicked shall not stand in judgment," where some would say, in regiment. Likewise in the 72nd Psalm, v. 1. "GOD, give thy judgment to the king." Hence also the book of judges has its name, which in Latin would be called the book of princes, of regents, of chiefs (consulum) or of persons in authority. Likewise Ps. 110, 6: "He will judge among the nations", that is, he will rule. Secondly, it denotes the work itself and the execution of the judgment. Therefore the word is found everywhere in the Scriptures: to establish judgment and justice [Ps. 103, 6.]: "The Lord establishes judgment to all who suffer injustice," and [Ps. 17, 2.]: "From your face come my judgment," and: "He has spoken judgments with him."

1) sk instrusão . . vocAtur instrumsiitum.

Finally, it actually means what is called in Latin jurisprudence, namely, the laws by which men come to the settlement of their disputes among themselves in civil life in worldly affairs (disponuntur), hence it is also more often taken for custom and usage than, for the law of nations or natural law, as 2 Mos. 22, 17. "According to the law of daughters he shall deal with her," 2) and Ps. 119, 132. "As thou wilt do (secundum iudicium) to them that love thy name." This broad meaning of the word creates obscurity and ambiguity everywhere in Scripture. Therefore, it is necessary to be careful.

XXXXX means to observe something (observantiam) or to pay attention to it (custodiam), namely a general name that goes beyond all those mentioned before, indeed, if we look at it closely, there will be only two or three words that actually denote the law, namely rPn and XXXX, commandment (statutum) and law, one of which teaches that by which we are instructed (ordinamur) to behave rightly toward God, namely XXX, the other that by which we are instructed to behave rightly toward men, namely XXXX. And these two are sufficient, and this difference seems to me to be proven and constant. For thus also Moses begins in this chapter, "Hear the commandments and the statutes which I teach you," comprehending with these two words, as it were, everything, as if to say: I will teach you how to live rightly before God and man.

Now the other words are all general, indicating the meaning (vim) and essence of the commandments and the rights, namely XXXX that they instruct and instruct us, 3) so that

2) In the Jenaer it says: kamt instead of: kamst.

3) Instead of instruiert and sruäint in the Erlanger is to be read with the Wittenberger and the Jenaer iustruant and sruäiaut.

that we are not animals and act in darkness. XXXX that they bind and compel us, so that we do not insolently (libere) despise what we have been taught. that they are commanded for us to keep, so that we have something to deal with, so that we are not idle. that they are (as I have said) a testimony to us that God takes care of us, and we safely rely on Him being present with us everywhere and always. XXXXX that they require that we be careful and attentive to them, so that we are not sluggish and sleepy in doing them.

Besides these are also these expressions: XXX, XXXX, XXX word, speech, saying; likewise XXX 1) and XXX, but these two are rarely in use, as Ps. 119, 66. The word XXX means "good, and knowledge, for which we have (in the Vulgate) bonitatem et disciplinam, and denotes almost the behavior (gestum) which we call giving and mannered conduct (habitus corporis), as it is said in the 34th Psalm, "David hid his giving before the king Achish," as the title of this Psalm says.

So there are only these two left: XXX and XXXX, commandments and judgments, which are very frequent in the Scriptures, from which come the judges and the judicial power. But from that word [XXX] comes the master to rule in spiritual things, whom the Scripture calls Gen. 49:10, XXXX, "Yet a prince from his thigh" [Vulg.], where the Hebrew text has, "Yet a teacher from his feet," that is, there will always be such in Judah who teaches divine things and has disciples at his feet, and will not be taken away from them until Shiloh comes.

V. 2. You shall not do anything to it that I command, nor shall you do any of it.

Before Moses commands or teaches anything, he takes care first of all that it is preserved unharmed and unchanged, so that nothing is done to it or from it. And this passage condemns in short all human laws, and decides that in matters of conscience nothing is valid but God's Law and God's Word. And in this the will of God should be sufficient, which so judges, even though reason and necessity require the same. For since we are drowned in blindness through Adam's sin, so that we do not know God at all in all His will and counsel, it is not only foolish, but also impossible for us to make of ourselves the light and the way by which we can reach God and grasp what He wants us to do, as the writer says in the Book of Wisdom, Cap. 9, 14, 13: "The thoughts of mortal men are miserable and uncertain. For what man can know what GOD wills?" Therefore, if GOD does not reveal His law by which He makes His will known to us, there remains only this statement about us (nostrum elogium), Ps. 116, 11.: "All men are liars," Ps. 39, 6.:] "all men are nothing at all"; and Isa. 55, 9.: "As much as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my ways higher than your ways." Therefore it is an exceedingly foolish reason of proof of the Sophists for free will: I have the freedom to govern a cow, to throw away money, therefore I have the freedom to do what pleases GOtte and to serve him. This is the same as saying: I can tread the earth with my feet and walk on the earth, so I can walk in heaven and walk on the clouds.

It is true that man has the knowledge and the ability to rule over that which is inferior to him and to act freely with it, but to rule himself and to do what pleases him who is above him, he does not know, nor is he able to do. There free will ceases; [there it does not rule,] but is necessarily blind, incapable, yes, dead and damned. Therefore, he must not presume on anything here, or choose anything he wants to do, but must base himself solely on the word of God, and do nothing to it or from it, so that if he is not quite sure that God's word is there, he will not do it at all, but if he is sure that God's word is there, he will not depart from it. O a necessary admonition!

But you will say: Why are so added many books of the prophets? And David commanded that the tabernacle of Moses should be taken down, and that a temple should be built, and set up the ordinances of the Levites; and Joshua did many things, and commanded the people; and so may be said of many other things. I answer, That is not to add to or add to the words of Moses, if any man teach the same thing in other or more words. This is how Moses taught and interpreted the prophets, not how they themselves were taught and interpreted, and according to his law they judged and punished the kings and the people.

Then Moses says here not of God, but of the people: "You shall not do anything to it" 2c. For who doubts that God Himself can add to it or subtract from it according to the circumstances of the time? For He, whether He adds to it or detracts from it, always remains true, and His word is always true, and faithfully guides and protects us. Thus David testifies in the first book of Chronicles [Cap. 28, 6. ff.] that he did not command according to his will (for God had rejected that, although he was praised by the prophet Nathan [1 Chron. 18, 2. ff.]), but at the command of God that the Temple should be built, and appointed the Levites. Thus Joshua had the command of GOD that he should command what was to be commanded. If all the prophets taught something different in this way, the Lord revealed this to all of them, just as he did to Moses, or as Peter says, they were driven (inspirati sunt) by the Holy Spirit, so that they had to speak.

That you may keep the commandments of the Lord your God.

See Moses here, who asserts that nothing must be added to the words of God, nor must anything be done about them, lest this result in the commandments of God not being kept. By this statement he shows that the statutes of men in holy matters conflict with the words of God, since they oppose them and cause trouble because the commandments of God are not kept. For this reason, Paul also gives them an evil name in Titus 1:14, teaching that they pervert the truth, and Romans 16:18, that they deceive the innocent hearts, and that Christ is the one who is the cause of their disobedience.

commands [Matth. 16, 6.] that we should beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and [Matth. 7, 15.] of the wolves in sheep's clothing.

V. 3. 4. Your eyes have seen 2c.

Moses composed his admonition from various things, so that they would reject the additions and counterfeits of men and adhere to the pure word of God alone. First [he takes the admonition from] the very obvious example of Baal-Peor; since he [God] corrupted so many children of Israel because of his worship, because it was invented by men over (ultra) the word of God [4 Mos. 25, 9.], he shows sufficiently how he does not want anything added to his commandments.

It is also not valid if someone wants to claim for the statutes of men: The Moabites were idolaters and sacrificed to the devils, but we served the true God with our ceremonies, and they were invented in godly opinion and out of a good zeal, therefore our conduct (studia) is not similar to that of those people.

I answer: The Moabites and other pagans did not serve the devils in such a way that they knew they were devils, but believed that they served the true God, no less than the idolatrous Jews, yes, than all our Papists, even the holiest and most spiritual, but their impiety was that they took the right name of the true God, and worshipped him with customs which God did not command, but which they had invented.

For those who do this think in their hearts that the true God is like this: He wants to be worshipped, and it is pleasing to Him what people, even those who are still godless, do without God's word. But he is not such a God to whom godless beings please, as the fifth Psalm, v. 5, says, but he is the God of the righteous, and wants to be worshipped by godly and righteous people who are justified by his word and grace, not by their own powers. Therefore, the thoughts of those people about God are necessarily a mere fiction and lie, and the God whom they invent and form in such a way is not the true God, but an idol of their heart, under which they worship the devil, the master and father of this lie. And so, in truth, under the right name of the true God, they worship idols and devils in false conceit.

Therefore, in the Scriptures, "other (alienos) gods" must not be understood as if their worshippers had completely denied the name of the true God, yes, they claimed it for themselves most stubbornly, as we read in the Prophets, but because they, retaining the name of the true God, without a true knowledge of God (which the flesh and man cannot have of themselves), made thoughts of God that seemed to them to be right, as if God could be given a form and were changeable according to the imaginations and conceits (visiones) of their hearts, while He cannot be formed (informabilis) and is unchangeable. Therefore, where the word of God is not, there is no right knowledge of God; where the knowledge of God is not, there is godless ignorance, conceit, delusion of the right God, as if he had pleasure in this and that, which we choose according to our own sense (proprie). But all this is godless worship, by which the true God is not reached, but in His place and under His name the imaginations (phantasmata) and idols of the heart. But these are other gods, namely the devils, who enter this delusion.

Then they also proceed outwardly and establish ceremonies, doctrines and regiments according to this delusion, to which they give different names; and they call God sometimes Baal, sometimes Astharoth, sometimes Dagon 2c., as we have also done by calling Benedictus, Franciscus, Domnncus and above all the pope a god, because we let ourselves think that we please God by all these customs and doctrines. This delusion is the lying idol of the heart, under which Satan sits and is worshipped in the place and name of God.

This is what the apostle touches on Rom. 1, 21: "Knowing that there is one God, they have not praised him as one God, nor given thanks, but have become vain in their imaginations, and their unintelligent heart is lost.

2c. I say that they have known God, that is, they have had knowledge that there is any deity, which is proven by their efforts to worship idols in the place of God. For if they had had no knowledge of God, they would not have been able to attribute the deity (eam) to the idols, nor to claim the name of God. But this was their imprudence, that they did not praise him as a god, that is, they invented him as such a god, who would like to be worshipped by their opinions and efforts, so that they would like to boast about themselves in such a way, (as people) who could accomplish something for GOtte from their own forces, which would be pleasing to him, and deserve his grace. But this is to dishonor God, and not to thank God for what one has received from Him, but to be haughty and presumptuous because of what one has offered to God. This is no different than wanting God to be shaped by us, and that we do not want to be shaped by God; wanting God to adapt His counsel and thoughts to our counsels and thoughts, as He says in Isaiah [Cap. 40, 18. 25.]: "Whom then will you model God after?" and Cap. 55, 9.: "As much as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are My ways higher than your ways."

But the fact that the Moabites served their BaalPeor with food and unchastity does not prove that they worshipped the devils for that reason. For this is the fate (fortuna) of human statutes, that they only raise belly servants (ventris animalia), so that Paul is under the obligation (Phil. 3, 19.) to call the belly their god, and Rom. 16, 18. says that they serve their belly. And all prophets accuse them of eating the people of God. The groves and the high places in the synagogue also testify to this, where they drove their will under the green trees. So also in our kingdom of the pope we see how they openly and unashamedly serve the good life, idleness, eating and boozing and unchastity, but at the same time they murmur their hourly prayers (horas) and crucify the masses.

BaalPeor is the name of a man who has the mouth

1) of which many think it was Priapus, perhaps moved by the fact that the Moabites in his service gave themselves to unchastity. But this proves (movet) nothing, because the unchastity (as I said) is a characteristic which all human statutes and ungodliness have; then also this history of Israel seems to be older and to have happened earlier than Priapus arose in Greece. Therefore, I believe that the true God was honored by the Moabites under this lying name and false worship, as he was called Baalim by the Israelites, as the prophet Hosea testifies. Then I see that Baal means the excellence (primatum) with the Hebrews in compound words. For thus they say balsam (balsamum - XXX XXX), that is, the most excellent oil (for oil they call [W]; likewise Beelzebub [XXX XXX], the most excellent fly, as we say: archangel, archcook, archduke, archbishop. Thus the Moabites called BaalPeor the most noble maw (hiatum), for a reason unknown to me, unless you want to take it as a supposition (divinare) that God is terrible and an arch avenger, ready to devour all the wicked and adversaries of his people, if he is not worshipped in this way, as with us the papists have invented that God is a very swift avenger, if someone has done harm to a clergyman by the devil's inspiration. So they also made a kind of BaalPeor out of St. Anthony, Sebastian, Valentine and Rochius to feed their belly.

V. 5. as the LORD my GOD commanded me 2c.

This cause alone should be sufficient that they would gladly do anything, that he teaches God's commandments, not his own, even if no punishment or reward followed. And this is the other part (locus) of the exhortation, which follows in proper order. For the first is about the terror and wrath of God, with which a lawgiver must begin, but then add to it the glory and love of God, so that he may entice the frightened to love.

1) vir Nistus. Cf. St. Louis edition, vol. XIX, 688, K 4S.

V. 6. for this is your wisdom 2c.

The third piece is taken from the preference (excellencia) and the dignity they will have over all nations, which follows from this. "Whoever honors me (says he [1 Sam. 2, 30.]), him I will also honor." If they glorified God in such a way that they kept those commandments and laws, it would happen that the Lord would glorify them in turn by spreading throughout the world the rumor of the holiness of the laws and the people who kept them. Through this rumor many would be drawn to the true God. And so also through this honor with which GOtt glorified them among the nations, GOtt Himself would be glorified more. For so also all the works of God, niwith which He glorifies His saints, serve to the ungodly that they may also be converted. This is the love that turns (kamt) and accepts all that is ours for the benefit of our neighbor.

"Wisdom" and "understanding" (intelligentia), I believe, differ in such a way that wisdom belongs to the knowledge of things, understanding to judgment; so that he is wise who knows what belongs to faith and reverence (religionis) toward God, and to justice and love toward one's neighbor, but that he is understanding who in both things (toward God and toward one's neighbor) is perceptive, wise, and prudent, so that he may walk rightly in them and not be deceived by any deceit; in German: "wise and prudent".

But consider this much more, with how few words Moses rejects and condemns all the wisdom and knowledge (scientiam) of men, showing that the wisdom and understanding of the people of God does not consist in the subtle researches (speculationes) of the sophists, nor in the splendid decrees (sanctiones) of princes and wise men, but in the knowledge and observance of the law of God. "This is (he says) your wisdom and understanding." Therefore, even though one may be wise in governing the affairs of this world (as they are wise to do evil), the people of God shall not seek wisdom anywhere, nor know any other than from the law of their God; there they will find abundant and blissful knowledge of how to behave toward God and man.

The only way to behave is shyly, as in fortune and misfortune, as in peace and war. For wisdom taken from elsewhere is nothing but foolishness before God. Therefore, by this word Moses makes all men fools before God in all their wisdom and prudence.

V. 7. 8. to whom gods thus draw near 2c.

The honor and glory of this people is greater than that of all the nations of the earth, because their God is near them, and also because He has righteous rights and commandments; if they kept them, the nations would marvel at them and receive salvation from them. This is a beautiful and sweet comfort and a reliable promise that God is near. This doctrine (locum) was often mentioned by David in his Psalms and by the other prophets everywhere. But at the same time he includes and indicates the cross of God's people. For the fact that He is near to those who call upon Him proves that those who call upon Him are in tribulation, which forces them to call upon Him, just as this people was always in tribulation, and all who want to live godly suffer persecution [2 Tim. 3, 12], so that the faith that calls upon Him has room and there is an opportunity to come close to God.

The worship of other peoples, however, as they have ungodly statutes against God and unjust rights against their neighbor, so they also have gods that are far from them, which cannot make blessed, yes, which let themselves be provided for and defended by their worshippers.

V. 9-11. And thou shalt make known the day to thy children and thy children's children 2c.

This day of the or assembly Moses often inculcates, because at the same the people had heard the law of God at the mountain Sinai under thunderstorm and frightening thunder, where not a man spoke, but the highest majesty by the service of the angels, and from this one day the reputation of Mosis began, as in the second book of Mosis, Cap. 19, is said, and the whole order (institutio) of the people.

V. 12-19. You heard the voice of his words, but you saw no likeness except the voice 2c.

This passage rejects not only the outward images of God, which he wanted to be forbidden to the crude and childish people, but above all and most of all the inward ones, which (as we said above) are the delusions and thoughts that we have invented out of ourselves, without the voice of God. Here, surely, the voice of His words alone is praised, and everything that is spoken or thought about GOD that is not this voice of His words is utterly ungodly and condemned. For it is by his word alone that he has willed his will, his counsels, to be presented to us, not by our imaginations or conceits. Therefore, God does not like or dislike what you think pleases or displeases him, no matter how holy and godly it seems to you, what you think (as the originators and teachers of the spiritual orders [religionum] and the sects have done), but what he himself declares through the voice of his word that it pleases or 1) displeases him. For no one can indicate or declare God's will except God Himself, indeed, everyone errs in an ungodly manner when he subjects himself to it, since no one knows the depths of God except the Holy Spirit who is in God. Therefore, it is impossible for people to think, preach, or worship God properly without a certain word from God. The saying stands firm, "You have heard His voice."

V. 20. From the iron furnace.

With a strong expression he calls the bondage in Egypt an iron furnace, not only because of the frightfulness of history, but also because of the misery of the consciences, which were oppressed under the wrath of the law and the tyranny of the statutes, of which the people of Israel were the model in their Egyptian furnace.

V. 24. 25. For the LORD your God is a consuming fire and a zealous God.

This phrase is often used in the epistle to the Hebrews, and it is worthy to be used often to terrify and humble the wicked. But there are two things: "a devouring fire" and: "a zealous God". He is called a fire because he consumes completely and leaves nothing for the wicked, nor is there anything that can withstand his wrath; a zealot because he has such a mind that he will not spare. Who should not fear him, who is known not to spare and has such a way (virtutem) that he is unforgiving and never stops taking revenge? Furthermore, he exercises this wrath in two ways; first spiritually and suddenly, by withdrawing his spirit from the wicked, so that the devil devastates everything; then also bodily and slowly, by also killing the bodies, devastating the lands and destroying everything.

1) In the editions: ot instead of: ant.

And notice especially that God is described by Moses as a fire and a zealot with regard to the first commandment, in which he is most despised, when he should be most feared and revered, so that you may see which commandment he himself insists on, namely that we should hold him as our God, so that we do not put our trust in works, but base ourselves on his mercy alone, although in no matter does he seem to see through his fingers more than in this ungodliness, since he lets the ungodly have the upper hand and rule with impunity and deceives very many, so that there seems to be neither fire nor zeal, but coldness and sluggishness with God, just as many psalms complain that he sleeps and ask him to rise.

V. 26-29. So I call to witness this day 2c.

The last part of this exhortation is the threat. For this is how we admonish, by taking our reasons from what is useful, what is necessary, what is honorable, what is godly, finally from the danger 2c., which Moses also does here.

V. 30-40. In the last days 2c.

This "in the last days" is generally spoken, for which we say: later. For Moses wants to describe such wrath of God that He always leaves room for repentance for those who come to terms afterward. This has also been proved by the events in history, where GOD

Israel so often punished, and yet, when it returned, always accepted it again afterwards. So he is not only talking about the last days before the day of judgment, in which, as one thinks, the Jews are still to be converted, but generally about all the time (as I said) in which they repented after sin and recognized the punishment.

And to encourage this repentance and to condemn despair, he adds the most sweet and faithful promise, on which the prayer of Manasseh, king of Judah, is beautifully based, namely, that God, your Lord, is merciful, who will not abandon you nor destroy you, nor forget the covenant he swore to your fathers [Deut. 4:31]. By this he indicates at the same time what true repentance is, namely a burning thirst for mercy in the anguish of the conscience. For only to these is the sweet mercy held out, but not to the hypocrites.

V. 41-43. Then Moses separated three cities 2c.

This thing Moses mixes into the speech by keeping the order of the history. For he certainly did not finish these speeches of Deuteronomy in one day, but perhaps barely in ten days, or on each individual day barely two or three chapters; and in the meantime he had to deal with things among the people, as they just happened, like this separation of the cities to places of refuge.

V. 44. ff. This is the law 2c.

This is the end of the speech, as Mosi's way is. Furthermore, the mountain Hermon, which is called here [v. 48.] Sion, is another than the one in Jerusalem. For the latter is written with a Zade, Zion; the latter with a Sin, Sion. Above Cap. 3 we said that "the springs of Pisgah" were to be taken for the proper name of a city (dici), (namely) Assedoth, which Jerome translated: "at the foot" [of the mountain], 1) but in the book "of the Hebrew localities" he makes it the name of a city.

1) In the old translation this reads: "das Hieronymus, wurzeln sraäiossl, verdolmetschet has."

The fifth chapter.

V. 1. 2. And Moses called out to all Israel 2c.

Here you have it that Moses, in order to complete Deuteronomy, preaches various sermons and calls the people together several times. Therefore, he always repeats on the following day what he had said on the previous day, as here, when he inculcates the covenant of God and the voice of the Lord 2c. Here begins the most important sermon of the ten commandments.

V. 3-5. and did not make this covenant with our fathers 2c.

Moses shows here the difference between the New and the Old Testament. The New Testament is the oldest, which was promised from the beginning of the world, yes, "before the times of the world", as Paul says in the letter to Titus [Cap. 1, 2], but only fulfilled under Christ. The Old Testament, which was promised under Moses, was fulfilled under Joshua. But this is the difference between the two, that the new one is based on the promise of the merciful and faithful God alone, without our works, but the old one also on our works. Therefore, the promises of Moses do not go further than keeping the commandments and the statutes. This was the cause that it itself had to finally become obsolete and be discarded and become a model of the new and eternal testament, which began before the world and will remain after the world. 1) But the latter has in the

1) Instead of äuravit in the Jenaer and in the Erlanger we have assumed äurnbit with the Wittenberger.

Time started and stopped after some time.

V. 6. ff. I am the LORD, your God 2c.

It seems that this commandment is merely an outward statute (ceremonias) about the images for the crude and childish people, but in truth it is a spiritual law, which requires the inward service of the spirit, also concerning the outward images. Incidentally, no one can interpret these commandments of the Decalogue better than Moses does in this Deuteronomy, as we shall see. Therefore, we do not want to talk more about it here.

But Moses shows the power of the law by saying that they could not have endured the voice of God, namely because the law, when it is proclaimed and heard in the spirit, completely kills and brings man to an unbearable knowledge of his sin and to the fear of death, so that man sighs for a mediator and desires a more loving word, that is, the gospel of grace, as here the terrified people ask Moses as a mediator, who will speak softer, so that they will not die from the voice of God. For what would a man suffer and do, so that he would not have to hear the law?

V. 22. ff. And did nothing about it 2c.

And afterwards [v. 32] he says: "Do not deviate, neither to the right nor to the left", namely he repeats again and inculcates that nothing be added to or taken away from the word of God, about which we have spoken enough above.

The sixth chapter.

V. 2. 3. that you fear the Lord your God 2c.

It seems to be peculiar to this Shewbrew language that it says "the fear of GOD" where.

we say worship or reverence of God or Greek θεοσέβεια, as Moses here connects the two pieces, the fear and the keeping of the commandments.

From this point on, we want to divide this interpretation, which Moses wrote about his Decalogue himself (because what is, from this point on, the whole rest of the book other than an extremely rich and very clear explanation of the Ten Commandments, as we will see), into two parts. The first part is supposed to be the explanation of the three commandments of the first table, which continues almost to the twentieth chapter; the second part, however, is the explanation of the remaining commandments of the second table until the end of the book. Of course, many people have written interpretations of the commandments (praeceptorial) and whole compilations (summas), but mere garbage when compared to this interpretation of Moses. For Moses will teach you what it means, not to have other gods, what it is, not to take God's name in vain, what the holiday is 2c. He now says:

V. 4. Hear, O Israel, the LORD our God is one LORD.

You see that he interprets the first commandment itself in an affirmative way, namely that there is One Lord. For here the name consisting of four letters (tetragrammaton [that is XXXX]) is put, which is peculiar to God alone. But he acts this unity of God in the spirit, that is, he does not have in mind both that God is one, but rather that he should be taken by us for one, since no benefit accrues to us from the fact that there is one God; but if we take him for one and for our God (as he says here), that is life and blessedness and the fulfillment of all commandments.

Thus Jacob says Gen. 28:21: "The LORD shall be my God." How is the Lord to be his God? Was he not before? He says this only because he intended to have only the Lord as his God, with certain ceremonies (ritu) and a kind of worship. Thus God becomes and changes according to the change of our heart against Him, as it is said in Ps. 18, 26, 27: "With the holy you are holy, and with the perverse you are perverse." Thus, the Antichrist exalts himself above every god, that is, he will establish his own worship, which he will exalt above all true and false worship of all gods, because nobody's word is more feared and worshipped [than his].

So the first declaration of Moses from the first commandment is this, that the Lord our God is to be held for One Lord, that is, that He is not to be worshipped with always other services invented by us, but only with the one He has appointed.

V. 5. You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart 2c.

The second explanation of the first commandment; for the first, just given, concerns faith. For no one can have One God unless he alone clings to Him and trusts Him alone; otherwise he will be carried away by various works and invent various gods for himself. The second, which follows from the first, concerns love. For when we put all our trust in him, cling to him, and recognize that everything flows from him and that he takes care of us, then a sweet love for him necessarily follows. That is why he uses the negative (negativa) expression in the commandment: "Thou shalt not have other gods" 2c., as if he wanted to say: It is necessary that you deny yourself and despair of yourself, so that you do not make many gods, that you have one God, because nature cannot do otherwise than idolatry.

Therefore, when he says: The Lord your God is a single Lord, he takes away all [other] trust. When he says: You shall love the Lord, he encourages a joyful and free service to God. For if I love God, then in truth I want everything that God wants, so nothing is dearer to me than to hear and do what God wants, just as carnal love does towards the beloved object. Thus, through unity with God in faith, we receive everything from God in vain; through love, we do everything to God in vain.

But that he adds: "With all my heart, with all my soul, with all my strength," is so difficult that, if God did not forgive, no saint could fulfill it. Yes, who is there who would not be deficient in both things, both in that he should have One God and in that he should love Him? because

There is no one who does not sometimes waver in faith and love other things at the same time. This is proven by the fruits. For if I loved God with all my heart, nothing would hurt me more than to see the commandments of God despised, as Paul lamented in his letters to the Corinthians and Galatians, seeing that the honor of God was being trampled underfoot. But where are the people who lament that the name of God is so trampled upon throughout the world?

"With all the heart" means: from the bottom of the mind and with all the mind; "with all the soul": with the whole bodily (animali) life; "with all the faculty," that is, with all the powers and limbs, of which I have said enough elsewhere. Not that we should love no other things, since everything that God has made is very good and lovable, but that in the love of God, and the things that are God's, nothing should be equated or preferred, and the love of all things should be pressed to the point that love toward God becomes complete. From this, notice how wrong those are who enforce their statutes and commandments so strictly, but allow God's commandments to be so neglected.

V. 6-9. And these words, which I command thee this day, thou shalt take to heart 2c.

Not only in the book, not only in thoughts, but in the innermost mind, so that they are the highest treasure for you, because where your treasure is, there will your heart be also. Therefore, nothing shall rule in your heart but faith and love for God. Let your heart meditate on this day and night, Ps. 1, 2. For if they are first in your heart in this way, then the right consequence cannot fail to be that they are also in your mouth.

"And thou shalt sharpen them unto thy children," that is, daily thou shalt repeat and inculcate them, lest they grow dull and cold, and be consumed with rust. Then it shall follow that thou shalt speak of them everywhere and always. Finally, you shall also bind them as a memorial on your hand and before your eyes. Lastly, you shall write them on the posts.

Behold the order of acting upon God's word: first, consider it in your heart; second, be faithful to your children and to third, to speak publicly and everywhere; fourth, to draw on the hand and to paint before the eyes; fifth and last, to write on the posts and gates of the house, not in books, because Moses himself had already written them in a book. Here I pass over these secret interpretations that drawing the commandments on the hand and placing them before the eyes means that one fulfills them in the work and contemplates them. He simply wants these words to appear to us everywhere and to be in our memory.

You will notice that Moses does not put this admonition with the other commandments, but only with the first one, and with its declaration that they should be in the heart, that they should be sharpened, spoken, drawn and written, so that you may know that the first commandment is the measure and rule for all the others, to which they must yield and be obedient; as, if it is according to faith and love, you shall kill against the fifth commandment, just as Abraham killed Genesis 14:15. 14, 15. killed the kings, and king Ahab sinned that he did not kill the king of Syria, 1 Kings 20, 34. ff. So it is also with theft, so with deceit and deceitfulness against the enemies of God, so with the robbery, goods, wives, daughters, sons, servants of the enemies. So you shall hate your father and mother, that you may love the Lord.

In short, where anything is contrary to faith and love, you must not want to know that there is any other commandment, either from God or from men. But where it would be according to faith and love, you shall know that the commandments are there in all things and everywhere, for the saying stands firm: "These words shall be in your heart", there they shall reign. Furthermore, if they were not also in the heart, surely no one could understand nor obey these various applications according to circumstances (hanc epik- klan), nor could he ever use the laws wholesomely and surely and rightly, as also Paul says 1 Tim. 1, 9. "that no law is given to the righteous," because [1 Tim. 1, 5.] the fulfillment of the law is love out of a good heart and uncontaminated faith, which uses the law rightly by having no laws.,Mv has all laws; none, because none [laws] bind if they do not serve faith and love; all, because all bind if they serve faith and love.

So it is the opinion of Moses at this point: If you want to understand the first commandment correctly, and in truth have no other gods, then keep yourself in such a way that you believe and love the one God, deny yourself, receive everything in vain, and do everything in vain.

V. 10-12. Now when the LORD your God will bring you into the land 2c.

He stops with the interpretation of the first commandment and begins to show in what way the first commandment is sinned against and teaches that one should avoid the occasion to sin against it, and takes first of all wealth and abundance, namely mammon and avarice, of which Baruch [Cap. 3, 17] writes: "The gold in which men put their trust. And Paul says that avarice is idolatry [Col. 3, 5.] and a root of all evil [1 Tim. 6, 10.]. Beware, says Moses [v. 11, 12], when thou art full, lest thou forget the Lord thy God. For the human heart trusts in the good that is available; if there is no good, it is full of distrust, as it is commonly said: Good makes you brave, poverty hurts. But trust in riches and faith and love cannot rule in the heart at the same time. And this is what he calls "forgetting the Lord your God. For this does not mean to remember the Lord when you speak his name, but when you cling to him in your heart with constant faith and love him.

And see for yourself how Moses acts the first commandment first spiritually against the idolatry of the heart, against the trust in goods, in order to awaken trust in God, before he says about the idols, so that you do not think that Moses had nothing else in mind than the idols. So this is the meaning: You shall have One God, that you trust in Him alone. If riches come to you, you should not trust in them; if they do not come, you should not be fainthearted, but always trust in the Lord, just as you trust in the Lord.

The Psalm [Ps. 62:11, Vulg.] says, "If riches come to you, do not set your heart on them," and, "Do not seek robbery, nor become vain."

V. 13. But fear the Lord your God and serve him alone.

"Thou shalt fear," that is, thou shalt reverence, and out of reverence for Him thou shalt shun trusting in mammon, that is, when goods are abundant, since men are wont to live in security and despise GOD and serve their lusts, thou shalt fear Me, and rule over the goods, shalt serve Me, and shalt not be carried away by them according to thy lusts. This also is a glorious explanation of the first commandment, namely, that we should fear most when everything is superfluously present, well kept 1) and secure, and there is no cause for fear. For this is the nature (virtus) of faith and the essence (vis) of the first commandment, that we be fearful in well-doing and fear God, again in adversities (as follows) secure and unconcerned and trusting in God, and, whether things go well or not (utroque tempore), clinging only to God.

Here the sophists have invented many a dream of the δουλεία, λατρεία and δπερ- δουλεία. The Hebrew denotes by one and the same word service against GOD and men, so that their distinction is without use. But he wants to say this: "Thou shalt serve Him alone," that is, all that thou doest and livest, whether under the servitude of men or in the government of things, thou shalt do with reference to Me, and it shall be done in no other way (nomine) of thine, but that thou mayest be sure in faith, that therein I alone am served, and if thou knewest not that I am served in the matter, thou shouldst soon desist, so that thou wouldst do nothing to please men against me, even if thou were their prisoner, and shouldst not yield to thy lust or honor, though all things abound to thee. So also Paul teaches that the Servants to be subject to their masters, but as to the Lord [Eph. 6:5], and wives to be subject to their husbands, but in the Lord [Eph. 5:22], and he himself to enjoy Philemon, but in the Lord [Philem. V. 20.], and he wants a virgin to be free [1 Cor. 7, 36.], but in the HERN [V. 39.], and [1 Cor. 11, 12.] that the man may come through the woman, but in the HERN. He dreams nothing of the and but raises the one and only servitude to GOD higher than all things, and spreads it over all things. Thus Peter says in the Acts of the Apostles [Cap. 13, 36.] that David served the will of GOD. Yea, if the δουλεία be separated from the λατρεία, it is already neither ζουλεία, but idolatry (idololatria), since thou hearest here, "Thou shalt serve him alone." So either your service (dulia) will be a worship (latría), or an idolatry (idololatria) if it is separated. But this is what the sophists invented, looking at the outward appearance (larvam) of the works and the sects, and measuring the worship of God according to the diversity of the works, although by this word God abolishes the diversity of the works and gathers them into the unity (unitas) of faith in the heart, so that you may consider only this, that you may do any works, whatever they may be and wherever they may be, in the fear of God and in His name, and serve Him only through them. Here, too, the papacy and every realm of human statutes fall by which such works are taught, thereby serving godless people who either turn away from God or force them to deny God. In this sense, Christ also answered Satan, who asked him to do works that should not be done to God alone, this word [Matth. 4, 10.]: "Get thee away from me, Satan, for it is written: Thou shalt worship GOD thy LORD, and serve him only."

And you shall swear in his name.

There are two things to note here. First of all, Christ forbids swearing in Matth. 5, 34; here it is commanded to swear. But also elsewhere we have said that the

The custom of the oath is twofold; the one that we swear for ourselves without cause according to our recklessness; this Christ forbids altogether; the other, since we swear for the glory of God and the salvation of our neighbor out of faith and love, in order to confirm the truth. This Moses commands, in such a way that he does not command to swear, but urges it: If it is necessary to swear, you shall not swear other than by the name of GOD.

But how does this rhyme with the preceding? He had said: "You shall serve him alone"; in this service he did not distinguish the religious (religiosa) and ceremonial works of worship to God from the worldly (profanis), but rather combined them all into one, whether they be done to God or to men, so that they should all be done to God from the heart alone. This is also how the name of God is to be judged here. He does not want that one only takes the name "God" into his mouth when he has to swear, since Paul also says [1 Cor. 15, 31. Vulg.]: "By your glory, I die daily" 2c. And Christ says [John 16:23], "Verily, verily, I say unto you," and Paul [Romans 9:1], "My conscience doth bear me witness."

Therefore, you swear by the name of God when you refer what you swear by to God and take it in the name of God; otherwise you would not swear if you knew it would displease Him; in any way by serving God alone when you serve men in the name of God; otherwise you would not serve. By this oath you are kept from serving God alone and from being drawn into ungodly works or oaths. So Christ also declares Matth. 23, 16-22, that he swears by God who swears by the temple and the altar and heaven. And Matth. 5, 34-36. He forbids to swear by Jerusalem, by the head, by heaven, by all things, because in all these things one swears by God. But if one swears by God carelessly and uselessly, that is taking the name of God uselessly.

That he therefore wants one to swear by the name of God and by no other, is not only the reason that for the Truth (which is GOD) is not to be confirmed by anyone other than GOD Himself, but that man alone remain in GOD's service, and learn to carry everything home to Him, and to do, have, use and suffer everything in His name, so that they would not be turned away from GOD if they used another name, and become accustomed to swearing as if it were none of God's business, and thus finally, through evil use, make a distinction between the works by which God is served and the works by which God is not served, since He wants to be served in all things, and that everything be done in His fear, being present, watching and judging.

Therefore, one should use the oath as well as the sword and sexual intercourse (copula sexus). It is forbidden to take the sword, because Christ says [Matth. 26, 52.]: "Whoever takes the sword shall perish by the sword", because he takes it without command and of his own will. But the command is there to wield the sword, and it is a service of GOD, Rom. 13, 4. when it is decreed by GOD or through men. For then it is wielded in the name of the LORD for the good of the neighbor, as Paul says, "She [the authorities] is GOD's servant, for your good." Thus it is forbidden to use the flesh for sexual intercourse, because it is a disorderly (vaga), evil lust. But where sex is joined to thee by marriage, it is a duty to use the flesh, which must be performed, and now thou mayest use the flesh in the name of the Lord, and do thy trespass against the divine law, that is, against love. In the same way, use the oath that you do not swear for yourself, but to God or to your neighbor in the name of the Lord. In this way, you will always remain in the service of God alone.

V. 16. You shall not tempt the Lord your God.

As he taught in the previous word about the fear of God, that we behave rightly in prosperity, so that we may not be secure, so he teaches in this word that we suffer rightly in adversity, so that we may be

We must be secure and unconcerned, and be sure that God will take care of us, who will not abandon us, but will be close to us and present in all our needs, which is not done by the unbelievers and the godless, who are attached to [visible] things. But God is tempted in two ways. First, when we do not use the necessary things that are at hand, but seek others that are not there, as the devil tempted Christ by asking him to throw himself down from the pinnacle of the Temple, while there were stairs on which he could descend. So would he [God] tempt who would not use the garment in cold weather, but expected a sign from heaven so that he would not freeze, just as the Jews despised the signs that were there and desired another from heaven. Likewise [tempts the one GOD] who snores and will not work, and thinks that GOD must feed him without work, whereas GOD has promised him that He will provide for him through work, as it says Prov. 10:4: "The hand of the diligent makes rich, but the lax hand will starve."

Such is the common celibate state, since God, by creating and adding the woman, has provided counsel for sin and the weakness of the flesh, and foolish people let this go, presuming to keep chastity by a miracle from heaven. It has also been said above how God shows His works under the cover of existing things, and wants us to use them, but not to trust in them. For although it is true that an industrious hand makes one rich, it is also true that the blessing of the Lord alone makes one rich, as Solomon says, namely, through an industrious hand. For if an industrious hand were hindered by force, the blessing of the Lord would still make rich. Thus, GOD gives salvation by the sword alone, and yet the salvation (salus) that comes through a man is vain (as David [Ps. 44, 7.] says): "And my sword cannot help me." But it will help GOD by the sword if it is there, and without the sword if one cannot have it. One must therefore of things, but not trust in them. But in God alone one must trust, and that as much when that is there, which you may use, as when it is not there.

Secondly, GOD is tempted when there is nothing present of which one has need but the mere and sole word of GOD. Moses is actually talking about this temptation here, since he adds: "As ye tempted him at Massa," where they quarreled, saying [Ex. 17:2, 7], "Is the LORD among us, or not?" For here the ungodly people are not satisfied with the word; if GOD does not do what He has promised at the time, in the place, in the way they prescribe, they depart from Him and do not believe. But if one wants to prescribe the place, the time, or the way to God, this is actually trying him, and wanting to grasp him with one's hands, as it were, to see if he is there. But this is nothing other than wanting to restrict God and subject Him to our will, and to completely take away from Him the divinity, which must be free and unrestricted and unlimited, and rather to prescribe to us place, manner and time.

Therefore both kinds of temptation are contrary to the first commandment, both that which occurs merely out of arbitrariness and presumption, when things are plentiful, and that which occurs when lack presses, and the weakness of faith persuades. And here you see that the first, most spiritual commandment is interpreted by Moses in the most spiritual and perfect way. For he has not yet come to the images, but with the condemnation of the inclination to ungodliness, which is the root of external idolatry and images, he deals in the first place.

V. 20-24. Now if your son will ask you today or tomorrow.

You see how much Moses makes it his business to inculcate the first commandment according to his spiritual mind, and we have shown that this is the way in which he most insists on the commandment, namely, that one should know that unless this opinion and mind is set right before all things (primo loco), it is nothing, even if they destroy all images and do everything; but if the heart is right in this, everything else will be done in the right way. With the other commandments he does not dwell so long, does not take so much trouble, does not make so many words.

V. 25. And it will be our righteousness before the Lord our God.

What is this? Is righteousness before the Lord achieved by works? Far be it from that, but (as I have said) it has to do with the first commandment and its chief work, which is to teach faith, love and the fear of God with all the heart. For through these the law is fulfilled and God is satisfied. Therefore, righteousness is properly set forth and praised here in this place, which is valid before God. For then we have in truth the righteousness that is imputed to us by God (which actually the word means Ps. 33, 5., in that it includes the imputed mercy), when we believe, love, fear God, and that with all our heart. Then the righteous will live by his faith. Therefore, Moses does not put this saying where he speaks of other works of the Law, because they do not justify, but rather are justified by the heart, which is already justified by faith. For he boasts of this alone, that he makes commandments and statutes 2c. that it may go well with him [Israel] 2c. [Cap. 6, 1. 3.].

The seventh chapter.

V. 1. f. When the LORD your GOD brings you into the land 2c. you will strike them 2c.

Moses goes on to indicate other occasions of ungodliness against the first commandment, and enters into the outward work in a very proper order; having first corrected the heart, the source of the works, he can afterwards correct the hand and the other members, teaching that they shall kill and banish the nations of the land, neither make marriages with them nor enter into covenants with them, and destroy the altars, the pillars, the groves, and the images. In this work he also keeps the order that he first commands to destroy the creators of the images, then also the images, because the images will be destroyed in vain if the creators and the teachers of them are allowed to remain as their worshippers.

Here it is to be noted that he does not speak the sentence that one should exterminate these peoples, but if they persist in their obduracy. Otherwise one would have had to offer them peace and carry them if they converted to Israel, as happened to the Gibeonites and the harlot Rahab. Then he commanded this work, not because he wanted this to be necessary for his people at all times, but because he had decided to completely exterminate these peoples because of their sins; to this work he wanted to use his people, while he turned Sodom without another people, and otherwise used to punish one people by another. Therefore, this literal and carnal understanding of the first commandment must not be applied to Christians, to whom it belongs to kill the Gentiles and destroy the images with the sword of the Spirit. For this work in particular is given to this people for a time, as is everything else that is commanded to this people, as well as marriage, covenants, and all outward ceremonies in general.

Here I must digress [a little] and speak of our new prophets, who are struggling

They say that they are urged by the first commandment (although they do not want to be Jews but Christians) to destroy the images by force and with their hands. And here they rage extraordinarily and boast that they are completely full of the spirit, and condemn all as guilty of the first commandment and of insulting the majesty. But I maintain that they are bloodhounds, rebels and murderers, who have nothing else in mind than murder and death. I can easily prove this from this passage, in this way: If they want that in the first commandment there is nothing concerning ceremonies (ceremoniale), but claim that everything must be done in a necessary way, they will be forced by this passage to kill the whole world, which has images, although it does not worship them. For it is commanded here that they should kill the nations as well as destroy the images, and if one is asserted, they will have to concede the rest with necessity; yes, he commands here to kill the heathen first, as the more necessary work, before the images are destroyed.

And this is what I saw coming, if their doctrine would prevail, that the people could not be restrained from killing, because they would rely on this commandment and their doctrine. Therefore I have advised (censui) that they should be driven out of the country as real bloodhounds and rebels who have nothing else to do in their whole life but shed blood. Since it is now certain that among Christians the wicked do not have to be killed with the bodily sword, and this part of the law is annulled as merely ceremonial, since it only applied for a time until Christ, it follows at the same time that the images also do not have to be taken away because of necessity, since they belong to this part of the law. Therefore, no one who sees the iconoclasts (imaginicidas) raging against wood and stone should doubt that a murderous spirit is hidden there, not a life-giving one, and that, when the images are removed, they will not be able to destroy them.

If the opportunity presented itself, they would also kill people, as some of them have begun to teach. But they are forced by a necessary consequence to teach and to do so, because the law of Moses urges them to do so, although others, cunning people, conceal this murderous spirit very finely.

There is also another rage of this spirit, that they do not distribute the execution of this law, even if it should concern us, properly [among the persons to whom it belongs]. For Moses, both in this book and elsewhere, has first appointed the sovereign persons who are to execute the laws. But these swarm spirits command this to the common people with contempt for the persons in authority. For God has not only commanded in one place that sins are to be dealt with in public courts, witnesses and judgments, but they fall upon them with their own (privato) rage. For one does not read any example that the people without a leader or an authority, be it the ordinary one or one given by God, did the images, as one can see in Gideon [Judges 6, 25], Hezekiah [2 Kings 18, 4], Josiah [2 Kings 23, 4] and Jehu 1) [2 Kings 10, 27. ff].

Their third grievance is that they absolutely destroy all images, even though Moses commanded this only of those whom one serves and trusts. This is indicated not only by the text itself, but also by the intention of the first commandment, since it says that one should not make any likeness of God to worship it. But images other than God's, especially those that are not worshipped, are nowhere forbidden by God. Yes, He Himself erected the bronze serpent in the same people and tolerated it until they began to worship it. Yes, also the Reubenites erected an altar at the Jordan [Jos. 22, 10.], of which the other [tribes] judged that it was ungodly, but since they heard that it was only built for a sign and monument, not to sacrifice and worship on it, they left it untouched. Moreover, it is clearly stated in Deut. 26:1 that one should not make images to worship them.

That is why we want these bloodhounds 2) mei-

and not let ourselves be drawn into Judaism. To us Paul says [1 Cor. 8:4], "We know that an idol is nothing in the world," and that all these outward things are free, though they are images intended for some divine worship. For we are to do away with them by the word, or by the public (communi) consent of the authorities and of those under whose power (ditione) they are. But those we have only for a sign and memorial we may have freely, lest at last we also fall into the spirit of murder and sedition, when we suffer freedom to be made a necessity. For one would at least be willing to bear these raging people if they only destroyed the images and did not also make the conscience that it was a necessary work, and sent us under the wrath of the law and deprived us of freedom. But now that we must exist in the freedom that God has given us, we are to tell them that Moses in all his laws is none of our business, but only of the Jews, except where it coincides with the natural law, of which Paul teaches in Rom. 2:15 that it is written in the hearts of the Gentiles. Everything that is not written there, we should count as ceremonies that are necessary for the people of Moses, but free for us, just as the Sabbath is, as Paul, Col. 2, 16, and Isaiah, Cap. 66, 23, testify.

But one must wonder why these enemies of the images are so pious and kind against the images on gold and silver coins, likewise against those that are placed on silver vessels. Why do they only love these images and do not also burn them or throw them away? Can we not understand here the wickedness of Satan, who rules in their hearts through the greatest avarice and the highest frenzy? Further, why then do they not also rend their hearts, since they cannot be without an image, as often as they hear either Christ crucified preached, or they themselves think of him, or of other saints? Or is an image in the eyes, which is outside us, more harmful than that which is in the heart within us? It is a raging and a nonsense by which they seek only honor, as if it were an excellent work. For us it is enough to know that an idol is nothing in the world. If it is nothing, it will do no harm, whether it stands or falls. But I also do not love the images very much, and would not want them to be set up in the church, not because I have only that in mind that they are worshipped, which I believe happens very rarely, but because a trust is placed in the work, since they cost so much and have such a beautiful appearance, as if by this work a service is rendered to God, while in the meantime the costs and everything that is spent on it, which should be used for a better use for the need of the brethren, is lost. Otherwise, I cannot condemn having beautifully painted (levi pictura) pictures in a private house. But because others have shown this cause, and the raging prophets see that they cannot gain any glory in it, they invent a necessity of the law against the freedom of the spirit, which is in no way to be tolerated.

V. 2. So you shall banish them.

This word [banish] is frequently used in the books of Moses, Joshua, and Judges, which is Hebrew XXX, Latin excommunicare. Hence comes XXX or XXXX, ban, Greek ἀνάθεμα. Therefore Paul says 1 Cor. 16:22: "If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be anathema, Maharam Motha." Thus the Gentiles were banished by the sword of the children of Israel and became a curse, being made nothing at all and irretrievably brought to ruin. For GOD willed to destroy them utterly from the earth by the decreed judgment, even with a curse. Moses actually calls this Haram or Herem, so that no hope of life or salvation would be left, just as what is banished is cursed and a curse, Deut. 27.

But although these peoples were worthy of death, no one, not even Israel, would have been allowed to kill them if they had not been compelled by a certain and clear commandment and word of God, so that the saying would stand firm [Matth. 26, 52.]: "Whoever takes the sword shall perish by the sword", and again [Rom. 12, 19.]: "Vengeance is mine, I will punish.

Likewise [Heb. 10:30], "The LORD will judge his people." For he who gave life can justly take it away, against whom also they alone have sinned. Therefore he used here of the Israelites for his service, that he might execute his wrath at their hands, even as from the beginning he was always wont to destroy one nation by another, and to transfer one kingdom by another [to another possessor] where they had sinned, as he speaks in the prophets Daniel [Cap. 2, 44.] and Amos [Cap. 9, 8.], "Behold, I come upon a sinful kingdom, to crush it." But in this the swords of other nations are distinguished from the swords of Israel, that God makes use of the fury of those out of a secret judgment, and crushes the wicked by the wicked, but the sword of these is sanctified by a manifest and certain commandment of God, so that with a holy and pure conscience the godly destroy the wicked, and shed blood in holy worship (religione).

This is why he decrees by a verdict that the Amorites and Cananites are to be killed and does not let the Israelites rage against any people as they please. For he excepted the Moabites, Ammonites and Edomites, who were no less godless nations than the Amorites and Cananites, to show that even so great a sinner may not be killed with a clear conscience, if he is not delivered up and named by the command and will of God. For who is there among men who is not worthy of death in the sight of God, except the one whom God, anticipating with His mercy, first made alive by His word and then commanded him to kill others? so that the Jews have no cause to boast as if they alone among men were born to kill the Gentiles, while they were chosen by God only for the purpose that God should execute His wrath on the Cananites by their sword.

And Moses shows this beautifully here, when he says [v. 6]: "For the Lord has chosen you as a people of possession" 2c., as if he wanted to say: Not you have chosen the LORD-

Nor did you come to kill these nations by your own merit, but because God chose you, called you, and commanded you to do so. Yes, so that you know that there is no difference in the sight of God between you and the Gentiles, take this to heart, that if you do not fulfill the word of God and do not kill these Gentiles, but make covenants and marriages with them, the same wrath also awaits you. He says [v. 4.], "Then shall the wrath of the LORD be kindled against thee, and shall soon destroy thee." This same punishment indicates that they will be guilty of the same ungodliness before God, so that they should know that they have an advantage over those Gentiles by the word of God alone; if they did not have this, no Gentiles could be so ungodly that they would not be equal to them both in guilt and punishment.

V. 7-11 The Lord has not accepted you and chosen you to be more than all the nations.

See how diligently Moses acts the first commandment. Above he had taught the true service of God in faith, in the fear and in the love of the spirit. But here, having come to the outward work, lest they should finish in the flesh what they had begun in the spirit, and be puffed up because of their work, and having outwardly destroyed the ungodly and idols, they themselves would become worse evildoers and set up worse idols in their hearts, namely trusting in the work and glory of the same (as the flesh is wont to do), and just by this, on the occasion of such an apparent work, would sin more grievously against the first commandment than the Gentiles whom they killed: He salutarily precedes them, and preserves them in the right use of the law, by entirely abolishing the glory of the work and the trust in it, and calling them to trust in grace alone, saying, "Not that yours are more than all the nations." 2c. As if to say: That God uses your sword is not because he needs your strength, or because he cannot do it without you, since yours are very few. The glory of the work is not yours, but the glory of the one who uses your small number and will destroy such a great multitude. Otherwise, if he had wanted to win through the multitude, he would not have chosen you, but other nations, whose number is greater than yours.

So what is left for you to boast about in this work? Nothing is yours, "but that the LORD loved you (he says), and that he keeps his oath" 2c. You see that in every work nothing is held up to human trust but the undeserved love of God, by which He is moved to precede us with His word and with His promise, even before we are born. So much is lacking in his repaying anything after we are born or have done any work. And this is the plain and pure understanding of the first commandment, that we may know that we have nothing by our own merits, but have, obtain, are able, and do all things for his glory by his mercy and love alone. As he first promises this mercy by his word, so he confirms it afterwards also by the work, which he does through us, as with a sign, as he mentions here the exodus from Egypt and the extermination of the Cananites.

So you must realize that it is the work of a great spirit that one can destroy the things that have a great appearance by presenting God's name and God's service, as there are the altars and worship services of the pagans. For who should not be deterred and deceived when God's name is held up to him? indeed, who should not be blown away by that feigned piety? Certainly these pagans, as I have said, worshipped only the true GOD, but with false and self-invented service and opinion not commanded by GOD. But a much greater spirit belongs to it, that one does not boast of having destroyed such a service, and instead of the external idol does not set up an internal idol of a completely futile trust. This is such a great thing, that one should purely recognize, sincerely fear, revere, love and believe in the true and only God, that Moses has to spend so many words on it in order to explain the first commandment. Therefore, he also repeats here the words of the first commandment and says [v. 9:]

"Know therefore that the LORD your GOD is a faithful GOD, who keeps the covenant and mercy," 2c., that he might show that this belonged to the understanding of the first commandment, which he had said of reliance on works.

V. 12-16. And when ye hear these statutes, and keep them 2c.

What is this? Hitherto he has taught that the people are loved, not by their merit, but by the election of God who precedes them. Now he promises the works and merits the love, the blessing, yes, what is more, the reliability (fidem) of the covenant and the promise he attributes to their works, saying: "If you keep, the LORD will also keep the covenant and mercy", which he interprets here by a long text of the temporal welfare. I answer, It is well known the distinction of the antecedent and subsequent mercies, which we have so often given. The antecedent (praeveniens) is that by which we are chosen, called, and justified before all our works. The subsequent one is, since we make mercy certain to ourselves by works, and feel the preceding mercy, of which it is said [Mal. 3, 7.], "Turn ye unto me (this is by the preceding mercy), and I will turn unto you also"; this is the subsequent mercy, which gives peace, assurance, and all good things to those already justified, so that one may be said to be mercy, the other peace; or, the one is the gift and the thing, the other is the assurance of the gift received and the thing possessed. Thus he says: If you keep these commandments (which they could not do without grace), you will know that the Lord is faithful to give you the promised land and, having given it to you, to keep it.

V. 17-20. But will you say in your heart, This people is more than I am 2c.

Moses removes another cause for breaking the first commandment, namely the lack of trust, which arises from the inability and weakness of our powers, when the same is compared with the thing and the work commanded. By this the spies sinned, who deterred the people from entering the land, because they made much of the fact that giants, enakim, and fortified cities were in it, as we have seen above.

But Moses teaches again how God's commandments must be fulfilled, namely not by our strength, but by the divine power promised to us, by erasing with one word both the trust and the presumption in our strength, as well as the mistrust and the despair because of our weakness; the presumption by indicating that greater things are commanded than we are able, as he here admits that the Gentiles, whom he commands to be destroyed, are more and stronger than Israel, their destroyer; the despair by the fact that the Lord will do through them whatever he commands them.

Therefore, if the children of Israel had looked at their powers and compared them to the powers of the Gentiles, who were to be destroyed, they would have completely despaired of them and disregarded the commandment of God. Now, however, God promises that He will help them so that they may fulfill everything in faith, and He adds to the promise the example of His previous mercy, that He delivered them from the hands of Pharaoh and the Egyptians, so that He might thus provoke them to faith by word and deed, in which they should destroy the Gentiles by command of God. Yes, he also promises them by a new promise that he will send hornets [among the enemies], so that you may see how much it matters that faith be strengthened. By faith, then, one serves God, by faith the commandments of God are fulfilled, by faith we merit to be assisted by the divine power in all our works, so that Christ rightly said [Marc. 9, 23.]: "All things find possible to him that believeth."

V. 21. Do not be afraid of them, for the LORD your God is among you, the great and terrible God.

Dear one, whom should this glorious word not puff up and compel to be proud, not only against those pagans who have been exterminated but also against all the gates of hell? What wonder is it if one puts a thousand to flight, and as David says [Ps. 18:30]: "With my God I can leap over the walls"? What more proud and hopeful can be spoken: "The great and terrible GOD is in our midst"? Ps. 46, 6: "God is with her in it, therefore she will abide." So it is also said in 1 John 4:4: "He who is in us is greater than he who is in the world." So those Gentiles Enakim, giants, may be armed, what is the matter? Who is in their midst? Nothing but the vain confidence in their arm and in the sword of the flesh, but here the great GOD of spirits. Now this is said faithfully enough. Happy is he who believes it firmly, for it will come to pass as he has believed.

V. 22. You cannot destroy them in haste, lest the beasts of the field multiply against you.

How sweetly and fatherly he incites them to faith, so that he also anticipates the future weak thoughts of faith, so that they would not constantly think that when the promises of God began to be fulfilled, and the Gentiles were mostly defeated, but still some remained, they were abandoned, or they were deceived with the promise, But let it all be for their good, so that they may take the land the more firmly and completely, and not be forced to endure even more cruel wild beasts instead of the godless exterminated people, although this very delay is also given to the Gentiles for their conversion, so that those who want to may get along again.

Now let us deal a little with the secret interpretations of this chapter.

Our sword is the word of God, with which the spiritual people fight and first kill the Gentiles themselves, that is, convert them from the error in which they lived. Isa. 11, 4: "And he shall smite the earth with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips shall he slay the wicked." The images are the ungodly teachings, which come from ungodly opinions, by which one thinks to worship God by works, without faith. The altars are the efforts

The groves are the works of the flesh by which we labor after these doctrines, and in vain do they torment us and bring us to utter ruin (mactamus). The groves are the enticements of the flesh, by which we please ourselves in these works and boast as if they were pleasing in the sight of God. All this must be made nothing by the word of faith, so that God alone may be among us, as he says here.

That hornets are sent before us among the Gentiles is that the ungodly are driven by the terror of the law and the deadly sting of conscience, so that they cannot hide themselves until they perish and are forced to confess their ungodliness. Furthermore, just as it was not in the hands of the Israelites to send hornets before them, so it is not in ours to frighten any ungodly person, but it is God who puts fear into their hearts and makes them fearful, so that, frightened, they say with Paul [Acts 9:6], "Lord, what wilt thou that I should do?" and with those in Acts, Cap. 2, 37: "Dear brethren, what shall we do?"

That the Gentiles should not be destroyed in haste, but gradually, so that the wild beasts in the land do not multiply, is because when the ungodliness of the heart is overcome, the ungodly is not yet completely cleansed, but the battle of the spirit and the flesh still remains, as Panlus teaches Rom. 7, 14. ff. and Gal. 5, 17. ff. This fight is necessary in this life, so that we are not hopeful and slothful and become worse, as Paul says in 2 Cor. 12:7: "Lest I exalt myself to high revelation, there is given me a stake in the flesh." Thus is left within our borders the Jebusite, the Cananite, and the Philistines, that is, the remnant of sin, who are to trouble us and exercise us in spiritual arms. Otherwise, how cruel and savage a beast is the sure presumption, the vainglory, the haughtiness, the sloth, in that we forget our weakness, and ascribe to our powers that which belongs to grace and mercy alone, which rules over us and does not impute to us our infirmities!

Of the gold of the idols nothing shall be

Neither the remnants of ungodly words nor works should be preserved in the conscience, but the hearts should be filled and preserved with the pure word of God, and with it alone, so that the ungodly nature does not finally infect us as well. For example, the ungodly word "free will" and all the doctrines that are spread about it should be completely abhorred and not allowed, as if it could be tolerated in good usage or with any gloss. So also are the monastic vows and rules for a banished gold (aurum anathematis), and one should only act on them in order to punish and curse them, not in order that our consciences may be advised by them, with whatever little bell one may think it can be done. The house of conscience must be completely clean from them, because there is nothing more tender and softer than conscience and faith, as it is said: discipline and honor, faith and eye suffer no jest [all three are soon corrupted].

The eighth chapter.

V. 1. All the commandments that I have given you 2c.

This is a new and different sermon, as I said that Moses completed this book in many days and with many sermons. But in this chapter he deals with the occasion for breaking the first commandment, which is given by well-being and abundance, which turns the heart away much more than repulsiveness and lack, as he [Moses] says in his song [Deut. 32, 15]: "He became fat and thick and strong, and became horny." And Prov. 1, 32. "The luck of the wicked kills them," as is also said in the German proverb, "There must be strong legs to carry good days. For a man bears evil more easily than good, as the poet says: Luxuria saevior hostis incubuit etc.. [Abundance has broken in as an exceedingly cruel enemy].

V. 2. and remember all the way 2c.

First, he says that the people were beaten and tempted by God in the desert for forty years, so that they would know what was in their hearts, namely, whether they loved God with a sincere mind or for the sake of their bellies. For even we ourselves never know our heart (which is always evident to God) more surely whether it serves God for the sake of the belly or not, than when we are challenged by lack and misfortune. A believing heart loves, believes and serves as well, when it suffers lack and evil days, than when it is in the midst of riches and good days. But an unbelieving heart believes as long as the good is there, but retreats when calamity comes, as it says in the 78th Psalm [v. 37. 36.], "Their heart was not steadfast in him, and they lied to him with their tongue."

V. 3-16 He humbled you, and made you hungry, and fed you with man, that he might make known to you that man does not live by bread alone 2c.

What kind of conclusion is this, that by giving manna it is made known that man lives by the word of God? Is the manna the word of God? Not at all, but rather he explains what he had said about the lack, namely in this way: Before he gave you manna, he first made you suffer hunger. He did this so that he might show you that even if the manna never came, he could still sustain you through his word, by which he had promised that he would be a GOD to you, who would not abandon you, just as he had sustained you. For faith in the word of God, even in the midst of hunger, nourishes not only the soul but also the body, that is, as he says here, the whole man, since it is impossible that he who with faith clings to the word should perish, even if he should not eat or drink anything of the body, although God has not given you any food or drink.

In truth, he does not leave us, yes, at last, when his time has come, he also feeds us bodily, like Elijah through the ravens and the widow in Sarepta, and here the fathers through the manna.

This announcement that man does not live on bread alone does not refer to the manna, but to both, namely to the tribulation of hunger and to the quantity of manna, so that the meaning is: God wanted to show you this His goodness through your experience, so that you would learn in hunger to trust in the word of the Promiser, through which you would also be sustained in hunger and would not perish, but then finally also receive bodily satiety through this faith. For he does all this for the sake of taking the belly as an idol, and you learned that a man's life does not depend on the belly being supplied with its bread, but rather on both the soul and the belly being supplied with the word, 1) which you would never learn if the belly were always full, and you never learned through the word to trust in God even at the time when the belly is in want.

In this way, Christ cites Matth. 4, 4. this passage, where the devil only reproaches him for the care of the belly; but he says: "Man does not live by bread alone", not denying that man lives by bread, but not alone. For if the bread is not there, then he lives by the word. If he has this by faith, then bread must necessarily come at last, even if it has to be brought forth from the stones or, as here, sent down from heaven. Since he now says: "He humbled you, and let you hunger, and tempted you," he draws from your belly and the care of your belly, so that he teaches to trust in the word in the midst of hunger, and to live [by the word]. Since he says, "He fed you with man," he indicates that those who live by the word in hunger will not lack bread. So you see that by these words nothing is taught but faith, by which we hold fast and believe that we have one God according to the meaning of the first commandment.

But he commands them to remember this fact, how they were fed in the wilderness both by the word and by the bread, indicating and prophesying, as it were, that they would later be tempted by the same temptation of hunger, so that they would then be raised to faith by the comfort of this example, and would know that they would be fed, however much the hunger rages, if they only believe the word of promise in the first commandment, in which he promises that he will be their God, as it is written in the 37th Psalm, v. 19. Psalm, v. 19: "And they shall have enough in the day of trouble." For it is impossible for the righteous to be forsaken, or for his seed to go after bread. He will indeed hunger, but he will not die of hunger, for hunger exercises his faith, which hangs on the word; but faith also obtains bread for the body.

So the glorious word of Moses stands firm that God deals with His own in such a way that He tempts through hunger and exercises through His word, then feeds the believer, even if it is in the middle of heaven, if it cannot happen otherwise, so that they may learn by experience that one need not be concerned about the belly, that life also does not stand in the things that we possess or in bread, but in the word, through which we become rich in God, as is written in the Gospel [Luc. 1 2, 21.]. For since we live in the heart through the word, we force God, as it were, to nourish the belly as well.

As he promises food to the believers, so also clothing, then also good health of the body, as he adds here soon after the manna [v. 4]: "Your clothes are not outdated on you, and your feet are not swollen these forty years," so that he teaches by these words that those who live and believe by the word will not lack anything, but that God takes care of us in all things, and through all things, as Peter says [1. Ep. 5, 7.], "Cast all your care upon him, for he careth for you," and Ps. 34, 11.: "They that seek the LORD have no lack of any good."

If one understands these and similar promises of God, which are quite glorious and certain, correctly, then this means the promise of the first

1) Added by us.

In this commandment he says: "I am the Lord, your God. Thine, thine, I will show and prove myself to thee as God, neither will I forsake thee, if thou wilt but believe it. For all such promises depend on the first commandment and flow from it. On the other hand, if you do not believe them, it really means that you do not understand the first commandment, but have other gods.

But Moses applies this teaching of faith to the future use in the midst of abundance of goods, as I said in the beginning of the chapter, namely, that they should then remember how they were once fed with manna in the midst of scarcity through the Word, and reflect on this example and teaching, and learn that they should not trust in God any more because they have abundance and are full, since their belly is well supplied. Such trust is not in God, but rather in the goods and gifts they have received. Hence, they forget both the right trust and the word of God, and never learn to trust God in lack. And (as I have said), it is a great thing and the work of a rich (multi) spirit, when everything is well, not to forget God, and to behave as Paul says [1 Cor. 7, 30. 31.As if you had no need of the world, as if you had no need of it, so that you know how to have plenty and to be in want, how to be low and to be high [Phil. 4:12], and with the prophet [Psalm 62:11] not to set your heart on riches when they come, and not to become vain, but to set your heart on God alone.

For this is what Moses has to do in this chapter, in that he contrasts and introduces in the midst of the abundance the example of the manna, which was given in the midst of the lack, so that he might bring them back from the belly to the word. Therefore he repeats also at the end, after he had pictured the future riches, and speaks [v. 15-17.]: "He made water come out of the hard rock for you, and fed you with man in the wilderness, of which your fathers knew nothing, that he might humble you and try you, that he might do you good hereafter. You might otherwise say in your heart" 2c. Is it not a stronger example that He gave drink out of the hard rock, and manna in the wilderness, than that Christ teaches Matt. 6:28. of the lilies of the field and the birds of the air, that GOD provides for them? For what less could you hope for than that water and drink should come out of a rock? What less in a desert than bread and food? Why did He not give the water from a greening tree or a cloud of heaven? Why not the food from branches, or roots, or herbs? Why did he do this?

Of course, in order to praise the great care of God, which he carries for us, who is a God to us even when everything is in despair, since he also wants to and can change a rock into your drink, the desert into your food, nakedness into beautiful clothing, poverty into wealth, death into life, shame into honor, evil into good, enemies into friends. And what should he not be able to do? He can give and change everything from everything, everything in everything, everything from nothing, everything into nothing. Only let it concern you to believe, and when there is lack, not to be fainthearted and anxious, again, when there is abundance, not to be puffed up and surely forget God, but to always cling to your God with the same heart, no matter whether everything is there or everything is lacking, knowing that he who gives abundance will also give when lack oppresses. See, then, how appropriately and fittingly Moses uses this miracle of God to explain the meaning of the first commandment.

V. 17. 18. Otherwise you would say in your heart, My strength, and the strength of my hands 2c.

He adds this to describe what forgetfulness of God is and how it comes about. For this is how the godless heart of man stands when wealth accrues to him: I have brought this about through my work, and does not pay attention to the fact that they are all blessings of God, sometimes through our work, sometimes without our work, but which never come from (ex) our work, but from us.

are always given freely out of his mercy. For, as we have taught above, he uses our work as a kind of larva, under which he blesses us and gives us what is his, so that there is room for faith, so that we do not think that what we have is brought about by our strength or work, or, as he says here, so that we do not think that it is through our powers and the strength of our hands that we possess this ability, but remember the Lord our God, that it is he who gives the powers to acquire this ability, not through our merits, but because he had promised it beforehand.

This is therefore the particularly excellent (insignis) passage from which many excellent sayings have flowed, as the word in the Proverbs of Solomon [Cap. 10, 22.]: "The blessing of the Lord makes rich", likewise in the Psalm [Ps. 136, 25.]: "Who gives food to all flesh", and the whole Psalm of Solomon [Ps. 127.]. The same is true for the whole Psalm of Solomon [Ps. 127.]: "Where the Lord does not build the house", where it is completely denied that anything is brought about or preserved by our powers, as also Moses says here that wealth is not acquired by our powers or the strength of our hands, but by God, who blesses and gives the powers that we may "establish a fortune" [Deut. 8, 17], that is, wealth and possessions (substantiam), for this is what the Hebrew word XXX means. Faith, which does not exalt itself in prosperity nor become fainthearted in adversity, is thus the short epitome, 1) the interpretation and true understanding and fulfillment of the first commandment.

V. 19. 20. But if you forget the Lord your God and follow other gods 2c.

Just as the promise of grace is presented to the believers, so the threat of wrath is presented to the unbelievers, so that he may draw and urge to faith from both sides. Unbelief makes of GOD and the Father a judge and enemy, as He says here, "I testify to you that you will perish." Faith makes the enemy and judge into God and the Father.

a father, as he said shortly before [Cap. 1, 31.]: "As a man carries his son, so the Lord has carried you." And again, you are to notice especially here that absolutely no distinction is made between the people of Israel and the Gentiles, who are to be cut off, except by faith, as he says here, that they are to perish just as much as those Gentiles whom the Lord will cut off before their face. So they have nothing to boast of against the Gentiles, neither of the law, nor of the righteousness of works, nor of the blood of the fathers, nor of the miracles of God, nor of the divine speeches, nor of the priesthood, nor of the kingdom, nor of anything else. The verdict is clear: If they forget God and serve other gods, they will perish as if all this were nothing and they were also pagans. For whoever does not believe will be condemned. It has been said sufficiently that "to honor other gods" means to be unbelieving and to act against the true God.

The secret interpretations or allegories of this chapter are easy to understand. Manna, which in Hebrew is called something prepared or a gift, because it is prepared and given without our hands, means the gospel of God, as Christ also interprets John 6:32: "Moses did not give you bread from heaven, but my Father gives you the right bread from heaven." For this heavenly word was not given to the world by our powers or merits. Lack and tribulation in the wilderness for forty years means the misery of a conscience struggling with sin, where there is hunger and thirst, then also fiery serpents and scorpions, namely the biting and sting of sin, which cruelly torments us. The manna comes and feeds us, the brook comes that is cut out of the rock, that is the spirit that has come to us through Christ crucified, and refreshes us, so that we will never, ever thirst, John 4:14. Furthermore, as inconsistent as it was that water should flow out of a stone that is cut, it is against all remembrance (inopinatum) that the spirit of life comes out of Christ who died, so that Moses too was trapped here. For who could hope for the spirit that gives life from a dying and buried flesh?

Abundance and happiness in the promised land are the riches of the gifts of the spirit, the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, which are given to us in Christ, where we dwell safely and abound in all heavenly things.

Here it is necessary that we are not puffed up when we are satisfied, but in gratitude praise the Lord, who has given us all these things not only without our merit, but also when we were under the curse and lost under the misery of sin. Let this be enough for this occasion.

The ninth chapter.

In this chapter, Moses cuts off another opportunity to transgress the first commandment, which is called spiritual pride, which boasts of righteousness and merit. This is the trust in one's own works, which is the most harmful corruption and the greatest adversary of faith or trust in the mercy of God. Therefore Moses destroys the same with many words in this whole chapter. For this is a robbery of God's honor, since it cannot exist at the same time that we boast of God because of mercy, and seek glory in ourselves 1) because of our righteousness and our works. But he refutes this righteousness with three strong reasons.

First, that those Gentiles deserved to be cast out because of their ungodliness. This he says [v. 5.], "For thou comest not in to take their land, because of thy righteousness and uprightness of heart; but the LORD thy GOD doth drive out these heathen because of their ungodliness." By this word we also are to be instructed, when we see that others are smitten, either by us or by others. For it does not follow: You or others will strike that one, therefore you and others are righteous before them. Otherwise the tower in Siloah, which slew many in Jerusalem, Luc. 13, 4, would also have to be declared righteous. But it is God who strikes the wicked;

Whether he does it by a tower, by fire, by water, by wild animals, by your hand or by the hand of another man, there is nothing to it but that the righteous God strikes the wicked.

By the way, you should also fear this example, because the wicked will be struck down for your terror, as Christ explains it in Luc. 13, 5. when he says: "All of you will also perish in this way," and Paul says Rom. 11, 21. 22. when he forbids with the same reason that the Gentiles should not rise up because of the fall of the Jews: "See to it that he does not spare you"; "otherwise you will also be cut off. And Rom. 2:3: "But thinkest thou, O man, who judgest them that do these things, and doest the same, that thou shalt escape the judgment of God?" It is therefore an excellent saying of St. Gregory, who says: "If we see anyone sinning, we should first of all weep for ourselves in their misfortune, because in the same way we have either already fallen or can fall, which someone has summarized in this verse:

Aut sumus, aut fuimus, aut possumus esse, quod hic est

[either we are, or were, or can be, what this one is].

And in the descriptions of the lives of the fathers, when he heard that a brother had fallen, he said: Yesterday that one, today me. Therefore, when another is struck, one must remember this:

Tunc tua res agitur, paries cum proximus ardet [This concerns you when the next wall is burning].

1) We have adopted the reading of the Wittenberg: btorisri in Dsv às rnissriooräia, st Aloriari in nobis ipsis. In the Jena and in the Erlangen the words st givriari are erroneously placed before às inissrisvräis.

Yes, with a heart full of mercy and compassion, the wicked shall be destroyed or beaten by us, signifying that we are the instrument of God, who may also be thrown into the fire ourselves like a rod, after the evildoers have been punished by us.

Second, [Moses refutes his own righteousness] 1) by the prestige of the divine promise. [V. 5:] "The LORD hath driven them out to perform his oath and his word, which he promised unto thy fathers." Nothing stronger could be said against confidence in one's own righteousness. For where were the children of Israel when GOD promised their father Abraham the land of Canaan, since he was still barren and had no hope of offspring? Thus, when they receive and possess the land through the promise of GOD, they have it not through their own merits or their own righteousness, but out of pure grace and goodness of GOD poured out on the unworthy, who themselves were not yet born. For why does he give the promise? Is it because those who are to come after 430 years should deserve it in such a way? Let that be far away, but he who promised it out of pure goodness, he also fulfilled his word out of pure mercy. This reason is also used by Paul in his letters to the Galatians [Cap. 2, 16. ff. 3, 2. ff.] and to the Romans [Cap. 4, 1. ff.], where he most powerfully proves that righteousness does not come from merit, but from the mercy of God, which he once promised.

Third, [he refutes their own righteousness] from their own experience, since he says [v. 6.], "Because you are a stiff-necked people" 2c. By this stiff-neckedness they did not deserve the land so much that it was close to it, because God was angry that He destroyed them in the wilderness rather than the Gentiles, as the Psalm [Ps. 106, 26.] says: "And He lifted up His hand against them, to strike them down in the wilderness," and would have turned His promise elsewhere, namely to the descendants of Mosiah, 4 Mos. 14, 12. Yes, He struck all of them until down to the last man in the wilderness, except Joshua and Caleb, so that neither Moses nor Aaron entered the land. So much is lacking in the fact that they were supposed to enter the land through their merit that the opposite should have happened to them, as it really did if they were to be dealt with according to their merit. This reason is also used by Paul in Rom. 4, 14. f., where he says: "For where those who are heirs of the law are, faith is nothing and the promise is lost, since the law only causes wrath", so that you can see that Moses and Paul use the same reasoning (dialectica) of the spirit against the righteousness of works, for the grace and mercy of God.

Therefore, all this is also written for our instruction, so that we may learn that the misfortune that befalls the wicked does indeed come upon them deservedly, but that if it does not befall us, but we enjoy good days, we do not have to thank our righteousness for this, but the goodness of God, through which it has been provided and promised to us from eternity before, since we also deserve the opposite by far. For the verdict is clear that we are not given anything good because of our righteousness, but so that God may fulfill His word that He has willed from eternity that we should not be puffed up and make an idol out of our righteousness, but should know that we have One God from whom we receive everything for free out of pure goodness that has been poured out on us unworthy ones, as the patriarch Jacob also confesses when he says, Gen. 32, 10: "I am too little of all the mercies which thou hast done to thy servant," that is, not only of one mercy, which may be great, but of any mercy, however small and small it may be.

Furthermore, Moses applies a salutary antidote against this harmful plague (for this monster of one's own righteousness is so powerful that one cannot do enough against it). For he sets before their eyes all the past misdeeds of the people, and commands them to remember them, and the sin that they worshipped the calf at Mount Sinai he brings before them with powerful words.

1) Added by us.

on. For what can cure this disease of pride more swiftly and better (praesentius) than to remember past ungodliness and shameful deeds? For what else has the people but such things, because of which they must be ashamed to lift up their eyes to heaven? As Paul says to his Romans [Cap. 6, 21.], "Of which ye are now ashamed." For this is why God also caused David, Moses, Peter and Paul and other great men to fall, so that they would be humbled and ashamed before God, basing themselves on His goodness alone. Therefore Peter, 2 Petr. 1, 9, severely punishes those who let the forgiveness of their former sins be forgotten and become sure and cold, and then stiff-necked and hopeful.

At last he concludes [v. 24.], "Ye have always been disobedient to the LORD as long as I have known you." O what fine praise is this, what merit, what righteousness of the holy people, namely, that they have been disobedient to the voice of GOD! Now go and boast, boast, boast that the land is given to you because of your righteousness, since you deserve to hear nothing but that you are a stiff-necked people and always disobedient to the Lord: indeed, to these merits belongs that royal wealth, and not rather a thousandfold death and cross! What more frightening can be said than that one is disobedient to the Lord? And yet this disobedience the praised (laudata) and blessed land. What is there left for Israel to hope for, but rather to put its mouth in the dust and say: I am worse than all the heathen, and great and undeserved is thy mercy, that I should receive this land. Furthermore, if this holy Israel and the chosen (peculiaris) people are like this before God, what are we Gentiles and sinners?

See, with how powerful words Moses accuses the people even in the prayer, in which he prays for them, because he says [v. 27. 28.]: "Do not look at the hardness, and the godlessness and sin of this people, lest the inhabitants of the land say" 2c. Here nothing is told of the people but such things because of which they deserved death. There was only the one thing that served to save them, that the name of the LORD was in danger if they were cut off. Therefore, so that the name of God would not be blasphemed, grace (venia) is given to them, which otherwise would not have been given to them, but they would have had to be exterminated altogether, if the name of God, after which they were called [Jer. 15, 16.], could have remained unharmed. Therefore also many others, especially David in the Psalter, took this quite sure and reliable pretext, that they said [Ps. 25, 11.]: "For thy name's sake, O LORD, be merciful to my iniquity," 2c., and Joshua [Cap. 7, 9.]: "What wilt thou then do by thy great name," after which we are called?

The tenth chapter.

What Moses says here about the second tablets belongs to the previous chapter, to make the sin that they had worshiped the calf great. For the chapters are not properly divided; as often in other places, so also here. But what is said of the journeys and the camps of Israel, of the death of Aaron and the appointment of his son Eleazar in his place, of the ordinance that the Levites should bear the ark and stand in the service and praise the name of the Lord, he will either because this happened when this was going on, or because Moses arranged at these camps with the Levites what was commanded on the mountain Sinai, or, what I rather believe, because after the death of Aaron, since a new priest, Eleazar, had been appointed, also the service of the Levites is improved and arranged anew and once more, as it is used to happen in human things, which fall and change daily. After this, Moses returned to the priesthood.

back to the sin they committed with the calf, and after obtaining mercy (for the people), he receives the command to lead the people into the Promised Land.

The secret interpretation of the calf and the tablets also belongs to the previous chapter. About the tablets Paul instructs us sufficiently in 2 Cor. 3, 3, namely that the stone tablets are the hard hearts of the people of the law, while the people of grace have the fleshy and soft tablets of the heart. Now the laws are written on tables of stone, because the work of the law is written in all hearts, since their conscience testifies to it, Rom. 2:15. But the hardness of the heart causes it not to be grasped with the mind, not to be loved, not to be kept, not to be fulfilled in works. As the tablets of stone preserve only the written letters, but do nothing, so the hard hearts, without the Spirit, have the law only for a witness against themselves. Especially the Jewish people is such a host (hospes) of the law and of the whole Moses, for testimony against themselves.

The calf, which is made of gold, is the doctrine of works, which is made of words of the scripture and the falsified law, and twisted by the service and the art of the priests, who are supposed to preside over the people. This (doctrine of works) is worshipped, if one seeks honor in it and the confidence of the conscience (which is only due to the true God) is placed on it, as the saints of works (justitarios) must necessarily do. Moses, however, takes it, burns it with fire, breaks and crushes it, and throws it into the brook that flows from the mountain, that is, the true service of the law teaches the knowledge of sin, and that works together with their teachings are nothing, but that the grace of God is necessary to justify. Therefore, this whole doctrine is crushed and thrown away and devoured by the stream of the Gospel, which flows from the mountain, Christ, that fills the earth. Moses gives the people to drink from it, showing that the gospel is necessary, and presses toward it through the knowledge of sin. Then Moses comes back to it.

that he exhorts to the first commandment and praises the same, saying [v. 12.], "Now, Israel, what does the LORD your GOD require of you?" as if to say: This is the summa of the first commandment, of which I have said all these things, and for whose sake all that was said before was done, that thou fear the LORD thy GOD, and walk [in his ways], and love him, and serve him, that thou keep the commandments which I command thee this day. I said above that with the Hebrews "the fear of GOD" means the same as with us the worship of GOD. And see here the order: fear, walk, love, serve with all your heart 2c. Moses puts before what follows [v. 13.]: "That you keep the commandments and the statutes" 2c., 1) That thou mayest know that nothing can be kept of the outward commandments, that it is pleasing to God, unless it proceed from a heart that fears, loves, obeys, and serves, so that the power of the first commandment, which is faith, may rule and work in all commandments and works; without which all things are but appearances and guises.

V. 14. 15. Behold, the heavens and all the heavens are the heavens of the LORD your God 2c.

Again, after the manner of a good lawgiver, he inculcates and repeats how great and how good God is, who commands. Behold, he says, there are different heavens and different gods, but your God is One over all (as Paul 1 Cor. 8, 5. f. also almost speaks), and yet out of all nations, under all heavens, he loved and chose your fathers and their seed. It is known that in Scripture "the heavens" are not distinguished according to circles (sphaeras), as mathematicians are wont to do, but according to parts of the earth, just as the earth is divided [into various parts], as it is said elsewhere [Deut. 28:23]: "Your heaven, which is over your head, will be brazen," namely, that it [Scripture] indicates another heaven for this people, another heaven for another people. But this GOD is a GOD of all heavens, that is, he rules over all heavens in the horizon of all people, and not only of the Jews, but of all nations. Thus it is said in Ps. 115, 16: "The heavens are the Lord's in all places, but the earth He has given to the children of men.

V. 16. 17. Circumcise your heart's foreskin 2c.

This is a clear saying about the twofold circumcision, where at the same time the trust and presumption in the fleshly circumcision is condemned. Otherwise, if it were sufficient, what need would there be to require circumcision of the heart? Jeremiah also says that the Gentiles are uncircumcised in the flesh, but Israel is uncircumcised in the heart. With this word Moses throws to the ground all the glory of this people, with which he had puffed them up in the previous word, as it seemed, when he said that they were chosen before all nations, under all heavens, so that they would not be hopeful against the other nations. Yea, it soon follows, that the LORD is the LORD above all lords, and great, who regardeth not persons, nor receiveth gifts [v. 17.] What [does he regard] then? Nothing but the obedience of the heart, or the circumcision of the spirit, whose praise is from God, Rom. 2, 29. Now since he does not regard the person, but the circumcision of the flesh, and the begetting according to the flesh (sanguinis) from the fathers, and all things, except the circumcision of the heart, are personal things 1) and make regard to the person (personas), it follows that they cannot please God by this, but only by the circumcision of the heart. If the Gentiles have this, as the second chapter of the Epistle to the Romans [vv. 26, 27] states, they fulfill the law and judge the Jews who are circumcised according to the flesh.

So Moses destroys the opportunity to sin against the first commandment, which arises from the keeping of the circumcision and all works of the law. A very strange lawgiver, who at the same time commands the works and yet condemns them when they are done. But he does this so that

They should know that the law is not fulfilled by the works of the law, but by the circumcision of the heart, and only these works are truly good works, which do not come from the compulsion of the law, but from a heart that is previously circumcised. For this is demanded by him who does not look at the persons; otherwise the works make nothing but appearance (personas). And this teaching of Moses is similar to the one Paul treats in his letter to the Romans.

V. 18. And lent the strangers, that he might give them meat and raiment.

These very sweet promises of God are well to be remembered: "He who respects no person", likewise: "He takes no gift", likewise: "He provides justice for widows and orphans", likewise: "He loves the stranger, that he gives them food and clothing". For with these words God clearly comforts all the wretched, abandoned and afflicted in the whole world, and draws their hearts to Himself so that they entrust themselves to Him and rely on His goodness, as is fitting against the true, one and only God. For if he respects no person, I have already, that I can boast and be proud with a puffed up heart against all kings, princes, rich, strong of the world, sure that I, who am despised and abandoned by them as a poor, ignoble, weak one, am nevertheless respected, received and protected by him, who is the GOD of gods and the HEART of all lords (as Moses is also emblazoned with words here and is hopeful), mighty and terrible above all my despisers. What should I lack, then, if any lord despises me above a few servants, while the LORD above all lords, and the GOOD of all gods, dignifies me with his care?

Even if I am a fool, a sinner, a desperate and lost man, even if I am condemned, condemned and condemned as a sinner, a heretic, a cursed man, a blasphemer, a servant of the devil, what does it matter? Those are holy, righteous, honored, praised, reckoned among the children of God, and numbered among the stars: what does it matter? Here is the God of all gods, who has made these

1) Instead of persovatie in the Erlanger is to read personall".

He does not look at the appearance (personas), nor does he care for their gifts (dona); he cares for me sinners and fools just as much as those presume that he cares for them. Dear one, holding these promises in faith, what event (res) could possibly occur that could grieve me? What sin could oppress me, what sin could bring me to despair? Yes, what height, what depth, what present, what creature could make us puffed up or humble? Only let your heart cling to these words, and you will lack nothing, even if everything should leave you; but nothing will be there, even if everything would be favorable to you (arriserint). Only believe that he who speaks these words does not lie, as he cannot lie, and you will have a safe and cheerful heart in all things and through all things.

See, this is called explaining the first commandment, here is the interpretation of Moses himself. Thus he teaches to understand what it means that there is one God, what it means to have one God, what it means to keep the first commandment. Dear, what great sources even these words alone have been for the prophets, who have taken from them everything they cry out about God's care for the weak, the lowly, the poor, sinners, widows, orphans, the condemned, the damned, the afflicted and the miserable; in turn, [everything] they thunder about God's wrath and vengeance against the rich, tyrants, powerful and judges, against the violent, the hard and the proud. For all this flows out of the great Ocean of the first commandment and flows back into it again, so that no word has ever been heard that was more fruitful and richer in comfort, nor will ever be heard, again also no harsher and more severe than this word of the first commandment: "I am the LORD your GOD."

And now, to go on to the rest: The widows and the orphans suffer much, who cares for them? No one, no one. But they shall look here with a sure heart, because it is said for their joy: The God of all gods, the Lord over all lords, the great God, mighty and terrible, he brings justice to the widows and orphans. Therefore also Ps. 68, 6: "He who is a father of the fatherless and a judge of the fatherless.

who" wants this title of honor to be praised so that it may be seen that out of pure mercy he admonishes the tyrants so that they do not commit something by which he is forced to do enough for this title, but faithfully scares them so that they fear to harm the widows and orphans, but rather, according to his example, do them good and love them. And this is even more glorious, that whether the widows and orphans believe or not, he will nevertheless do them justice and judge the tyrants, even though the unbelief of the widows and orphans does not deserve this in this life, or to experience it as long as the unbelief lasts. For this promise continues and is fulfilled against the violent and the hard, although no one here should believe; but it would be fulfilled much more powerfully and quickly if the widows and orphans also believed.

He so loves the strangers that he feeds and clothes them. I pray thee, who would now rely upon his house or his paternal inheritance? though this also is not to be despised. But if it should happen that one must be a stranger, let no one despair or believe less than if he could enjoy his father's house, but let him sing with the Psalmist [Ps. 27:10], "My father and my mother have forsaken me, but the LORD hath taken me up." The Book of Wisdom [Cap. 10, 10. 1 says of the patriarch Jacob: "Wisdom guided the righteous, who had to flee from his brother's wrath, straightway, and showed him the kingdom of God, and made him know what is holy, and helped him in his work, so that he increased well and gained much good in his work. "2c. Who doubts that it therefore happens that more people become rich, high and famous in foreign lands than those who stay at home with their parents and are raised there? For God is a Father of all people, who loves the stranger, that He may give him food and clothing.

V. 21. He is your glory and your God.

This is a Hebrew way of speaking. "Glory" (laus) in this passage seems to me to be actually what Paul calls in Greek or χαῶxp,aa, gloriationem, in German:

"Glory," so that the meaning is, Because of no thing, neither because of thy person, nor because of thy works, shalt thou blow thyself out or boast, but boast thyself of God, in him blow thyself up, in him be hopeful, knowing that it is he who regardeth not the person 2c., who has done such great and terrible things for you, which your eyes have seen, as if to say, By experience you have learned that when you were a stranger he gave you food and clothing, that he does not regard the person, that he gives justice to the fatherless and the widow 2c. So you have, by which you can be puffed up and hopeful against all tyrants, yes, against all evil, namely your God, who provides you with all good. So you see that this is the fulfillment of the first commandment, when God is the glory, the prize, the emblazonment, the hope of our heart, both at the time of prosperity and adversity. For this is to have GOD in truth.

The secret interpretation of the broken tablets and the unfinished ones is this, that the office of the law is in twofold use: First, when only works are done without the heart being present, that is, in truth, raising up and worshipping a calf, that is, making a carnal doctrine of works out of the law, and boasting in it, which is the same thing.

as transgressing the law. This is what Moses shows when he breaks the tablets after seeing the calf, that is, he announces that the law of God has been transgressed through the teaching and delusion of works. Therefore, the law does not come to the people in this way, because it is not understood by the carnal people. Secondly, when it comes to the people but is not endured because of the splendor of the face of Moses, and the worshippers of the calf are killed, that is, the spiritual law causes wrath [Rom. 4:15] by showing sin, Rom. 7:7, and one cannot endure the strength (cornu) of its splendor because it requires something quite different from the work.

Therefore the journey of the children of Israel, and the death of Aaron, and the reformation of the Levites are described here at the same time, namely, that the second custom of the law follows after the first, and that the priests and masters (magistri) of the calf must be taken away, that is, the teaching of works, so that the people may come to a different mind, and the Levites, that is, the ministers of the word, be reformed, so that they may be in the service of the Lord, not of works, and praise the name of the Lord. 8], that is, preach the word of grace, so that the Lord alone may be their portion in pure faith. Then the first commandment is fulfilled.

The eleventh chapter.

This chapter is a kind of conclusion (epilogus) of all the previous exhortations about the first commandment. For he repeats and inculcates the benefits they received in Egypt and in the desert, and he promises that they shall receive the land and also benefits in the future, if they keep the commandments of God and serve no other gods. For this first commandment he has acted and practiced until now, therefore he is also so concerned about it that he commands to take it to heart, to bind it as a sign on the hands and before the eyes, and that the children should be taught, as he also did above [Cap. 6, 6. ff.], because in this commandment the children are to be taught.

In the first commandment, the whole concept and the fulfillment of all the following ones is contained. Thus, we see that Moses did not omit anything that would serve the understanding of the first commandment, as he treated everything abundantly that can promote faith and everything that hinders it. In the following he will treat the customs and the ceremonies of the works of this commandment.

But he also interpolates some promises, namely, that if they cling to the Lord, he will drive out the nations that are stronger than they are, likewise, all the lands on which they set foot will be theirs, likewise, that he says [v. 25], "No one will resist you.

and: "Your fear and terror the Lord your God will cause to come over the whole land into which you will enter"; then besides the promises also the curse. Yes, both at the same time, blessing and curse, he commands to be proclaimed on the mountains Grisim and Ebal, of which we will say later what all belongs to the last final speech. He also adds what the promised land is like, as a kind of promise, namely, that it is not like the land of Egypt, but the Lord takes special care of it, for His eyes look upon it from the beginning of the year until the end, so that He may hang them by faith in God, and they should know that rain will fall on this land if they believe, by the grace of God; but if they do not believe, there will be a lack of rain.

It is known that Egypt is not moistened by rain, but by the flooding of the Nile, which takes place annually in summer. This miracle of God has been disregarded because it happened so frequently, as it does with all other things. For by this Egypt has a wonderful difference against other countries. But this promised land has mountains and valleys, so it is not fertilized by the flood of a river, but by moistening rains from heaven, not that other lands are not also moistened and supplied in the same way, and the eyes of the Lord do not also take care of them from the beginning of the year to the end, as in this land, since He gives food to all flesh [Ps. 136, 25.], and, as it is said in the previous chapter [v. 18.], "giveth meat and raiment unto strangers," and "fillethe the hearts of the children of men with meat and gladness," Apost. 14, 17. but that no people have a promise of God concerning this. God gives everything to everyone, but to this special people he also gives the word of promise that they should not live on bread alone, as other peoples do, but also on the word, and that they should not only care for their belly on earth, but much more also for their spirit, so that they would not think that the land was given to them to fatten themselves in it like pigs, and would not rather believe that they were fed by the word of God and received everything through the word of God, that is, that they served God. So not for the sake of the land itself.

but for the sake of the people who are in it, God cares for them and looks to them to rule them by faith in it, as it says elsewhere: He did not choose the people for the sake of the place, but the place for the sake of the people [Ex 20:24]. For he did not choose Abraham and his seed for the land which he had promised him, but chose the land for Abraham's sake, to give it to him.

But the land means the kingdom of Christ, which was previously possessed by ungodly devils and teachers and work drivers, but is freed from sins and errors by the word of the Gospel. In this land, we live by faith in such a way that we feel with a confident and trusting conscience that God will take care of us and keep the eyes of His grace open over us. After that it is fertilized with rain of heavenly teaching. For it is not by the work or word of man, as in Egypt, that the moistening waters are brought, but it is moistened by the speech of God alone from heaven 2c.

It is also said elsewhere about the early rain and the late rain that the early rain is the first rain, the late rain the following one, because thus there are happy seeds and all things the abundance, if after the rain comes clear weather and sun warmth, but after that, if the heat becomes strong, rain follows again. For constant rain spoils everything just as much as constant heat and warmth. So also the teaching must not only be practiced among the people, but also the work of faith must be practiced according to the teaching. But where the power is slackened by work and suffering, the heart must be raised up again, strengthened and comforted by the teaching. This is how man grows in the knowledge of God. Otherwise, if one only teaches and does nothing, it is just as if it rained constantly, so that everything would be choked and dried up. Again, if one does and suffers, and does not teach, it is just as if the heat were constantly burning, so that the power of the spirit would slacken and be extinguished. So both are necessary, early rain and late rain, namely teaching and admonishing, Rom. 12:7, 8: "If anyone teaches, let him wait for teaching; if anyone admonishes, let him wait for admonishing."

The twelfth chapter.

V. 1. ff. These are the commandments and statutes that you are to keep 2c.

Now that the spiritual explanation of the first commandment has been completed and the heart instructed, Moses moves on to the works and outward worship in works and ceremonies, and first makes a provision about the place of worship, where he repeats almost five or six times that they are not to sacrifice and worship God in any place they please, but only in the one the Lord has chosen. Therefore, he also commands that the places, altars and pillars of the Gentiles be destroyed and their memory be eradicated. Now the place that the Lord chose was wherever the ark of the covenant and the tabernacle were, when it is spoken of as the general and permanent place for the continual sacrifice of all the people. Otherwise, he often chose another place for a day or an hour, as can be seen in Samuel, Elijah, Gideon, Manoah and others, but even this did not happen without special revelation by an angel or a prophet.

He commands all this for the sake of it, so that the people may not be guided in the worship of God by their own inclination, however holy and good it may be, but may be governed by the word; for if man cannot live without the word, according to the belly, how much less will he be able to live without the word in the works of God and in the spirit? For God wants our conscience to be confident and sure that it pleases God. This is not possible when it is guided by its own discretion, but only when it is based on God's Word. Therefore, if they worshipped God in a place that they themselves had chosen, they could not be certain that they pleased God, even though they pleased themselves in it. But they were certain that they pleased God when they sacrificed in the place that had been designated by the word of God.

There is a certain darkness and difficulty in this chapter due to the fact that Mo.

He repeats the same thing so often, then also by arguing against himself, since he slackens twice [vv. 15, 21] that they may sacrifice (sacrificent) and eat flesh in their cities according to all the pleasure of their souls, once when the place of the Lord is near, the other time when this place should be far away, and yet at the same time he also forbids that they should not eat or sacrifice (sacrificent) in any place, which he insists on (as I have said) in this whole chapter. The other difficulty is: How can he admit that they eat of the tithes and offerings [v. 18], which was due to the priests and Levites?

To the first we will answer thus: that Moses in this chapter only insists that they should not sacrifice anywhere else than in the place that God has chosen. Therefore he has this in mind, and does not pay attention to how he speaks differently, both of the sacrifices and of the food, only that he designates a place. Therefore he will say thus: I permit you indeed to slaughter (sacrifices) and eat all kinds of meat at home, and in your place, both the clean and the unclean [may eat it, v. 15. 22.]. But all that thou shalt sacrifice (offere) unto God, of which I will not that thou shouldest sacrifice or eat other than in the place of God. Even if that place is far away, I will still allow you to slaughter and eat all kinds of meat; but what you want to sacrifice to God, you shall bring there, or if you cannot bring it there, you shall make it money, and buy other things in the place of God, as he will say Cap. 14, 24-26, so that the meaning is: the meat, which one does not have to sacrifice, can be eaten freely in any place, but the sacrifices and what is due to God can only be slaughtered and eaten in the place of God.

From this it is obvious that Moses uses the word "sacrifice" (sacrificandi) for the word "slaughter" (mactandi), since nothing is sacrificed unless it is slaughtered, as also Lucas says in Acts Cap. 10, 13:

"Arise, Petre, slaughter (sacrifica) and eat", that is: die and eat. That it is so is enforced by the circumstances of the text, for it most strictly decrees that they shall sacrifice (sacrificant) only in the place chosen by God, and yet it permits them to slaughter (sacrificari) and eat flesh in any place. For when he says this about the meat that is not to be sacrificed to God, he says without danger or offense that it will either be slaughtered or sacrificed, since everyone understands that this is not about sacrifice. But if he spoke of the meat that was to be offered to God (offerendis), he would not allow it to be offered in any place (sacrificandas) without offense. But, at the same time, under this word he secretly indicates the common and spiritual priesthood, through which we all spiritually (mystice) sacrifice ourselves (sacrificamus), Rom. 12, 1.

To the second difficulty we say the same, that Moses, since he has directed his attention to the determination of the place, does not speak differently of the meal, but summarizes the whole people with the priests and Levites, so that the meaning is: The tithes and the sacrifices you shall offer in the place of God and eat with gladness, but each his part, namely the tithes the priests and Levites, of the sacrifices also the common people. For Moses (as I have said) looks at all the people gathered before God, where some receive and eat the tithes, others the sacrifices, still others only portions of the sacrifices, and all are merry in one and the same place. Therefore it does not follow that the common people ate the tithes, but that among the whole people there were people who ate them, namely the priests and the Levites, while meanwhile the common people ate their part of the sacrifices.

Noteworthy sayings in this chapter are these two [v. 8]: "You shall not do any of the things that we do here today, each one as he sees fit," and [v. 32]: "All that I command you, you shall keep, and do them. Ye shall not add unto it, nor do of it." The first saying condemns free will altogether, for he holds that which we undertake (nostra studia) against the word of God, pronouncing in a general sentence the will that nothing shall be chosen or done by us without God's word preceding and shining; so also no place shall be chosen 2c. From this it follows that everything we do without the word is pure darkness and error. For if this were not so, there would have been no need to warn us that we should not do what seems right to us; neither would we need the word.

The other saying takes away the presumption that we should not do better something that God has ordered, and at the same time also gives us freedom by absolving us from all works, efforts, laws and statutes of men, and binding our consciences to the word of God alone, of which much is said elsewhere.

Notice, however, that in this passage Moses describes the people as godless, since he says that they do what seems right to them, not what seems right to God. Here belongs the word Apost. 7, 42, where Stephen quotes from Amos [Cap. 5, 25. f.] that they were idolaters, and Paul, Apost. 13, 18, says that God tolerated their ways, and the 94th Psalm [v. 10] that God had forty years of trouble with this people. How then can it stand that the people in the fourth book of Moses Cap. 24, 6. is called a blessed people, and Balaam praises it so gloriously? This can exist in such a way that in both passages the matter is spoken of according to the synecdoche, 1) that the greater part was godless and the smaller part godly. But because of the word of God, which was among them in the godly, the whole people is commended, as Paul in the Epistle to the Romans Cap. 3, 1. Paul praises the circumcision, that is, the whole people, because they trusted in what God had spoken, even though many did not believe.

The secret interpretation (allegoria) of the One Place that God has chosen is the one sense of faith in which all the saints agree and commune.

Here, then, it is commanded with the greatest severity that we should remain in the unity (unitate) of faith, and not be divided into sects and our opinions, which are the hills, the valleys, the groves, and in general all the places that please us; everything that we sacrifice in these displeases [GOtte^]. But to those who abide in the same sense of faith, there is no harm if they are otherwise sinners (peccent), but all that they sacrifice, that pleases [GOtte].

But elsewhere than in the place of God one may eat all kinds of flesh 2c. That is, all kinds of external things that do not pertain to faith are free; the conscience can use them, and not use them, as there are such carnal things as clothes, places, food, time, persons, gestures. But what is of faith, as giving our bodies for sacrifice, and the fruits of the Spirit are not free, but must be offered in faith, and one should be joyful before God because of all the goods one has received from God, especially the word of grace.

That one should pour the blood on the earth like water, and not eat with your flesh [v. 16. 23. f.], whether in the sacrifice or in other eating, means that in matters of faith as well as of Christian freedom one should neither teach nor follow anything that has the old man, flesh and blood about it (sapit). For it is just as ungodly to imprison believing consciences with carnal teachings of works, or to make them righteous by works, as it is to make them free in such a way that they do nothing at all and give place to the flesh through freedom. Now he that eateth not the blood, but poureth it upon the earth, as water, who, being justified by faith, despiseth works that justify, and yet condemneth idleness and the liberty of the flesh. If we do this, it will be well with us, as Moses says here [v. 25.], and we will do what pleases the Lord. For "this is the good, pleasing and perfect will of God," Rom. 12:2.

The thirteenth chapter.

V. 1. ff. If a prophet or dreamer among you shall arise, and give thee a sign or a wonder 2c.

To confirm what he said at the end of the previous chapter: "You shall do nothing to it," 2c., Moses sets this whole chapter by wanting us to adhere to the word of God with such great reverence that we will not be moved by persons or signs, even if they are as learned and holy as the prophets, or good and kind as brothers, children and friends, or great and many as cities and mighty men. One must base oneself entirely on the Word alone and put everything out of sight and out of mind, because if one loses the Word, one loses God. But it is better to lose friends, brothers, saints, and powerful people than to lose God.

And here you see that every one is given the right to speak also about the teachings of the Christ also commands, Matth. 7, 15: "Beware of false prophets", although no one is allowed to execute the external right and kill such a prophet, but the authorities, as we are taught in the following chapter. For everyone should keep his conscience, therefore the right to judge the spirits and the prophets is necessary for every man, but no one has the right to take the sword from himself. Otherwise, what need would there be for public authority?

Here the question arises: How does he forbid to believe a prophet who performs such signs and foretells what is to come, while in chapter 18, v. 22, he says that one can know that it is God's word when that comes which the prophet has spoken? I answer: In this

In the second chapter he speaks of the already existing (praeterito) word of God, which is already accepted and confirmed with the necessary (suis) signs, as he says: "You shall neither add to it nor do away with it", and again [Cap. 12, 1. 1: "Keep the commandments of GOD," and [Cap. 28, 1.], "Obey His voice." Against such a word no prophets are to be admitted, though they rain signs and wonders, not even an angel from heaven, as Paul says in the Epistle to the Galatians [Cap. 1, 8.]. But here it is written about a prophet who will do signs to introduce other gods. Now this is contrary to the received word, that one should worship only One God; therefore one should not hear him. But in the eighteenth chapter he speaks of a new word, which has not yet been received, and which also does not contradict the received word; therefore he says there [v. 20]: "If a prophet should speak in my name, which I have not commanded him" 2c. Such a prophet is not to be admitted unless he does signs, just as Christ also confirmed His gospel with signs when it was necessary to preach beyond Moses. For God does not reveal any new word without confirming it with signs. He does allow a new word to be taught, so that He may tempt us, but He is faithful to stand by us, so that signs do not happen, or what they preached before does not come to pass, as is shown in Elijah, when he had to deal with the Baalphobes, as Paul also says [1 Cor. 11:19]: "For there must be breeds among you, so that those who are righteous may become manifest among you." So he also allows signs to be done against the accepted word, again to try us (as Moses says here, v. 3.) whether we love him with all our heart. So far the devil has deceived us with lying signs and wonders, and brought us into strong errors [2 Thess. 2, 11.], as Paul predicted, in that we have admired pilgrimages, apparitions of spirits and some healings at certain tombs, contrary to the gospel we have received, so that even holy people have come to traps here, like Augustine, Bernard, Jerome and many others, who have orders and rules on

They would certainly have been condemned (as Wiklef says) if they had not repented and been preserved by the fullness of faith in their unrecognized error.

We have often said, and we say again, that other gods are not merely an outward idol, but rather a delusion or an erroneous conscience, which one invents for oneself of the true God; for as the conscience is, so is God. For if you believe that one serves God with these or those sacrifices, in this or that place, and that without the word of God, then you have already lost the true God, and that delusion of such sacrifice is your God, which [delusion] you hold under the name of the true God. If you believe that by the cap and the plate, by poverty, obedience, fasting, food and drink, God is worshipped (since you have no word of God here), then the cap and the plate is already your God, or that delusion of the cap and the plate. Therefore, as you inwardly have the delusion of the cap in the place of God, so you also proceed outwardly and set up the cap as an outward idol in the image of the inward delusion, you wear it, you honor it, you serve it and hold it in great value.

Behold, this is making other gods and following them, that is, serving gods you do not know, for you do not feel or understand that you are worshipping a delusion and an idol in place of the true God, nor do you pay attention to how uncertain you are in this service, and how nothing at all you think of or think about the true God, because you are thinking about him without his word. But he cannot be held or thought of in any other way than by his word. Thus you see that every way of inventing or worshipping foreign gods is no other than the godless delusion by which we choose and believe without the word of GOtte that we please GOtte by this or that work, by this or that place, by this or that ceremony (ritu), while he is not such a [god], and yet under his name another [god] is fictitiously invented in the heart. Therefore follow also outwardly different names, as different idols [arise], so that one is called Baal, another Astharoth, another Dagon, another Moloch, Peor, Camos, and so with many more names, like our monks, one of the white, another of the black garment, and each with his name and according to his work, which outer is called, which is clearly distinguished from others. All these are prophets who are deceived by their dreams and speak: Let us go and serve other gods, that is, let us choose new customs (rites) without the Word, under the name of the true God.

The fourteenth chapter.

V. 1. You are children of the Lord your God, you shall not cut yourselves.

After the place of worship is set, here he specifies the persons or the customs that pertain to the person, namely, what they should be like in their bodies. But he forbids three things: cutting, giving gifts because of a dead person, and eating unclean things. By "cutting up" here is not understood the teaching (impressio) of marks, of which he will speak later, but a certain use in funerals. With this cutting, perhaps the Egyptians and other pagans cut and tore their faces; then they also shaved off the eyebrows as a sign of grief and mourning. For he is not speaking here of the shaving of the head, but of the face between the eyes, as the Hebrew text says. With this usage he wants nothing else than that his people should have such customs, which would be quite unlike those of other peoples, as he says: "You are children of the LORD your God." The secret interpretation of this is this, that since Christ has been raised from the dead, and now through faith death and sin have been overcome, we should bear no sign of sadness or death on us, as do others who, through the consciousness of sin, are without hope of life. Therefore, no signs nor words of life are to be seen on them, because death reigns in them through the power of sin, but we, who are children of God, live with it.

Moses then teaches what animals are to be clean and unclean for them, and it is true

It seems that these animals are literally (ad lite-ram) all unclean, that is, harmful and unwholesome for food and for the human body.

But a stronger reason is this, that this people would not only be distinguished from other peoples by the quantity and variety of the laws, from which hatred and persecution would arise for them because of the law of God, but also that they would have to create, so that they would not invent customs and works and laws by their own choice (per sese), being idle and having nothing to do; Then also that this people might be kept in oppression, that through the multitude of sins their pride might be broken, and they might sigh the more fervently for Christ, the promised Savior; at the same time also that by this outward example they might be moved to purity of spirit, and be formed to love and meekness, seeing that only unclean, ravenous, and cruel beasts were forbidden them. Let this be said of the literal mind.

Now follows the allegory, of which we have said that it is most certainly drawn to the office of the Word, since it is invalid (frigida), and rather not a hidden mind; but it is the historical mind that is drawn to customs and works. So also here the uncleanness of the animals means the doctrine of works taught by the teachers of the law and statutes, whose hearts and consciences are never purified, indeed, "to the unclean nothing is pure, but unclean is both their mind and conscience" [Tit. 1, 15.]. For the more they purify themselves by works.

they stain themselves by (false) trust and hopefulness, by unbelief and such an ungodly nature. Therefore Peter also compares the ungodly, who have fallen back from faith into works, to a sow that rolls in the muck again after the flood. But they are ravening and cruel, because their doctrine not only defiles more and more, but also lacerates and devours, because they do not make a calm and cheerful conscience, but a lacerated, torn, desolate, and miserably devoured conscience; moreover, they also deceive very many, and tear them away from the righteous doctrine of faith. Therefore Christ calls them "ravening wolves" [Matth. 7, 15.], and Paul "abominable wolves", who do not spare the flock [Apost. 20, 29.]. Therefore, the ungodly teachers of works are unclean and cruel, defiling hearts more, devouring and tearing them away from Christ.

Here I leave it to idle people to investigate through all these animals what the manners of the godless teachers are. Known is the folly of the ostrich, which thinks it is completely covered when it has covered its neck with some little twig. Thus an ungodly teacher seizes upon some saying of Scripture and thinks that his delusion is beautiful, not seeing that he asserts his cause from all sides, naked and without weapons. The little owl is good for the fowler, because the appearance of piety is wonderfully attractive. The night owl does not see when it is light, at night it sees, because the wicked does not obey the truth, but turns to his fables. The cuckoo swallows the eggs of the warbler and lays his own" in the nest. Afterwards, when his young have grown up, they devour their mother, the warbler, in the nest, for the godless teacher steals the children of the church and pushes in his offspring in exchange, which finally corrupts the church from which it had been nourished. Thus the hoopoe defiles his nest, for the ungodly teachers defile (as I have said) themselves and the church, as Peter (2 Ep. 2, 13. Vulg.) says: "They are filth and stain." The gossiping swallow preys on men, but it is of no use, and if it is ver last, it takes severe revenge on the cattle. A godless teacher makes many words and is flattering, but has no use, and if he is hurt, he is unforgiving (and does not rest) until he has avenged himself. So may someone who desires do with the eagle and other animals, and he will see that everything fits the godless teachings very well.

To eat such things is to believe and follow them, as to eat the flesh of Christ is to believe in Him, John 6:54, 56. Not to eat is to avoid these abominations. But to divide the claws is (as Paul teaches Timothy) to rightly divide the word of God [2 Tim. 2, 15.]. That is, to teach that you may rightly apply the gospel and the law, to establish the conscience with the gospel, to make it alive and free, and not to oppress and burden it with the law or works and sins; again, not to make the flesh free through the gospel, but to oppress and kill it with the law and works, as is fitting for the old man and the body of sin to be destroyed. But to chew the cud is to "receive the word with the heart, and consider it with the utmost diligence," so that one does not (as the proverb says) let it fall in at one ear and out at the other, but keeps it persistently in the heart, and swallows it down, and makes it his flesh and blood (viscera).

Therefore, he who sets either the gospel alone or the law alone above the twofold (utrumque) man, that is, the inward and the outward, does not cleave (that is, he does not rightly exercise the office of teaching), because by the gospel alone he teaches all freedom, that is, freedom both of the spirit and of the flesh, so that at the same time the conscience rejoices and is freed from works, and also the body is idle in the service of love; Again, by the law alone teaches all captivity, that is, both of the spirit and of the flesh, so that at the same time the conscience is troubled with scrupulis and restlessness, and the body with toil and labor. Both are unclean and defiled, indicating that the teacher is not truly justified by faith. Let the heart therefore be set free by the word of grace, and let the body be a servant.

by the law of love, the claw will be rightly split.

Again, there are animals that cleave the claw and do not chew the cud, like the sow or the pig. These are the ones who teach both rightly, but while they preach to others, they themselves become reprobate [1 Cor. 9:27], because they do not discipline their bodies, nor bring them into bondage, because they are dead with the widow who lives in lusts [1 Tim. 5:6], and choke the word under thorns and lusts, so that it does not bear fruit [Matt. 13:22]. They draw the word, but soon they drop it, nor do they wholeheartedly notice it or think about it. These are swine in the lake of sin. Others, however, chew the cud again, but they do not cleave the claws. These are the ones who either accept the gospel alone or the law alone with all their heart, cling to it constantly and hold on to it, but either torment the conscience alone or make the body free alone, and these are thus unclean like the camel, the hare and the rabbit.

The same is to be said of the water animals, which are without raft feathers and scales. For they have the raft feathers instead of the wings with which they steer their course. By them is signified the doctrine of faith, which, through the Word of God, governs and guides the hearts in this world. The scales, however, are as it were the weapons and the ornament of their body, without which the other swimming animals are as it were naked. They mean that faith is not idle, but active through the spirit of love. Therefore, if some have scales, but are without raft feathers, they signify the toilers, without faith and word; as the serpents. But if they have raft feathers without having scales, they mean those who have the word, without fruit and work; as, the eels and the morays. Others have neither feathers nor scales; they have neither faith nor works; as, worms, blood urchins 2c. All of these must not be eaten, nor must they be communicated with. Thus, among the birds, those that creep and have feathers are unclean, and signify the hypocrites who have the doctrine of the word only in appearance, as whether they could fly; yet they crawl altogether, and are earthly minded.

The carrion is not to be eaten; elsewhere he says not to touch it either, but to sell or give it to the stranger. That is, let the dead bury their dead [Matt. 8:22]. Neither shall we have fellowship with them that are without the word of life. And if they once had it, but, having lost the word, have died, as the heretics, we are to give them to strangers, that is, they are to be to us as Gentiles. We shall let them join them and put them away from us. "For thou art a holy nation unto the Lord thy God," that is, thou art sanctified by his word; therefore thou shalt not make thyself partaker of strange sins.

V. 21: Do not boil the kid, because it is still nursing its mother.

Just as he decrees civil purity for unclean animals, he also decrees civil mercy for the little goat, so that through this outward gentleness and leniency they will become accustomed to have mercy on people and to spare them, so that they will also abandon their right. Then, since he is talking about worship, he does not want an immature goat to be sacrificed, but a yearling (as he commands elsewhere [Ex 12:5]), so that they do not sacrifice unfit and useless things. This is the meaning of the word of the apostle Rom. 14, 1.: "Take up the weak in faith", so that we do not spoil those who need milk with solid food, and do not cook or kill them through martyrdom or other strong temptations, before they have attained firmness in life and certainty in doctrine. For God does not let us be tempted beyond our ability. Therefore, we must also believe and teach in this way. For in the kingdom of Christ there is only one law: "Bear one another's burdens", Gal. 6, 2.

V. 22. ff. You shall tithe every year 2c.

God imposed three tithes on this people. First, that which they gave to the Levites every year from all the fruits of the land. Second, that which they tithed every third year, above the aforementioned, from all the same fruits of the land, which was to be used, as it were, for a common box and for public alms, both for the Levites and for the strangers, also for the orphans and widows, because he did not want the poor to be in the land, as he says in the following chapter. He speaks of these two tithes in this chapter. The third tithe was imposed on the Levites, so that they would also tithe from their tithes to the priests; this is mentioned in the third book of Moses. To these priests God also gave all the firstborn, so that the firstborn of the people was redeemed with money. Thus, the ordinary income of the priests was the firstborn or firstlings and the tithes they received from the Levites, to which were added the sacrifices and gifts of all the people. The income of the Levites was the tithes they received from the people and a portion of the sacrifices when they served the priests. And would God that all the other treasures, which nowadays consume the land and the people, which must also be necessarily unreasonable, were taken away, and [in their place] the tithes were put in; if one was not enough, three, four or five could be added. In this way a people could live under their masters. This would be the most honorable and just way to raise income (redituum), which would depend solely on the goodness of God. For if God were to give abundant blessings in a year, the people would have abundant income, and the authorities would have abundant tithes. But if God gave little blessing, the authorities would bear the same burden as the subjects and receive less. But now that the annual taxes are fixed and certain, and the years of blessing rare, the subjects are forced to pay the full taxes, even though they do not have a year of blessing in ten years in a row or longer, yes, what is even more miserable, they are forced to pay the full taxes, even though they have received in that year either hardly as much or not as much from the land as they have to pay, namely with money they have borrowed elsewhere, from which they either pay the taxes or from which they live in that year.

Is this not more than barbarism? yes, a kind of animal and cruel rapacity? Could it be said, then, that these taxes are just? that these laws are just? What wonder is it if the people are sucked dry and driven out of all places? What is the rule in Germany today but a mere tyranny? Of foreign empires I speak nothing, I know nothing of them; because of ours I am grieved. Which of the princes or persons in authority do you think can be blessed today, if he suffers or does this knowingly or willingly, if he could help the cause (as befits a prince)? You see how much here the reason (ratio) of blessedness urges that the princes consult with each other, work together and set to work so that all other estimates may by all means be taken away and turned into tithes (as much as may be necessary for them), and they thus preserve the people and govern the world with other laws. I confess that the common people are sunk in lavishness and frivolity when they have abundance, but this evil (rebus) must be remedied otherwise than by unjust estimations, and not cure sin with sin. Then the blame for the fact that the populace is so depraved lies with the princes, who rule without law, without care, without rigor, and are concerned only with laying up treasures and having pleasure. 1)

But let us return to Moses. Behold, how beautiful an order is in it. First he deals with the annual tithes and the daily first fruits, by which the priests and the Levites are provided for, then only with the tithes in every third year, by which any poor should be helped, so that we realize that in the first place the servants of the word are to be provided for, by which not the belly, but the heart and the spirit are to be provided for.

1) This whole paragraph ifi been omitted in the Latin Wittenberg edition and inserted instead by the editors(>Vitt. Dom. III(1549f, col. 57k): "But these things are disputed in vain nowadays, for if the tithe were assigned to necessary use, avarice would easily invent the ninth, eighth, seventh, fifth or third part of the fruits. Therefore the children of Israel complain that they were oppressed under Solomon and ask Rehoboam for relief, 1 Kings 12:4."

After that also the belly of the poor must be supplied. For faith and the word are more than charity and good works; therefore it is necessary to provide for faith and the word rather than charity and good works. But it is not provided otherwise than that those who are to teach may be nourished. Indeed, if faith and the word were to perish, nothing would remain of love and good works. But law is law; it is spoken, but not done. For just as the people of Moses left this law standing and did not feed their priests and Levites, so they were forced either to leave the word and service of God, to feed themselves with their hands' work, or to set up new doctrines and idolatry; here the people fed their deceivers abundantly, which neglected the right shepherds, because they too turned their ears away from the truth and turned to fables: So it happens also now; the servants of the word no one feeds, so that they are forced by lack of bread to leave the preaching ministry, to cultivate the land and to learn a trade, while they have not only fed the godless deceivers up to now, but have also filled the world with bishoprics and monasteries, which are equal to the riches of kings and princes. This has happened out of God's righteous judgment, that those who have not given a servant of God and messenger of salvation even one loaf of bread, waste whole kingdoms and principalities on the servants of the devil and the messengers of death.

You see with what care Paul urges 1 Cor. 9, 7. ff. 1 Tim. 5, 17. f. Gal. 6, 6. f. and elsewhere insists on feeding the ministers of the word, so that it is disgraceful that in this very small matter in such a great and glorious people one has to hear so many words from such a great apostle, where on the other hand love should be so burning that it would be necessary to keep the people from giving, as Ex. 36, 5. f., since according to the example of the Galatians [Gal. 4, 15.] (if it were possible) we should also pluck out our eyes and give to such servants. Therefore also here Moses adds, after he had spoken of the tithes and the firstborn [v. 23.]: "That thou mayest learn nest fear the LORD your GOD all your life," namely, that feeding the servants of the Word is the first and supreme usus of honoring GOD and fearing Him. For he who does not feed [the servants of the Word], how should he care for GOD's Word? But whoever does not care for GOD's word, how should he care for GOD? He who does not care about GOD, how should he fear Him? So, if one neglects and despises the servant of the Word, it is the same as despising GOD and His Word. "He who hears you hears me, and he who despises you despises me," is what Moses so carefully inculcates here and elsewhere, lest they abandon the Levites, who had no other inheritance.

That which he says of the too-wide way and the distance of the place of God, of the sale of the firstborn and the tithes, and that other things should be bought for this money, is explained above in a previous chapter [Cap. 12] that it was not permitted in other cities to slaughter and eat what had to be sacrificed, or if it was eaten, other things had to be bought in its place for money and replaced.

The secret interpretation of the firstfruits can be understood from the spiritual understanding (mysterio) of the killing of the firstborn in Egypt. I think that this firstborn means the first fruit of the law, that is, the righteousness from the works. For the law first compels to works, and if it is taken in a carnal sense, it produces seeming hypocrites, who make themselves believe that they are the first of all, and that everything is due to them. This righteousness Christ has killed by his passage, that is, by his death, by which he taught that by the works of the law no flesh can be righteous in the sight of God, Rom. 3:20. But the firstborn of Israel, which is sanctified to the Lord, is the righteousness of faith, which is owed entirely to him who condemned the righteousness of works. Therefore, to offer the firstborn and the firstfruits is to confess that the righteousness of faith received was brought about by His grace, not by our powers. For the first fruit of the Gospel is faith in the Spirit, who also makes us firstborn and makes us heirs according to a twofold right, both of the kingdom and of the priesthood; but the tithes are, as it were, the last fruit, the goods of love and of the priesthood.

of the Spirit, which we also offer and pay, confessing that they are given to us by His grace through faith, that we did not receive them by our merits.

The fifteenth chapter.

V. 1-3. For seven years you shall keep a year of remission 2c.

Because in the previous chapter he had begun to deal with the tithes in every third year for the provision of the poor, on the occasion of the annual tithes due to the Levites for the service of God, he now remains with what he had begun, and now completely finishes this locum of the poor, digressing [from the main matter], to such an extent (adeo) that he also mixes this civil law of remission into the treatment of the first commandment. But the suinma of this chapter is that they should not be guilty of this, that the poor are abandoned in the land. But he says that there would always be poor, so that they would have people to give to, either from the tithes in the third year, or with borrowings, or in some other way. We have spoken of the tithes, now let us speak of the borrowings.

He says that what had been borrowed could be reclaimed before the seventh year, but in the seventh year itself everything that should then still be found as borrowed should be free and given to the brother, and that according to divine right. But that this seventh year was a fixed and certainly ordered one, like the jubilee year was, in which what had been bought was returned and set free, follows with necessity (necesse est) from the fact that it did not begin from the day on which the borrowing took place, but was a general one over the whole land and people, like the feasts, the Passover, the Pentecosts and others were. It is truly a very beautiful and very cheap law; after all, GOD wanted the rulers of the world to follow the

If the same were to follow today, they would have fewer questions and troubles, since they would know that the lawsuits, disputes, debts, acts, contracts, rights, seals, and letters would all have to be cancelled and extinguished at once in the seventh year, whether it is near or far away, and that they could not be postponed and maintained in eternal and endless investigations (quaestiones). At the same time, they would be forced to be careful not to have such a large sum outstanding that they could have no hope of having it restored before the seventh year, and so even spendthrifts and rogues (perditis) could not rely on foreign goods that they had accumulated through debts and contracts.

But what do you want to say to Christ, who forbids Matth. 5,<sup>1</sup>) 40. ff. and Luc. 6, 34. f. that one reclaims what he has borrowed, and commands that one lends without hoping to receive the same again? I answer: Christ is speaking to Christians, who are above all laws and do more than the laws prescribe. Moses, however, provided the people, who are subject to the authorities and the sword, as long as they are citizens (civilem populum), with laws, so that the wicked would be kept in check and public peace would exist. Here the law is to be administered in such a way that the one who has borrowed should give back, although a Christian, if such a law does not come to his aid, even if what he has borrowed is not given back to him, should bear this with equanimity. So also, although the law enjoins that one should not and takes revenge on those who are violent, a Christian bears it when he is wronged and does not take revenge, nor does he seek revenge, although he does not prevent the severity of the avenging sword, because he knows that the sword is used for vengeance against evildoers, as Peter 1 Petr. 2, 14. says.

Then, what is this, that he allows a stranger to reclaim what he has borrowed, even in the seventh year, that is, always, but not from a brother? Is not then justice and love to be observed against a stranger? To this it is to be answered that this also is done for a just cause of the world government (publicae politiae), that the citizens are honored before the foreigners and strangers with a privilege, so that everything is not through each other and equal; so it also happened with the Romans, when they gave some cities the right of a colony, others the right of a Roman city. For these differences (formas), though they seem to have an appearance of inequity, the world must necessarily have in its regime, as is the status of servants and maids, and likewise of artisans (operariorum) and laborers. For not all can be in the same way kings, princes, councilors, kingdoms, free people, since the world cannot exist without various and different persons. As much as before God there is no respect of persons, but all are equal, the respect of persons and inequality is necessary for the world, so that the wicked are kept in check and public peace exists, which cannot exist under the equality and indiscriminateness of persons.

But the people of the Jews had a further and higher right, not only to reclaim what they had borrowed, but, as he says here [v. 6.], also to usurp the Gentiles and to take interest from them, namely by divine power, which itself orders and permits this. For he is GOD and the LORD over all things, who not only takes away money and things, but also kingdoms and dominions (imperia, when he wills, in whatever way he wills, and gives to whom he wills. Therefore, if God, in order to take vengeance on the pagans, wants to punish them by means of interest and usury, and

If he commands the Jews to do this, the Jews will do well to obediently give themselves to God as instruments and execute his wrath on the Gentiles through usury and interest, just as he commanded them to drive out the Amorites and Cananites. Thus, if a husband should seem worthy to God to be deprived of his wife or children, and I am commanded to do so by his word, I would not be an adulterer or a robber of men if I deprived him of his wife and children, but an obedient rod of God over the ungodly man.

Here the question is solved, how it was allowed to the Jews to usury. The answer is that they were not free to do so because of their merits or according to common law, but because of God's wrath against the Gentiles, which He wants to execute through the Jews as the instruments of His wrath. Nevertheless, they would not have been allowed to make use of this freedom if they had not been commanded to do so by a certain and manifest word of God, and if they had not been chosen to be such instruments. For they were no better than any of the Gentiles, as I have said above, only that God chose and accepted them out of mercy alone, so that, if you look at the matter correctly, it is not the Jews themselves who are usurious, but it is God who persecutes the Gentiles through the usury of the Jews. This has been sufficiently proven, since he again handed over the Jews, who disobeyed him and sinned, to the Gentiles, not only that they should be burdened with usury, but that they should be plagued with all kinds of ignominy, even considerably more cruelly than he ever handed over the Gentiles to the Jews; as he also said in the 28th chapter. Chapter 12 of this book, and adds in this chapter, V. 6, that they will lend to many nations, but only if they obey the voice of the Lord, V. 5, as if to say that if they did not obey, they would not only not lend, but would be like the Gentiles, or even more miserable, which is what happened to them.

However, nowadays, since the Jews have ceased to be the people of God, the Law has been abolished, and they have become the people of God with their godlessness.

The words of the law are not words of the law, but rather words of promise, since it says: "If you obey the voice of the Lord, you will lend to many Gentiles" (foenerabis). But to fulfill the words of promise does not stand with men, as the words of the law, but with GOD alone, who promises this, so that this must be the meaning: If you obey the voice of the LORD, then by the action of GOD the Gentiles will fall into such misery that even if you do not remember it nor seek it, they will have to pay usury, and will be subject to you in all things, and you will rule over them with all their goods, so that you can take (rapias), claim (exigas), usury as you please. It is the Lord who will thus subdue the Gentiles to you and humble them through you.

V. 4. There shall be no beggar among you.

A very beautiful worldly order, which however was never kept, therefore also this law of Mosis, as far as it concerns the whole people, remains only in words. If begging is forbidden among this people, with what right is it established among the Christians, as if it were holy, also by laws? Poverty is praised, but in such a way that one should come to its aid. Then the poverty of the spirit is praised, but it is commanded that one should help the outward poverty, not differently than other repulsions of the neighbor. And it is to be wondered why these praisers of external poverty do not also take upon themselves wounds, diseases, prison, nakedness, banishment, hunger, thirst, sword, dangers, death, sins, the devil and all other evils and make themselves obligated to them (profiteantur), by instituting new vows for this purpose, as they did for poverty, so that one may suffer disease, another imprisonment, another hunger, another sins, or the devil, since Christ commands that for these things one should

He says [Matth. 25, 43]: "I have been sick, and you have not visited me" 2c.

But our praisers of poverty, instead of diseases and wounds, have a well-groomed (obesam) skin and fattened flesh, more than gluttons and harlots, instead of banishment they have houses more splendid than the palaces of kings, instead of hunger they devour the storehouses of all people, for thirst they have full cellars, instead of death they have a quite pleasant and safe life. Then they sing to us about the glory of poverty that must be borne. But God has commanded that they should be put away, so that we may be, as an example is written in the Acts of the Apostles also for the Christian people [Acts 4:34]: "Neither was there any among them that lacked."

Therefore, there should be no poverty and mendicancy among the people of God, but care and attention that there is no poverty and mendicancy, so that you may know that the mendicant orders and all those who profess to be poor and boast of it are disciples and servants of the devil, who rage against the Lord and his anointed (Christ), just as in the people of God there should not be sickness, hunger, thirst, exile, death, sin and the devil, but care and attention, if such a thing should occur among them, that it be removed as soon as possible, and care taken that it not be among them. I say that poverty is not to be advocated, not to be chosen, not to be taught, for it is everywhere enough by itself, as he says here [v. 11], "There shall always be poor among you," as well as all other evils. But for this one should constantly take care that one always confronts these things, 1) because they always occur. You see, then, what is involved in the institution of vowing poverty and in the whole realm of the pope.

V. 7-11. If any of your brothers is poor 2c.

That is the way of the world, that as soon as a law is given, it is also found out, how to circumvent the law. Therefore, Moses also anticipates here the treachery that would arise with the law of the seventh year of remission, in that avarice and human hard-heartedness think like this when the year of remission is near: What should I do? Should I borrow? But after a few months the year of remission will be here. Then I will have given it away in vain, because there is no hope of getting it back, nor the right to demand it again. Moses speaks against this [stinginess] with strange and sharp words, calling it a hard heart, a vile word, a shameful deed, an ungodly eye, and finally also a sin that cries out to God, so that you can see that Moses also agrees with Christ in the doctrine of lending, that even under the threat that one should be guilty of such great offenses, he commands that one should lend, even though there is no hope of getting it back, or right to demand it back, so that the epitome of this teaching is that one should work for the poor in love.

V. 12-14. If your brother, a Hebrew or Hebrew woman, sells himself to you, he shall serve you six years 2c.

He renews (rovocat) the law 2 Mos. 21,<sup>1</sup> ) 2. f.. [and draws it] to this law of the release of the borrowed, because it also speaks of the poor, who, forced by poverty, have sold themselves and, as it were, have been lent something, by making themselves debtors with their own bodies. But he adds in this place that he should not let him go empty from him when he gives him free, and indicates two reasons for this, first, that they should remember that they also were servants in Egypt, secondly, that he [the servant] had been a two-fold day laborer with him. I believe this is said because he who sells himself to another does himself two harms: first, that he serves another and works out everything for his master; second, that in the meantime he misses his own, and what he gains for his master he could have gained for himself. Therefore, it would be quite unreasonable for him to be sent away completely empty. Therefore he says [v. 18:]

1) In the issues: Lx. 22.

"Don't let it seem hard that you let him go free."

Moses always adds glorious promises: that God has blessed, that He blesses, and that He will bless those who do this, so that they will not doubt that it will be amply repaid to them when they have either given or lent something away, as Christ also says [Luc. 6, 38.]: "Pray, and it will be given to you." Hence the saying of Solomon [Prov. 19:17], "He who has mercy on the poor lends to the Lord," and again [Prov. 14:31], "He who has mercy on the poor honors God," and many such sayings, as well as many threats in opposition to them, against those who do not have mercy, as the Scriptures are full of them. But this is not lost on the deaf godlessness and unbelief that thinks that God is either joking or lying with such words, and he is worthy to be deprived of the goods of this life and the life to come, just as [1 Sam. 25, 10. ff.] that fool Nabal in Carmel denied David [his help], but soon, deprived of life, kept nothing himself.

V. 16-18. But he will say: I will not depart from you 2c.

That the ear was pierced with an awl at the post in the door of the house was an outward sign of constant servitude, as one must have signs in human things to distinguish the persons. Thus the emperor uses the robe, the hatchet, the diadem; the woman the veil; the virgin the crown; the child a little button (bulla). But it was a suitable and fitting sign that the ear was pierced with the awl. The awl signifies that the commandment of his lord is sharp and iron, namely, that it penetrates, and the word of the lord is effective in the servant. The ear signifies obedience, which submits to the commandment. The fact that this is done in the door means that he is given the right and the power (usus) to go in and out and to do everything, and that he is taken in among the servants of the house. Furthermore, earrings made of gold, silver and precious stones are made an ornament of the free. But the awl of the slaves is iron, because the obedience of the free is willing and free, all golden and delicious, but that of the servants forced, for wages, and iron and low.

V. 19. ff. All the firstborn that is born among your cattle and sheep 2c.

Now he catches up and comes again completely to the tax, which is to be given to the priests, after the digression about the supply of the poor is finished, in order to add what should have been added above, namely, that the firstborn, which would be offered to God, must be so constituted that it is absolutely without defect and infirmity. Therefore he says here that the firstling of the oxen should also not be plowed, and the firstlings of the sheep should not be shorn, so that the firstborn may be completely unharmed, and not be used for any use or benefit, but only be offered to GOtte, and eaten in the place chosen by GOtte, as one should also abstain from the holy and what is due to GOtte. "Thou shalt eat" [v. 20.] (saith he), that is, thou shalt offer it to be eaten, and shalt be gathered together among them that eat it, as I said above [Cap. 12]. Thus, if it should have any other defect, it was not to be sacrificed, but every man might eat it at home in his city.

The year of remission of the debt is the whole time of grace, because the whole kingdom of Christ is nothing else than the remission of debts continuously, so that they are remitted. But that they are not forgiven to the stranger means that outside the church of Christ there is no forgiveness of sins. For neither can those be forgiven who do not wish to be forgiven, who justify themselves and despise the church. Therefore it must be demanded of them until they repent, that is, nothing must be remitted to them, but they must always be demanded so that they will be of a different mind and do differently until they repent; but to the brother who repents, everything must be remitted.

den. For where there is faith, there are no sins that cannot be forgiven and given; but where unbelief remains, there are no sins that do not have to be condemned and demanded. That one borrow from no one, and all borrow from him [v. 6.], that is, that one live so righteously as to be indebted to no one, but all are indebted to him, because he injures no one, but he is injured by all. That there should be no poor [v. 4.], and if there be, they should be helped; that is, that the weak in faith and life should be borne, taught, and admonished, and prayed for without falsehood in perfect singleness of heart; and such men shall always be among you [v. 11.]. But that the Hebrew servant, the brother, should not be left without a provision, that is, that he should not only be forgiven the debt, but also helped by adding a benefit of love. Although this servant, according to the actual spiritual interpretation, is the people of the law, who serve in a hard bondage, yet when the year of remission comes through the gospel, he is not only set free from the law, but also honored with the word of the gospel, by which he can live; for he has served in a twofold bondage, that he has done the works of the law, and yet has gained nothing, except that his master, the law, has increased; For the more we do works under the law, the more it demands, and the more powerful it becomes, and the less it is fulfilled, because namely the hatred against the law constantly increases; and in the meantime (tamen) he also neglects his own, that is, he does not gain a confidence of conscience, but loses it, whereas he could rather have gained it outside the law through the gospel. But that his ear is pierced with the awl, and he remains a servant forever, means that he, already free in spirit, nevertheless subjugates his flesh to the law all the stronger and forces it to obedience by the iron and hard law, as Paul says [1 Cor. 9, 27.]: "I stupefy my body and tame it" 2c. Thus he remains at the same time a servant and a freeman.

That the firstling from the ox is not for tillage

The righteousness of faith is not to be abused for our own benefit or glory, but to be offered up to God, that he may have the glory and honor. For it does not come from our works, nor is it under our power that we should rule over it, but it belongs to God alone, who creates and gives it. Thus Paul does not want to rule over the faith of the Corinthians [2 Cor. 1, 24]. This spiritual interpretation especially concerns the ministers of the Word, that they do not subject the people of faith to their laws and their works, but offer them to God alone, that they may be subject to him and be governed by faith, as Paul boasts in Rom. 15, 16, that he has given the gospel to the people of God.

to sacrificare (sanctificare) that the Gentiles may become a sacrifice pleasing to God, that is, through the gospel he sacrifices the Gentiles to God, so that they may not be subject to him, Paul, but to God. And what do the ministers of the word do, when they subject us to their works, but shear us and seek their advantage and honor, namely the wool and the fruit of our labor?

That there should be no fault in it is that the conscience should be healthy in faith, so that it does not want to be justified by works and by faith at the same time and please God. For this reason the Lord also severely reproaches this vice in the prophet Malachi [Cap. 1, 7. ff.], because it is not a joke with faith and its doctrine. Tit. 2, 8. [Vulg.]: "His word is wholesome and blameless."

The sixteenth chapter.

V. 1. Keep the month of Abib, to keep the Passover to the Lord.

After the place and the persons are described and provided for, he makes here an order in relation to the times and feasts, particularly over the three main feasts, which concerned first of all this people, whose instruction Moses took upon himself in this book. These feasts are the Passover, Pentecost and the Feast of Tabernacles, and the Feast of Trumpets and the Feast of Atonement in the same seventh month in which the Feast of Tabernacles was celebrated, Leviticus 23:24, namely, the Feast of Trumpets on the first day and the Feast of Atonement on the seventh day. But each of these two feasts was celebrated only One Day. But the Feast of Tabernacles was celebrated in the middle of the month, on the fifteenth day, for eight days, on which all that was male had to appear before the Lord in the place the Lord had chosen, as on the Feast of Passover and Pentecost, as he says in this chapter. But the text itself is easy, only some words need to be explained. "In the months Abib", which our Latin text [the Vulgate 2 Mos. 23, 15.] calls the month of new things, but elsewhere [as here v. 1.] the month of new fruits, perhaps because then everything comes forth anew and the whole world is green. But the month of April is also named by the Latins from the opening (Aprilis ab aperiendo), because then the earth opens and everything becomes new, although the Hebrews do not call April Abib, but Ijar 1). Abib, however, comes from Abab, which means a small rod or a tender branch, Deut. 2, 14, as those are when the trees shoot out in spring, by which, as Christ indicates Matth. 24, 32, one can recognize that summer is near. At that time, namely in April, they went out of Egypt; therefore this month is called the beginning of the year and the first month, Ex 12:2. Others, however, make July out of the month Abib. But this is refuted by the exodus of the Children of Israel out of Egypt, which happened at the beginning of the year in the month of Abib, as it says here and Ex 34:18.

V. 3. Seven days thou shalt eat unleavened bread of affliction: for thou camest forth out of the land of Egypt with fear.

"Bread of affliction" he calls it from the past affliction which they suffered at the time when they first ate this bread, which he explains by soon adding: "For with fear thou wentest forth," 2c., that is, with fear and trembling, as those who are in distress are wont to hasten and be afraid, so that they flee as quickly as possible. For this is the meaning of this word XXX, that it does not mean merely to hasten or to be fearful, but (as I have said) to seek to flee out of fear, as is said of David 1 Sam. 23, 26. when he was completely surrounded by Saul on the mountain, that he despaired, that is, that he was anxious to hasten with a fearful mind. Thus it is said in Exodus 12:11: "And shall eat it as they hasten away," which is what he says here, "the bread of misery," which they ate in fear and anxious haste. And Ps. 104, 7. [Vulg.]: "At the voice of thy thunder they feared," that is, they might have fled and hastened away. Psalm 116:11: "I spoke in my trembling," that is, in fearful haste.

V. 8. On the seventh day is the assembly of the LORD your God.

Our Latin text (noster) has used the word "gathering" (collectam), but more correctly it means [XXXX] a gathering (coetum), an assembly (concionem), a meeting (synodum), a festive assembly (conventum), as the people are wont to come together in the court (atrium) to hear God's word, or to order something in public affairs, or to hold an election, as the popular assemblies (comitia,) of the Gentiles are. So the people of God, after serving God with sacrifices throughout the Passover and eating in the place that God had chosen, came together on the seventh day in one place, the courtyard, and there the law of God and the commandments were read, which were they were concerned about. Therefore, he calls it an assembly of God the Lord, that they should come together to hear the law of God.

"The feast of weeks" he calls Pentecost from the weeks counted from the day of the Passover, of which there are seven, as he says [v. 9.], "Seven weeks shalt thou count." This feast he indicates in the second book of Moses by this paraphrase [Cap. 23, 16.], "The feast of the first harvest of the fruits which thou sowest in the field," but here with such a paraphrase: "From the day when one begins with the sickle in the seed, thou shalt begin to count." This I understand in such a way: One begins to count the weeks from the time of the Passover, where the grass has already grown up so far that one can already mow off its luxuriantly rising stalks (comam). Or if this seems harsh, the commandment of counting must be related to the time of Pentecost, in this way: Thou shalt begin to count from the day, that is, when it shall be about the time of Pentecost, 1) when the luxuriantly growing grass is first to be cut, or the first [field] fruits are reaped, thou shalt count backward, until by reckoning (computando) thou shalt have seven weeks full until the Passover. And this pleases me better, because he commands to count the weeks which he intimates are already fulfilled, but at the same time because it is the custom of the Hebrews to read, write and act (agere) backwards.

Then it will agree nicely with Ex. 23, 16: "When you reap the first fruits", because around Pentecost, especially in those warm regions, the first fruits tend to be there (inveniri) and are reaped, as I said, so that it is the same time when the first fruits are reaped, and when the sickle cuts into the seed (mittitur). Hence he also understands by the "freewill offering," which in this place is called missa in Hebrew, the firstfruits which they were to bring to the priests, of which you will find in the third book of Moses, Cap. 2 at the end [v. 12. ff.]. After this has been explained, everything in this chapter is easy.

1) It seems to us that instead of tueris in the editions should be read tuerit. After that we have translated.

Such festivals and outward customs are instituted for worship, because of the rude people, so that they, occupied with the same, do not invent festivals by their own doing. For nature is inclined to do this, indeed, it has no rest until it sets up ceremonies and ordains divine services, therefore it is necessary to forestall it and keep it at God's word, so that we may be sure that we are dealing with divine things and pleasing God. This is also the reason that the people should meet at least two or three times a year and hear and learn the law of God and be kept in unity of faith and life.

But there are three things he wanted to be remembered at these three feasts: at the feast of Passover, the Exodus from Egypt was to be remembered; this was the first feast of all and the highest in the beginning of the year, because of the first and highest miracle that had been performed for them, namely the deliverance from Egypt. But at the feast of Pentecost it was to be remembered that the law was received at Mount Sinai, since the law was given in the third month after the Exodus, about the fiftieth day after the Passover. At the feast of tabernacles one should keep the memory of all bodily benefits, which had been shown to them during the whole forty years in the desert. Thus you see that the feasts are ordered, not for the sake of idleness, idleness and pleasure, but for the sake of our salvation and the glory of God, so that the word of God may be heard and His benefits remembered, so that we may be instructed, nourished and sustained in faith and love for God.

All these feasts, although there were many others, we celebrate through the interpretation (allegoria) of the spirit in one feast. For we keep Passover daily by eating and offering Christ, the Lamb of God, that is, as Paul interprets it in 1 Cor. 11:1) 26, proclaiming and believing that he was sacrificed for us. Thus we have Pentecost every day, receiving the new law, the Spirit, in our hearts through the ministry of the Word. Celebrate daily

we celebrate the Feast of Tabernacles, teaching and holding that we are strangers in this world, dwelling in the huts of our bodies, which last only a short time, knowing that our πολίτευμα, i.e., our citizens

We are in heaven, where we are in the meantime in faith and live, and here we die daily until our tabernacle is laid down 2c. So we rejoice before the Lord at these feasts in the sweet dough of sincerity and truth, that is, in the nourishment of the pure gospel and in the life of the Spirit, without statutes and human infirmities, offering our firstfruits of praise and thanksgiving.

For also this, that he commandeth that every male should not appear empty before him, was ordained at that time that the priests might be fed, but in our time it has been forced by the ungodly priests, to feed their bellies, upon the offerings (offertoriis) of the common people, whereas in truth it signifies that one offer praise and thanksgiving, but now no longer before the Lord on the mercy seat and the ark of the covenant, or in any certain place, but in spirit and in truth. This is that one does not sacrifice the Passover in any place (as Moses again inculcates here), but in the place that God would have chosen. For if one feeds the sacrificers (sacrificulos) with offerings or contributions (pensionibus), this is as much as if one feeds harlots and harlot hosts, yes, wolves and wild beasts, so that they devour us with their pernicious teachings. But to the servants of the Word their honor is due, as we said above [Cap. 14 toward the end]. Therefore, even now, no one who is male appears empty before the Lord, as the believer gives thanks and offers praise in the spirit. The woman, that is, the flesh, and the still remaining infirmities of sin offer nothing, because there is no beautiful praise in the mouth of the sinner.

He calls unleavened bread "bread of misery" because they went out in fear, and he forbids leaven. What leaven is, Christ himself teaches sufficiently Matth. 16, 6. where he commands that they should beware of the leaven of the Pharisees. Therefore, unleavened bread is the healthy and righteous word.

1) In the editions: "1 Cor. 10."

of faith. It is called a loaf of "misery" from the fear of the hasty departure, because through the gospel the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all men, especially the works saints, Rom. 1, 18. and 2, 16. since the spirit punishes the world for sin, for righteousness, and for judgment. Here the conscience is frightened by the realm of sin and wrath, and rushes out, speaking with those in Acts Cap. 2, 37: "Dear brethren, what shall we do?" and with Paul [Acts 9, 6]: "Lord, what wilt thou that I should do?" For the knowledge of sin urges and impels the elect of God to go forth where the firstborn of Egypt, that is, the righteousness of works with the trust in it and its hopeful fame has been struck.

Nothing of the flesh of the lamb shall remain until tomorrow, but if anything remains, it shall be burned with fire (Ex. 12:10). This is said against the Jews, who, after the true Lamb, Christ, has been sacrificed, still await Him in the future, and put off and delay believing in Him who has come, and let go of the works of the law. But the godly consume the whole (lamb) by the fire of the Holy Spirit, that is, by the Word and faith, simply believing that all is fulfilled by the true and eternal Lamb, after the new morning of the Lord's resurrection has dawned.

The seventeenth chapter.

[You shall appoint judges and officers for yourself in all your gates.

After the first commandment of faith in God has been interpreted, with which both the internal and the external worship has been taught, Moses now comes to the second commandment, namely the commandment of love. But he lets precede this a treatise about persons in authority, about the right of the sword and the judicial procedure in external things, and that in a correct and beautiful order. For (as we have said above [Cap. 1, 9-12.]) if there be not men to administer and execute the laws, to wield and use the sword, all legislation, however sacred, is in vain, since the sword is the power and efficacy and very (ipsa) life of the law, which keeps the wicked in check and protects the good. Here, then, we are taught in a brief epitome that where a law is given, the sword must also be instituted at the same time, so that the law teaches what one must do and refrain from doing, but the sword executes it and punishes those who do something [forbidden] or refrain from doing [something that is commanded], by forcibly compelling the wicked to do and not to do. For without the sword, the law is useless and only a cause to increase evil deeds. Again, the sword without the law is a tyranny and an animalistic rage. But both, namely the law and the sword, connected with each other, is a beautiful and firm order (politia).

From this chapter you will learn at the same time that public crimes are not to be punished by the great crowd or any private person, but by the public sword of the authorities. For here you see that God Himself has appointed judges and officials to administer His own law, and He adds some cases which (as they say) belong before the bar (in terminis), by which He describes the judicial procedure to be observed in punishing wrongdoers, so that no one is wronged, namely, that the matter be carefully investigated, certainly recognized, and referred by witnesses, and thus punished according to the law. This I say against these new prophets of ours, the iconoclasts, who, since they fell from heaven the other day are contemptuous of all authority, and stir up the mob against those who wield the sword from divine power, and usurp the sword, and rage without judgment, without witnesses, and without all form of right.

This is why he commands in this chapter that the matters are to be brought before the judges and proven with witnesses; likewise, how a king should be constituted. Thus he commands in Exodus 22:1, 9 that the matters should be brought before the gods (that is, before the judges), and that they should be decided and settled there either by a settlement or by a judgment. So elsewhere [Deut. 21, 20. f.] he teaches parents that they should accuse their rebellious sons themselves before the judges, and that they should then be stoned to death, and it is commanded [Deut. 22, 13. ff.] that if a harlot has not been found a virgin by her bridegroom, she should likewise be brought before the court, so that you can see everywhere that by divine power the sword and the public court are used to punish the crimes. By this is answered those angry prophets, since they insist on this word of God, in which he addresses the people in the second person, saying: You shall stone, you shall kill, so or so you shall do, you shall put away the wicked from you 2c. For those boast that by this word the right of the sword is given to the mob without distinction, while he speaks this to the people, who were provided and ordered with lawful authority and advisory (praesidentibus) priests.

Therefore he does not speak of the highest authorities, as there are the principes, priests and heads of the people, who were already given to the people by divine power of Moses, as Aaron, Joshua, the twelve princes [Num. 34, 18] and the seventy elders [Num. 11, 16], but of the judges and officials, which he does not appoint himself, but orders the people, which was already ordered, to appoint. For the judges are actually there for the legal affairs, although in the course of events this office sometimes again to the chiefs and priests.

ster came, as the book of Judges and [the books of] Samuelis say of the judges. The officials, however, are actually the executors of the law and the sword, as with us the executioners, the bailiffs and the professors; formerly the most respected and best people were chosen for this, but now only some quite despised and lowly person administers this office.

For if it is honorable for a judge to condemn and condemn the guilty by word, how can it be dishonorable to kill him (percutere) and execute the judge's word by deed? If it is dishonorable to kill an ungodly man with the sword, it would be even more dishonorable to condemn him by the court as such and to hand him over to the sword, since the executioner (praefectus) would not judge if the judge did not command it. For we read that Solomon [1 Kings 2:25 ff] gave this office to the very respected man Benaiah, 2) the son of Jehoiada, when he commanded to kill Shimei and Adonijah and Joab; and Saul charged his Doeg [1 Sam 22:18] to kill the priests, and David his men [2 Sam 1:15] to kill him who had killed Saul. But also among the Romans this office was given to great and honored men, no less than the office of a judge.

For these two persons, the judge and the bailiff, the administration of the sword requires and has them vonnöthen-. And in the Hebrew, by a beautiful allusion (allusione) XXXXX and XXXX are made similar. I translated it, because I had nothing else, not even exactly, by "judges and officials". By XXXXX or officials Moses wants to understand those who are the servants of the judge, the executors [of the death penalty], the executors [of the judgments] and public administrators, therefore also our Latin text sometimes translates them by praecones [court servants], and 2 Mos. 1, 11. makes "Frohnvögte" (exactores) and Werkmeister (praefectos operum) out of it. Christ calls the same bad-away a "servant", Matth. 5, 25: "Lest the judge deliver thee to the servant" 2c.

But he prescribes the rule for these judges and officials that they should judge justly, that is, according to the law of God, not according to their own sense. After that he forbids crooked ways (affectus), that they do not leave the law and let themselves be guided and moved by the reputation of the person and gifts. For these two pieces tend to pervert and bend all judgments, hence he also inserts a motto (gnomen) here, saying, "Gifts blind the wise and pervert the things of the righteous." The "reputation of the person" comprehends in itself the fear of the great, the powerful, and the rich, the love of relatives, the favor of friends, the contempt of the lowly, the pity against the unfortunate, one's own danger of life, good name, and all things. The "gifts" however comprehend in themselves the profit, the advantage, the hope and the whole insatiable and immeasurable maw of avarice. Therefore, Jethro advises Moses in Exodus 18:21 to choose men who are without avarice, that is, those rare birds that are very similar to a black swan.

So you see what kind of mind he must have who is to exercise the office of a judge and the sword, namely he must overcome all emotions, fear, love, favor, mercy, avarice, hope, good reputation, life and death, and must love the simplest truth and the right judgment, because (so says Jehoshaphat, the king of Judah [2 Chron. 19, 6.]) judgment is of the Lord. For a judge inevitably incurs the hatred of many people, he must be endangered by enmity (odio) and challenged by mercy and greed, and if he does not look to God alone, he cannot overcome these impulses and stand against them. But how will he be able to look to God alone if his heart is not securely fastened by faith?

See the example of the best jurists, who speak of equity very beautifully when they teach or write publicly, but think quite differently when they teach or write to individual per

They have to give advice to others (privatim) and get into contradiction with themselves, namely, that here the reputation of the person or pity for the misfortune (to put it in the best way) turns them away from the right path, so that they make an effort to heal, as it were, and to help the helpless, which they did not do at the time when they taught publicly. And so, from passionate excitement (affectu), they do not see that they are deviating from the equity they taught publicly. There is something so difficult, rare and high about a simple and correct eye in a judge.

The same can be seen in the greatest theologians, as there are Augustine, Bernard, and in those who are older than these, Cyprian, Tertullian, and the like, who, when they treat the Scriptures publicly, interpret them purely and correctly; but when questions are put to them, they seldom stay on the right track, that they should not take something from the Scriptures and attach it to the thing or the person, and twist the words of God by force. Look at them here, where they write against Arius, Jerome against Jovinianus, Augustine against the Manichaeans, Bernard against free will, and you will see that I speak the truth. None of the saints have so completely stripped themselves of the flesh or laid aside their emotions that there is no hope left, unless both the judge and the teacher act in the fear of God and always suspect themselves of not acting rightly according to the law of God and his words. For security must not be allowed in these matters, where God's cause is being acted upon, which is exceedingly serious.

[Cap. 16, 21. 22.] You shall not plant a grove of trees 2c.

Why then does Moses include this about the outward service of God, since he had already begun to speak about the works against the neighbor? I answer: This he seems to do in the way of a repetition, that he also subjects to the punishment of the sword in this legal people, where something should be sinned against the outward service of God. This is proven by the fact that he says nothing about faith or fear.

but of the work of erecting a pillar, planting a grove or a tree by the altar of the Lord, and offering a sacrifice that has a defect [Cap. 17, l.sf. By these two pieces he shows, as by example, all sin in the outward service of God. Then he also adds an example, that a man and a woman are to be stoned, who have been convicted of having committed idolatry. By this example, he certainly applies the sword, which is already in place, to the sin that has been committed against the outward service of God, and commits it to the judge and the servant for punishment. For he reserves to himself to punish what is sinned in the heart through unbelief, as he says Cap, 18, 19. of the future prophet.

See, then, that here the public trial (forum iudicii) is instituted by God and an example of it is given. The first is when an evil happens before the eyes of the Lord [Cap. 17, 2. ff.]. But the evil in the eyes of the Lord, he explains, happens when someone transgresses the covenant of God by going and serving other gods, which God has not commanded. For he speaks (as I have said) of sin in the outward service of God, in order to show by example how in all crimes the sword should be wielded and justice executed. But he says with a significant word "wickedness in the eyes of the Lord", because there is nothing more beautiful, better and holier in the eyes of men than idolatry and godlessness, which is adorned by hypocrisy and the appearance of godliness. It is therefore an evil work in the sight of God, which is done without faith and word on our own initiative, no matter how well and excellently adorned (speciosum) it may appear. For this is his opinion (vult), since he says that they transgress his covenant and do what he has not commanded, so that you can know for certain that if anyone does something in the service of God that he has not commanded, it is evil in the sight of God, as he clearly says here, because it is necessarily done in confidence, as if they were doing something that is pleasing to God, and that they would be justified by it; otherwise they would not do what is completely against faith, against his covenant and his word.

Second. It is not enough that an evil work has been done, but it must also be announced and made known by rumor or tale, as he says here [v. 4.], "And it shall be announced unto thee." Thirdly. Even this is not enough, but it must be carefully investigated whether it is as it is reported, so that one does not freely believe any boaster. But this investigation cannot be other than by witnesses who have seen and know, so that one witness is not enough, but "on the mouth of two or three witnesses (he says v. 6) shall all things stand". And he adds, "Upon the mouth of one witness shall no man die." Fourthly. Finally, those who are convicted are to be led out and stoned. Thus you see that in the public court and in the infliction of public punishment, the crimes are to be as public as the punishment is.

From this example you can learn how many offenses are to be borne and concealed, which either you alone, or others with you know, or which the rumor has spread everywhere. At the same time, you will see how carefully God has shut the mouths of braggarts and slanderers, and the ears of those who listen to them, so that the strictness of divine law does not only protect the truly innocent, but also the guilty, as long as they are still hidden. But I call them hidden because they have not been reported to the authorities and the judge as those who should be convicted with proper witnesses. And here it is evident how diabolical a den the world is, where the good name of one's neighbor is so easily violated, and offenses that are either lied about, or are picked up by rumor and suspicion alone, are carried on publicly, so that the law of God has commanded in another place that those who accuse others of offenses that they cannot prove shall be punished no less severely. Therefore, if you alone see someone sinning, keep silent; if you hear of it, keep to yourself until the matter can be proven to the judge with certain witnesses.

Moses preferred to take the example of judgment from an offense in the service of God rather than from murder or adultery or any other crime, because this example is certain and reliable and may not be forgiven or covered up by any mercy. For to sin against the service of God is to sin against faith and the Word. Here one should have no regard for love or mercy, for by doing so one offends and loses God along with the Word, which is the guide, the light, the teaching, and the rule of the whole life and of all works; if this is lost, no work can be [rightly] done, no life [rightly] ordered. But sin against love, if only the word and doctrine remain untouched, is only a lost work, which can be restored and made good according to the rule of the word. So immeasurable is the distance between the sin against faith and the word, and the sin against love and the word. For love bears all things, endures all things [1 Cor. 13:7], but faith bears nothing, and the word endures nothing, but the word must be perfectly pure, the doctrine must always be perfectly sound, so that it may be the goal for life and for the right direction of works. Love, however, can be weak and impure, and must be increased and perfected daily. Therefore Moses, the most gentle man on earth, nevertheless killed without mercy three thousand men who had worshiped the calf, Ex. 32,<sup>1</sup>) 28, because they had sinned against the word, the light and guide of life.

V. 8-13. If a matter in court will be too hard for you 2c.

This text, too, the papists have dragged on their idol with whimsical effort in order to confirm the papacy, therefore it is necessary that we consider it a little more carefully. In the first place, Moses is not speaking here of words or doctrine, or (as they say) of the questions of faith which they want to be brought to the pope's attention, but of the judgment of public and worldly opinion.

The words clearly indicate that this crime is of a doubtful nature "between blood and blood" (i.e., death), "between trade and commerce" (i.e., theft, robbery, quarrels, and malicious words), "between harm and harm" (i.e., beating, wounds, or other violent injury to the body), where Jerome, following his dreams, translates it as "between leprosy and leprosy," thus giving our papists reason to believe that it is "my" crime, wounds, or other violent injury to the body), where Jerome, following his dreams, translated "between leprosy and leprosy," by which he gave occasion to our papists to think that Moses was also speaking of the sacred mysteries of the faith, not merely of worldly things. Now that the pope is to be a servant of the spirit and not of the letter, and is to leave these worldly matters aside, this law does not concern him at all, nor does any other law of Moses; or if it did concern anyone, it would rather concern the emperor or a king or a prince, so that, according to the example of this law, the subordinates should get the judgment from the court of the overlord in doubtful matters.

Then this law speaks of the place that God chose, namely where the tabernacle was, the outward sign of the present God. But in the New Testament there is no such place. For [John 4:21] "neither in this mountain, nor in Jerusalem," but [v. 23] "in spirit and in truth" is GOD worshipped; neither will they say [Matt. 24:23], "Behold, here is Christ, or there," for this was proper to the ancient and legal people. Therefore, the papists should first prove that Rome is the place chosen by God. When will they do that? Where is the Word? Where is the sign? There is one place that is common to all Christians, that is the spirit and the truth. This is how Christ himself explains it; in spirit and truth (he says) God is worshipped and adored. And it is in the place that the questions about faith must be resolved. In this place the pope is no more than the maid in a mill, and his decision is no more valid in this place than that of a farmer who is in the field. For faith belongs to all, and the spiritual man judges all. Now if in any place there should be more perfect Christians, of course the imperfect ones must give way to them, not for the sake of the place, but because of the perfection of the spirit, as in

1) In the issues: Lxoäi 34.

In the book of Acts [Cap. 15, 2.] those of Antioch asked for a judgment from the apostles and elders, not because of the place, as if God had chosen it, since many elders there did not have the right opinion either, Acts 15, 5. 15, 5, and the apostles did not remain there as in a permanent place, but for the sake of the more perfect spirit of the apostles.

And, provided that all this should prove nothing, and that this law of Moses should be understood by the questions concerning faith and by Rome (which is impossible), he nevertheless disgraces all their precepts with one word, since he says here [v. 11]: "According to the law which they teach you," namely, because he wanted that even these priests of works and of the law should not rely on their own spirit and make a judgment according to it, but that they should teach everything according to the law which he had prescribed. How much more, therefore, must the priests of faith and of the Gospel decide and teach everything not from their own spirit, but according to the certain word of God! But neither the pope nor the concilia have ever done this, nor do they do it now, but they decide everything out of the fullness of their presumptuous spirit. But they usually decide nothing but exceedingly foolish things, as of ceremonies, benefices, dignities and similar foolish works.

Moses therefore laid down this law for the judges and servants of whom he speaks in this chapter, that the small towns should turn to the capital in doubtful matters, and the more inexperienced to the more perfect, since it was certain that God would also direct matters there, and that there would always be such priests there who knew the law of God, which God had not granted to any other place. For it was a civil nation, therefore He also provided it with a civil place and a bodily priesthood, in which the Spirit should certainly abide, just as He certainly provided us with Christ in the faith of His flesh 1) at His right hand, that is, as the One who is everywhere present and fulfills all things [Eph. 1, 23]. Therefore it comes that the Lord answered from the mercy seat through the light, that is, by the office sign (rationale [Ex. 28, 15.]) or of the priest, as Saul complains 1 Sam. 28,<sup>2</sup>) 6. that GOD did not give him an answer, neither by the prophets nor by the light.

V. 14. ff. I will set a king over me.

As he had begun with the sovereign persons, he ends this treatise also with regard to the kings and the kingdom by saying: For this shall come to pass, that the children of Israel shall have kings. This was formerly promised to Abraham and Isaac, when the Lord said Gen. 17, 6: "Kings shall come from you" 2c. Moses therefore anticipates that they will not choose or appoint a king according to their own will and without the word of God, but that they may be sure that they have a king by the grace and will of God, he wants them to be led by the power of God and by his word, which is something very special above all the nations of the earth. For although he changes and establishes all kingdoms, and gives them to whom he wills, yet for this people in particular he adds a word in which he indicates his favor to them, so that they may know that they have the kingdom of GOD. Therefore they are punished in the [first] book of Samuelli for having sinned grievously, that they desired a king in such a way that they would put their trust in him as in a man and a human kingdom, and did not desire a king in God and according to his word, as he says there [Cap. 8, 7.]: "They have rejected me, that I should not be king over them."

After that, so that the king himself might be a godly one, Moses instructs him that he should rule in trust in God alone, knowing that he alone is appointed by his word and must be sustained by it. Therefore, he commands that he should not keep many horses, that is, that he should not trust in his force (viribus); that he should not lead the people back to Egypt, that is, that he should not rely on the favor and strength of men; that he should not gather much gold and silver,

2) In the issues: 1 lisA. psnutt.

That is, that he should not trust in riches; that he should not take many wives; that is, that his faith should not be choked with thorns, as Christ calls the cares and pleasures of this life, Luc. 8:14. For this is not his will, that he should not be well provided with horses and troops, since it is read [1 Kings. 4, 26.] that David and Solomon did the opposite; so he also does not forbid alliances and assistance from men, since Solomon had the king of Tyre and Egypt [1 Kings 5, 12.], David the kings of the Moabites and the Ammonites and the king Thoi [2 Sam. 8, 9. ff.] as confederates. It is also written [1 Kings 10:23] that Solomon had such a large amount of gold and silver, which was left to him partly by David and partly by himself, that no other king had. So also many kings had very many wives.

But therein lies the power of the commandment, that (as he says in the text) his heart is not turned away, that is, that he does not gather and procure all this for himself in order to put his trust in it. For he wants to have, as a believing people, so also a believing king, who trusts only in God and his word, therefore he takes away everything in which the people put their trust. If they did not rely on it, but used it only in faith in GOD, satisfied with His word alone, then there would be no harm, as the best, the richest and most powerful of all kings boasts, saying [Ps. 44:7]: "I do not rely on my bow, and my sword cannot help me," and again [Ps. 60:14]: "With GOD we will do deeds. He will subdue my enemies," and again [Ps. 108:11, 13], "Who will lead me to a strong city? Give us help in trouble, for the help of men is of no avail," and many such things. He does not say that he has no bow, no sword and no men, but he says that he does not trust in them. Therefore, here Moses commands that the king read the other law (Deuteronomy) so that he may learn to fear God at all times, namely, he commands him the word of faith, which, as we have seen, he presents in this book exceedingly abundantly, so that his

Let him not exalt his heart above his brethren by the abundance that comes to him, and let him not be presumptuous of his strength or riches, but let him fear the Lord, who has no pleasure in anyone's legs or in the strength of his steed [Ps. 147:10]. Again, he should not be despondent when everything is in despair and the enemies have the upper hand, that is, as he says here, he should neither turn to the left nor to the right [v. 20], but walk rightly and firmly in fortune and misfortune, in strength and weakness, in honor and disgrace, clinging faithfully and strongly to God's word alone.

The secret interpretation of the judge and the servant is the office of the law, which by its judgment condemns the ungodly. Death, the servant of the law, kills, as Paul says [1 Cor. 15:56]: "The power of sin is the law, but the sting of death is sin." The judge is righteous (integrity) and must be unbending, for the law is holy, the commandment is good, righteous and holy, and yet it is an office of death, instituted that it might kill, that it might inflict wrath, for no law is given to the righteous, just as the civil sword is not to be feared for good works, but for evil, Rom. 13:3. That gifts are taken and persons are regarded is that the office of the law is misused to establish the righteousness of works and the glory of the flesh, but not for the knowledge of sin. For this righteousness of works blinds even the wise and righteous, and deceives by its appearance and confidence, so that by this proverb [v. 19] we are taught how dangerous the law is, when it is taught to do works.

Soon after he spoke about the judges, he forbade to set up a grove and trees and pillars at the altar of the Lord, that is, not to set up righteousness and the glory of works, which God hates. Neither shall one opsern anything that has a defect, that is, his law shall not be fulfilled with works. For this means to defile the law and the intention of the law, which is to make all men guilty and to bring them to the knowledge of their sin, Rom. 7, 7. Yes, those shall be put to death without grace (rigidissime) who believe in God.

That is, through the right understanding and knowledge of the Law, the service (cultus) and the performance (studium) of works are to be condemned, by which one believes to serve God, while in truth an idol of our heart, a false delusion of God, is worshipped, who, as the Law teaches, is honored by the faith of the heart alone. That they should be convicted by witnesses means that they should be overcome by the testimony of Scripture, as Paul teaches in the letter to Titus [Cap. 1, 9.] that a bishop should be mighty in sound doctrine, that he might convict the gainsayers. Furthermore, those who do not want to abide by the judgment of the more perfect in spirit, who judge according to the law of God, as he says here, are to be killed and taken out of the remedy, that is, a heretical person is to be shunned and put under ban, and held as a pagan.

The appointment of a king actually means Christ, who comes after the judge, the law. He did not become king in his people by our election, but by God's appointment; he was also not taken from a foreign people, because he did not take the angels, but the seed of Abraham, even as we are made flesh, and became our brother, as though he were one of us [Heb. 2:16, 17]. And he did not exalt himself above his brethren, for though he was in the form of God, yet he humbled himself, and took upon him the form of a servant [Phil. 2:6 ff]. Therefore, although he has an abundance of many horses and great riches and the multitude of the people, that is, of all the fullness of spiritual wealth and spiritual powers, for in him are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge [Col. 2:3]; then also of the gold and silver of wisdom and eloquence in the Scriptures; and has many wives, that is, is great and glorious through many different churches, yet he does not trust in them, does not boast of them, but only of his God. For he is the righteous ruler among men in the fear of GOD, as David says in his last words f2 Sam. 23, 3.]. He treats this other law (Deuteronomion hoc) not only according to the letter, but also constantly according to the spirit, and has a kingdom that lives in the fear of God, which the judges and the law of death have not been able to do.

The eighteenth chapter.

V. 1-14: "The priests, the Levites of the whole tribe of Levi, shall not partake. 2c.

This chapter also belongs to the preceding one and forms, as it were, the conclusion of the speech about the provision of the ministers of the word, of whom he spoke in the 16th chapter, namely, in order to bring to a complete end what he had undertaken of both kinds of authority, both with regard to the holy one, which has to do with the word, and to the civil one, which wields the sword. He does this in such a way that at the end of this chapter he concludes everything in the future prophet who is to be raised up, who will establish a new kingdom and a new ministry, and abolish everything he has said up to now. For on this [prophet] Moses has completely and utterly

His purpose is directed to this one, who is the end of all things. Therefore, in this chapter he makes some additions to what he has said above, as it is Mosi's way that he repeats in order to add something and thus to complete the whole.

The first is that the priests do not share the land with the tribes of Israel, but are to be fed by the offerings of the Lord. He indicates what they are to receive from the sacrifices, namely the shoulder, both cheeks and the belly of every sacrificed sheep and ox, as well as the firstlings of grain, wine, oil and wool. There is no mention here of the tithes that the Levites were to receive, nor of the firstborn, because he has spoken above of these, and here he repeats only to add what they should have of the sacrifices. About the shoulder and the breast read in the third book of Moses the first three chapters 1) and in the second book of Moses Cap. 29 [V. 27.]. "Wanst" (ventriculum) he calls here either the stomach or the abdomen, namely the lowest part of the belly. I am not quite sure whether the priests should take these parts from every sacrifice, be it a sin offering or a burnt offering or a whole sacrifice. I would like to claim it of all sacrifices, except of the burnt offering, where, as it seems, the whole was burned, although this also does not completely convince me (satis permovet). But I leave this to the people who have more leisure [than I].

Secondly, what he adds about the foreign Levite, that he should be taken into the order of service in your place of the tabernacle, this also belongs to the provision of the Levites, of whom he also said above [Cap. 14, 29.], and repeats here at the end to add this, according to his way, as I have said. But one must believe that this commandment was hard for those who served in the tabernacle, that they were forced to make their portions smaller and to divide them into so many, especially if they were stingy and unbelieving. But God commanded this so that faith and love would be exercised, that they would learn to gladly share theirs, in the certain confidence that God would feed them. But there is also no doubt that this law was kept as all others, so that because of the insignificance of the portion, few or even no Levites attempted to go to the place of the tabernacle: but if some had wanted to do so out of love for the word and to learn the law, they might have had their provision here.

Thirdly, and this is the last addition to all that has been said above of the outward worship of GOD, viz.

We should beware of the abominations of the Gentiles, which he lists here in order, and enumerates nine, all of which are contrary to the right and pure worship instituted by his word. These we distinguish now, although we cannot guarantee for the Hebrew in all pieces, nevertheless as well as possible with credible conjectures in this way: The first whom Moses calls diviners, we say; and this word is not seldom taken in a good sense, as also the name prophet in a bad sense. Diviners are now those who predict the future, or interpret the Scriptures and the words of God, but according to their sense. The second XXXXXX, regarding which almost all agree, also the Jews, that they are diurnal diviners. The third XXXXXX we call: those who pay attention to the cries of birds (augures); and although they have the name of paying attention to the birds, this word also means 4 Mos. 23,<sup>2</sup>) 23. paying attention to other things, as: "There is no sorcerer in Jacob", and 1 Mos. 44, 5.: "Is it not so that my Lord used to prophesy?" The fourth XXXXXX, these, we think, are actually sorcerers and witches, Ex. 22:18: "The sorceresses thou shalt not suffer to live." The fifth XXXXXX are conjurers, to which that Psalm [Ps. 58, 6.] bears witness, which says: "Which heareth not the voice of the conjurer, who is well able to conjure." The sixth XXXX; this is the spirit of divination (Python), that spirit of which it is said in the Acts of the Apostles [Cap. 16, 16.] that he is one who reveals secret and hidden things. These are called by us in German wise men and wise women. The seventh XXXXX<sup>3</sup>); these are the soothsayers who interpret signs or base their assumptions on them. The eighth, who ask the dead, are those who consult the spirits that walk by night, which are sometimes thought to be the souls of the departed. The ninth, whom Moses puts first, who make their sons or daughters pass through the fire, that is, who give their seed to the idol Moloch, as he elsewhere

1) xsr trin xrimu oaxitulu. The word prima probably came in by mistake, for there is nothing in the first three chapters. However, the shoulder and the chest are mentioned in three successive chapters, namely Cap. 7, 30-34, Cap. 8, 29 and Cap. 9, 20. f.

[3 Mos. 18, 21.] says. All this, because they are human inventions without the word of God, shall be condemned in the people of God, whose life and works must be guided by the certain word of God.

V. 15. The Lord your God will raise up for you a prophet like me from among you and your brothers, and you shall obey him.

This is the main passage of this whole book and a very explicit prophecy of Christ, the new teacher, therefore also the apostles strongly refer to this passage; and Moses puts this saying here very appropriately at the end, where he had preached about the priesthood, about the kingdom, about the rulers and all worship, in order to show that later there would be another priesthood, another kingdom, another worship, another word, by which the whole Moses would be taken away. And here Moses clearly describes that it will come to an end with him, and cedes his mastery to the future prophet. Therefore, we want to look at his words quite carefully.

First of all, it is necessary that this prophet brings a new word, which Moses did not teach, because God promises here that he will put his words into his mouth. But if there was not another word here, it should not have been promised that it should be brought by this prophet, but it would have been sufficient to say: "He shall be your mouth", as said by Aaron in the second book of Moses Cap. 4,<sup>1</sup> ) 16. to indicate that this prophet "will teach the words of Moses and his written law". For when he says, "You shall hear him who will be raised up like me," he teaches that his word and the word of this prophet are quite different, and he confirms this by saying that the people on Mount Sinai desired such a prophet to speak to them, since they had already heard the whole law through Moses.

But there can be no other word beyond the word of Moses but the gospel, since everything that belongs to the teaching of the law.

through Moses is most perfect and abundant, so that absolutely nothing can be added. For what could be added to the holy ten commandments (to say nothing of everything else)? What can be taught more sublime than to believe in God with all one's heart, to trust Him, to love Him, to fear Him, not to tempt God 2c.? Furthermore, what can be taught that is more righteous and holy than that which Moses decrees about the outward service of God, about authority, about love for one's neighbor? Here, then, the Jews have no reason to gossip that this prophet will be one who interprets Moses. Moses explains himself in this book in such a way that another one is not necessary, nor can another one add a letter or a tittle to make it clearer or more perfect. Now, since beyond the perfect teaching of the law there can be no other word but the word of grace, it follows that this prophet will not be a teacher of the law, but a minister of grace. Thus, this text clearly forces the Jews to expect something different from this prophet than they have in Moses.

Secondly. If this new prophet did not bring up another word, Moses would not have had to compare him to himself, saying, "The LORD will raise him up like me." For all the other prophets who taught Moses, and did not bring up another word (suscitaverunt), were not like Moses, or Moses' equals, but inferior to Moses, namely, servants of the word of Moses, who taught what Moses had prescribed, so that in all this they heard not any other prophet or themselves, but Moses himself and his words. For Moses speaks in them, and he puts his words into their mouths, and they are his mouth to the people. But he does not subject himself to these prophets and put his words into their mouths, but he declares that the Lord himself, through himself, will put his words into their mouths. He says that he will be like him in the office and in the obedience that should be rendered to his words (audientia), by which he will certainly exempt him from obedience to himself [i.e. to Mo-

[it] excludes and prefers him to all the prophets who teach Moses.

But that he exempts him from obedience to Moses and prefers him to all the prophets who teach Moses, this means indeed that the office of the law is to cease and a new one is to be established, since no man is free from the service of the law, but all are subject to the law. Therefore it is necessary that this prophet be equal to Moses (according to the power to teach and to command, for this is what he wants to express when he says: "Like me"), that he be higher than Moses and teach greater things. For if he were not greater, Moses would not hand over obedience and prestige to him. But if he did not teach greater things, he would not be greater. For here he is not speaking of the equality of personal dignity between Moses and that prophet, but of the equality of authority or office. For here he is not speaking of the life, customs, or works of Moses or that prophet, but of teaching, as the text sufficiently indicates, since a prophet [has his name] from teaching and comes for the sake of teaching, and here it is commanded that he be obeyed (audientia erga eum).

Therefore, when the teaching of both is discussed, it will be easy to see from the comparison of the teaching of both what he must necessarily preach. For Moses is a servant of the law, of sin, of death, because he teaches and urges to do, and by the rays of the law makes all guilty of death, delinquent because of sin; he demands, but he does not give what he demands. But since this prophet finds Moses teaching this, and he himself is appointed teacher beside him, his word must teach something else; but he cannot teach anything else than sin, wrath and death, if he does not teach righteousness, grace and life. Therefore, he must necessarily be a teacher of life, grace and righteousness, just as Moses is a teacher of sin, wrath and death. But both are to be heard in the same way as they are awakened by God, because through the law all must be humbled, and through the gospel all are exalted. They are equal in divine

They are equal in reputation, but unequal according to the fruit of their ministry and completely opposed to each other, since the latter cancels (evacuates) the sin and wrath, which Moses arouses through his ministry, in his ministry through righteousness and grace. So this prophet does not demand anything, but gives what Moses demands.

We have therefore from this passage the two offices of the Word, which are necessary to the blessedness of the human race, the office of the law and the office of the gospel, the one to death, the other to life, and how they are alike indeed when one looks at the power, but exceedingly dissimilar when one looks at the fruit. For the office of Moses is a temporal one, which shall finally have an end by the coming of the office of Christ, as he here says, "To whom ye shall obey." But the office of Christ will come to an end through no other, since it brings eternal righteousness and puts away sin, as Dan. 9, 24. says. Therefore, the Levitical priesthood is completely abolished here and an end is put to it, because it was instituted to teach Moses. When the priesthood is ended, the law also ceases, as the author of the letter to the Hebrews says: "Where the priesthood is changed, the law must also be changed." Thus, no one else can be the prophet here but Christ Himself.

From all this it follows how completely improper, even corrupt teachers are in the New Testament, who torment the consciences with laws and works, since this prophecy of Christ completely destroys and abolishes this office. Furthermore, they are even more harmful who burden the whole world with their statutes and human laws. For if the office of this new prophet does not suffer the office 1) of the law of Moses, which is after all divine, how will he in his kingdom suffer the laws of men? so that you can see that by this One Text the whole disorderly being (chaos) of the papist tyranny with its monks is overthrown.

But here you will say: But one finds everywhere in the Gospel and in the epistles of the Apostle commandments, so either this prophet will not be our Christ, or his teaching will not differ in anything from the law of Moses. The answer to this is brief: The commandments of the New Testament are given for the justified and the new men in the spirit. For nothing is taught or commanded there that does not concern only the faithful, who do everything voluntarily, not out of necessity or against their will. But the law is given for the old man, who is dead in sins, to press upon him and show him his sin. For this is what it really means to teach the law. For this reason man is not only unwilling but also unable to do what the law requires, as he says here in the text that the people refused on the day of the assembly and could not hear the voice of the law; therefore they demanded another teacher who spoke the word to them, which they could bear.

Therefore, the understanding of this matter lies in the knowledge and the right distinction of the law and the gospel, so that you know that the teaching of the law is only the one that commands what the ungodly and lost people should do, as it says in 1 Tim. 1, 9: "No law is given to the righteous, but to the ungodly" 2c. But where there are godly people, the law has already been abolished, which only dealt with humiliating the ungodly through the knowledge of their sin and their inability<sup>1</sup>). But the teaching of the gospel is the one that teaches where you can receive that from which you can fulfill the law, and in this respect it does not command anything, nor does it urge the spirit, which runs by itself, having become willing through faith. The gospel, however, adds some laws, but only because of the remnants of the old man in the flesh, so that this may be killed, which has not yet become righteous; from these laws, however, the spirit for its part is free, which alone has a sufficiency in faith. We have spoken abundantly of this elsewhere.

Now let us look at the words. "A prophet from your people and from your

The Lord shall raise up unto thee brethren like unto me, and thou shalt hear him. Here he prophesies that Christ will be a true man and from the blood of the Jews, because salvation comes from the Jews, Joh. 4, 22. But so far no one has appeared from this people who has taught a different word than Moses and has established a new ministry, but only this our Christ. As many prophets as there were before him, they all kept and taught Moses. But this Christ delivered not only the Jews, but also all the Gentiles in the whole world from Moses, and gave the new word of the gospel. Since he came from the Jews, as both Gentiles and Jews testify, this fact proves that he is the one Moses is talking about here and that this prophecy is fulfilled in him.

V. 16. As you were asked by the Lord your God to host in Horeb 2c.

In the second book of Moses Cap. 20 we do not read anything about this request, so why does Moses speak like this? Moses concludes from the words of the people that this request was in them, because they say: "I do not want to hear the voice of the Lord my God anymore, and I do not want to see this great fire anymore, so that I will not die" [2 Mos. 20, 19. 5 Mos. 5, 25.] From these words, I say, not how they read, but according to what they mean, he takes this, because he looks at their innermost heart opinion and at the main point of their desire. For they were so moved by the terror of the voice, that with the greatest desire of their hearts they longed for a softer and more sweet word. For the death threatened them by the voice of the law compelled them to sigh for life and the word of blessedness, and in such fear they desire more than they should have dared to ask for another word. But GOD, who searches the depths of the heart, does not hear and answer according to the words sounded by rote, but according to the desire glowing within, just as Christ in the Gospel [Luc. 19, 2. ff.] looked at Zacchaeus, not according to what he spoke by rote, but according to the desire of his heart. For even Zacchaeus would not have dared to ask by heart that

1) We have followed the reading of the Wittenberg: [Mt instead of: "Kit in der Erlanger.

Christ was to enter his house, -and yet he inwardly desired nothing more. Therefore he received him with joy, because his desire was fulfilled, which he had hardly felt before.

Moses therefore shows in this passage with what ardor and heat of heart one must desire the word of grace, since it is the gift of God, of which especially the word of Paul is understood, since he says in the letter to the Ephesians Cap. 3, 20, that God gives us and does above all that we ask or understand. For he hates the indolent and cold prayers (petitores), who hope to obtain it by many words, but he wants to have inexpressible groaning, which certainly those cannot have who spend their days in good living, and dwell in the land of those who lead a gentle life, but those, who are brought to despair by the sensation of death and the bite of sin, so that they, too, with the people of Israel, refuse to hear the voice of God any longer and to feast on the exceedingly great fire, that is, the power of the law and the sting of sin, that is, death and God's wrath, which, as it were, is already consuming them like a fire, so that they desire to hear the word of life.

And notice how beautifully Moses cedes his office to the future prophet. For he says that the people asked that another prophet be awakened, while they asked in Exodus 20:19 that Moses himself should speak to them, but said nothing about another being awakened besides Moses. By this speech Moses shows that the people were afraid and did not know what to ask or how to ask. For it was foolish to ask them to listen to Moses, since Moses was not allowed to teach or let them hear (sonare) anything other than what they themselves heard on your mountain, that is, the law. For so frightened and fearful people are wont to ask what they know not, as Paul Rom. 8, 26. says: "We know not what we ought to pray, or how we ought to pray, but the Holy Ghost representeth the saints" 2c. Therefore Moses also interprets their request here according to their desire, as if to say: You asked foolishly that I might speak to you, since you were afraid.

to hear that voice on the mountain, because this is constantly the voice of my ministry, but God, who looks at your heart, has seen that you do not ask for me, but for another who speaks more sweetly than I, and since he hears this prayer of yours, he will give you such a prophet as you want.

But what kind of one do you want? Certainly one who heals those who are crushed by my voice, that is, by the law of sin and wrath, who heals those who are brokenhearted, who loosens and comforts the frightened and contrite. With what medicine? Certainly by the word of life and salvation, so that the voice of those who proclaim peace, who preach good on the mountains [Isa. 52:7] may be heard, that he is the one of whom Malachi [Cap. 3:1.] foretold, "And soon shall come to his holy temple the angel of the covenant which ye desire," and after him Isaias [Cap. 61, 1. 2.], "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me; therefore hath he anointed me, and hath sent me to preach to the miserable, to heal the brokenhearted, to preach a gracious year of the Lord." For such a one (he says) thou didst ask in Horeb, when thou didst ask me foolishly; such a one shall the LORD give thee in my stead. See thou that thou hear him instead of me. This one I will give way to, because you cannot bear me and have asked that I be silenced and cut off.

V. 18. I will put my words into his mouth.

This also clearly proves that this prophet will teach something else, since he has not yet given such words in Mose's mouth, nor has he commanded him to do so, but he promises that he will give and command them in the future. Therefore, this word must be different from the word of the law, which he had already given and commanded in Mose's mouth in an exceedingly abundant and most perfect way, so very powerful that it drove those who were already frightened to death and despair by its power. For in vain would he have promised that it should still be given and commanded, if he had already given and commanded it into the mouth of Moses. Since the future prophet would teach something else it is necessary that his word is not a word of the law, which kills and frightens, but which makes alive and comforts. Thus we see that the prophets were instructed by this passage, where they prophesy of another covenant, another word, a future priesthood, as Jeremiah [Cap. 31, 31. f.]: "Behold, the time cometh, when I will make a covenant, not as the covenant was" 2c., and Ps. 110, 4.: "Thou art a priest for ever", and Isa. 2, 3.: "The word of the LORD shall go forth from Zion" 2c.

V.19. And whoever will not hear my words 2c., of him I will require it.

By this word he abolishes the whole civil authority, which was taught in Moses until now, because he had appointed the sword and the judges to preserve and administer the law of Moses. But here, where he institutes a new word, he ordains no sword, no judge, but threatens that it will be he himself who avenges, as he also says in the prophet Micah, Cap. 5,<sup>1</sup> ) 14: "I will execute vengeance with fury and wrath on all the heathen who will not obey." For since this is the sermon to life and salvation, no one shall be forced to it by human force, since God requires a willing heart that believes. But since this can neither be accomplished nor forced by human power, one must leave those to God's judgment alone who do not want to believe, because He Himself has already condemned them, since He says [John 3:18], "He who does not believe is already judged," and here: "From him I will require it."

From this you see how mad the bishops and princes are today, who force the heretics or the godless to believe by force, and kill and burn those who do not want to be forced. They certainly arrogate to themselves the judgment that God claims for Himself, and force where no one can be forced, and demand what neither they nor any man can provide. But by doing this, they show how they do not understand Christ and his word at all, nor do they see what Moses said here.

teach. For since they make of the Christian nature a kind of outward appearance, that they think that those believe who outwardly confess the name of Christ out of fear of punishment or disgrace, and do not pay attention to the fact that this thing belongs to the spirit alone and is completely free of men, they are soon forced to subject it to the sword and to judgment, since every outward law and outward worship (religio) necessarily requires worldly (profanis) judges, as we have also seen in the law of Moses. Thus it happened that they made a law out of the word, works out of faith, and an outward appearance out of truth; therefore they were forced to use the sword at last.

With the same madness, but under a different semblance, our new prophets, who, possessed by vain honor, wanted to teach better and higher things than the word of life, which Christ restored to us anew in our time, are brought by the spirit of the devil to ridicule that they should be taught by us about faith and love. But they have invented a new kind of spirit instead of the word, new, vain words with which they beguile the common people. And so that we may avoid their poison, since they are doing their business (currunt) in our time, let us briefly touch on their foolishness, to remind the godly not to be seduced by their splendid words. To make these things easier to understand, let us first present our doctrine (nostra). For this is how we teach and hold, and with truth:

First and foremost, the prophet must be heard, of whom Moses says here, that is, our salvation does not begin with any work that is ours, but with the hearing of the word of life, since the law also precedes for its own sake, so that it may humble and show sin, and teach us that we are not able to do anything with our strength, Rom. 4, 15: "The law only causes wrath," to such an extent that the people not only do not do the law, but furthermore do not even want to hear it, since it kills them, and therefore ask for another word, which is

But when one hears the word, the Holy Spirit is given, who purifies the heart through faith [Acts 15:9]. Rom. 10, 17: "Faith comes from preaching", not in all who hear, but in those whom God wills. For the wind blows where it wills, John 3:8, not where we will. But when we have received the Holy Spirit through faith, we are immediately justified by that very faith, without any work that we do, but by God's gift alone, and feel peace and a good conscience toward God, Rom. 5:1, and cheerfully and surely cry, Abba, dear Father. Now there is no longer fear or a servile fleeing from the wrath of God, but a childlike access to God through the grace in which we stand and boast, Rom. 5, 2.

But when the heart is justified and satisfied inwardly by faith in the spirit in this way, then one soon goes outwardly in various ways. First, confession of salvation is made with the mouth, and the word is preached by heart by which we have been saved inwardly, so that others may also be saved through us, just as we are saved through those who were before us, so that the kingdom of Christ may be increased. Here persecution, cross and tribulation arise for the sake of the word in the world, which hates light and life because it loves darkness. This is how faith is proven and perfected into the perfect hope that makes us certain of our blessedness. Secondly, our old man is attacked, in whom are the remnants of sin, which by their law in the members fight against the spirit, so that we do not do what the spirit wants. Here the killing of the flesh is done. Thirdly, good works come forth as fruits as witnesses of faith and of the Spirit towards the neighbor in love, kindness, peace, goodness 2c., Gal. 5, 22. This is the brief epitome and the right order of the Christian life, which depends on and begins with the word and extends to the works of love towards the neighbor. This order let these new prophets and proceed in this way: First, they take the killing. This they divide into many stages or pounds (pondera),<sup>1</sup> ) which they call by different names, such as, one consists in the desolation, another in the astonishment, another in the discipline, another in the boredom, another in the emptying of the creature, and, they admit no one to righteousness until he has progressed through these stages to perfect death; then they are filled with the Holy Spirit, so that they are able to do everything, know everything, want everything. For it is not from the preaching of the Word, which they boastfully despise, but from the killing that the Spirit comes to them. For they are offended to see that the righteous and godly still have to deal with the remnants of sin. Therefore they call them hypocrites and those who pretend to believe and steal from the syllables of the Scriptures, not drawing from the Spirit. But they are without any remnant of sin, therefore they have true faith from the Spirit.

So you see here quite obviously the devil, who blinds them, that they start from the death, which must follow the word and the faith and the spirit, and stop with the spirit, which must precede everything, and bring about a whole new appearance (larvam) of works under the name "death". Meanwhile they despise the word itself, so that they set up nothing but an outward appearance and teach in a new way that righteousness is brought about by our powers, namely such a righteousness that is completely without remnants of sin, which is impossible in this life, Rom. 7. But in doing so, these people who boast of the Spirit and of complete (purissimae) mortification and of the purest righteousness are not only full of all vices, but also possessed to an irreconcilable frenzy. For not easily will you ever see greater pride, greater arrogance, presumption, envy, hatred, anger, impatience, avarice, faintheartedness (when things do not go well), boldness, and the like.

(if it succeeds), then also unreliability. 1) Yes, of course, so they kill themselves, so they degrade themselves (deterunt crassities suas)! Truly, by these pounds they are rather weighed down by the devil than honored by God. 2)

Then, because they raise this confused and undigested appearance of outward killing and righteousness, they are forced to use the sword as well in order to practice and maintain it, as is the custom with all outward laws. And as their killing and their justice are confused and wrong, so there is nothing but confusion (confusum chaos) in their use of the sword. For not to the lawful authority, but to the common rabble against the lawful authority, they hand it over to slay all the wicked (that is, those who do not hold with their wisdom), so that their sect is not to be condemned both because of its foolishness and imprudence and because of its manifest rage and frenzy, for it is the devil who in this way avenges himself on the word that rises again and flourishes again.

Let us therefore leave aside these prophets, who have been refuted enough and above enough by their obvious frenzy, and remain in the pure doctrine and knowledge of Christ, knowing that the sum of our religion is faith in the Spirit, which is given through the Word; then that sin still remains in the flesh, which must be swept out, and that a death is not required which is perfectly accomplished, but which is to be perfectly accomplished. Therefore one must also bear in love, but not condemn those who are still weak in faith and life, Rom. 15, 1. This is the highest praise and the first law among Christians who are already righteous, as Paul says [Gal. 6, 2.]: "Bear one another's burdens, and you will fulfill the law of Christ." Therefore we must be careful with the utmost diligence that we do not ascribe righteousness to any work, but leave it to faith alone in the heart, according to the words Rom. 10, 10:

"If one believes from the heart, one is justified"; again, that we do not nourish a drowsy faith that neglects mortification, that is, we are to practice mortification in such a way that we do not think that, when it is done, righteousness or the Spirit will be obtained thereby, as these prophets race, nor even that, when it is omitted, less the Spirit and righteousness will be brought through the Word.

This purity of the knowledge of Christ is, of course, very tender and small (rara) even among holy and spiritual people, for the appearance of works and the wickedness of the unsaved flesh is so detrimental that even the best people are more and more likely to be driven to kill their flesh and do works, than to press on to the word and obtain faith and the Spirit, as if faith and the Spirit came through works and death, whereas, on the contrary, death and works come both from the Spirit and from faith, but the Spirit and faith come only from the word of life. For this also is a gross wickedness of the flesh, which must be killed with all diligence, that it makes works and death so great and esteems them highly that it does not see the power of the word, which is mighty through the power of God to save the faithful [Rom. 1:16], and often deceives great men. Let this be enough of the false prophets, that a godly man beware of them and keep the unadulterated (sanum) and pure word of GOD. It follows:

V. 20. When a prophet is presumptuous 2c.

"There must be trouble" [Matth. 18, 7], and with the true and unadulterated word of God false teachers always mix in, as Peter and Paul testify after Christ: "There will be false teachers among you, just as there were false prophets among the people", 2 Petr. 2,<sup>3</sup> ) 1, and: "After my departure there will be abominable wolves among you", Apost. 20, 29. For the devil does not sleep, but when people sleep, he sows tares among the good seed. Moses also reminds us of the danger, that we are sure it will happen that besides the word of truth godless people, inflamed by the vain honor of being teachers [Jac. 3, 1.], want to be regarded for teaching new and better things, as also our prophets do, of whom we have just spoken. Therefore he says here: "Whoever is presumptuous to speak in my name, which I have not commanded him to speak," namely, that only iniquity and presumption drives them to speak without God's command.

But he indicates two kinds of prophets who stand up against the right doctrine, the one coming in the name of the Lord, the other in the name of foreign gods. Those who come in the name of the Lord are the ones who preach the word of God and use the holy scriptures, because God speaks in them and God's name is in them, since he gave them himself. These were to be most prevalent (erant futuri) in the time of Christ among the Jews, where they used the holy Scriptures as the word of God against the Gospel, for the righteousness of the Law, and after them among the heretics. Those who come in the name of other gods are those who come without Scripture and the Word of God, but pretend to have their own spirit, like the Manichaeans and after them the pope and all those who corrupt the people with human statutes, among whom also our prophets are to be counted, who keep falling down from heaven and want us to believe their spirit, even if it speaks without Scripture.

V. 21. But whether you would say in your heart 2c.

I have said above in the thirteenth chapter how these two things agree with each other, that there he said: even if the sign comes, which a false prophet has predicted, one should not believe him, but here he says: if it does not come, then it is a sign that he is false, namely, there are two kinds of teachings; the one that is already accepted and confirmed by divine power or miracles. Against this kind one should not allow any miracles, not even an angel from heaven. For by these miracles we are tempted, as he said above [Cap. 13, 3. 1 above, as is shown by that prophet

1 Kings 13:1 ff, who was confirmed against the altar at Bethel even by two miracles, and yet, when he was tempted by another prophet, he fell and died, slain by a lion. Thus Paul proclaimed beforehand [2 Thess. 2, 9. ff.] as Christ did [Matth. 24, 24.] that signs and lying miracles would come against the truth, so that the unbelievers would be deceived. Thus the devil, in order to destroy the faith, performed many signs during the pilgrimages (visitationibus) to the saints, with apparitions of spirits and the like.

The other [kind of teaching] is that which is yet to be accepted. Here one does not have to believe unless signs occur, because God has never spoken a new word without confirming it with signs, as He confirmed the Law of Moses with the greatest signs, the Gospel also with exceedingly great and almost constant ones, since it was accepted first. Therefore, when a new doctrine comes, one must postpone his approval until signs are performed. If we do this, then God is faithful, who does not allow them to do signs. But if we do not, he justly permits signs to be done, so that we may be deceived and perish.

This is what I did to my raging prophets; since they boasted that their spirit was as great as we know that the apostle's spirit was not, namely, that they talked with God himself, like Moses, face to face every day, I told them to perform miracles, otherwise they would not be worthy of faith. They have certainly promised to do so, but I do not see or hear anything yet. Yes, in spite of this I have said and still say: My God will see to it that your God does not perform signs and wonders. 1)

But these miracles deceive inexperienced people, because they do not pay attention to them, or because they do not know how great the power and the strength of the devil is, with how great a deception he can bring it about that you think you are blind in one eye, wounded in the thigh or another limb, or sick in the whole body, when in fact you are blind in one eye, wounded in the thigh or another limb, or sick in the whole body.

1) Cf. the table speeches of Cordatus No. 128. Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. XXII, 1822.

But after that, if you vow something or call upon some saint, he subsides, so that health returns. Then it is thought that this happens by the merit of the saints and by divine power. Thus, he can keep one who is [apparently] suffocated in water alive for a few hours without perceptible breath and sensation, since nothing is easier for him than to deceive the senses.

In all these things one must not look both at the miracles and at the cause of them. If it is a matter of works and outward appearances that these are to be proved, it is the devil. But in matters of word and faith, he does not play with miracles in such a way, because he hates the word of faith. Even if something true happens, so that it is a real disease and a real health, one should not give greater credence to it, because the miracle worker knows the powers of the body and the properties of the herbs and all healing and all harmful things, which he sometimes uses at his discretion, sometimes keeps away, as he does through the witches, who injure the bodies of those who hate them, sometimes even kill them, but also make the injured healthy again 2c.

This is enough from the prophets. The secret interpretation of the fact that the Levites among the children of Israel possess nothing is that the servants of the Word should not involve themselves in the business of food, and abstain from all things, so that they may please the Lord, who is their inheritance. That is, the word is their possession and their riches, with which they may please God.

To serve and preserve the people, that they may inherit the land of promise, that is, the blessedness of souls. The priests' right to the sacrifices, namely the shoulder, the cheeks, the belly and the firstfruits, means the same thing, that they are in the practice (usu) and service of the word. With their arms they are to be strong in their work, and with their cheeks they are to bite and crush the wicked, with punishments, with reproaches, with fervent supplications. But with the strongest part they should take care of the weak and carry them; but the firstfruits they should use, teaching that everything must be attributed to the grace of God, not to our strength.

But the soothsayers and the whole array of abominations, which Moses lists here, mean the godless teachers, who prophesy out of their heads what God has not commanded them, and burden the consciences with certain days, certain works, certain places, certain persons. Therefore they deceive the consciences with deceptive and apparent opinions and empty words, not unlike the sorcerers and conjurers who blind the eyes with their dazzling work, so that they think they feel or see something where they neither feel nor see anything. Paul calls such people Eph. 4, 14 and they are actually represented by these deceivers and sorcerers. They also make their children pass through the fire, that is, they inflame and corrupt the people through a false zeal in godliness, as this can be easily applied and understood.

The nineteenth chapter.

V. 1-4. When the LORD your God has cut off the nations 2c.

After the provisions on worship and authority are completed, Moses continues with the second part of the Law, namely love, which is contained in the second tablet. Therefore, this whole chapter is about of the death stroke and of the avarice, how an accidental death stroke should be forgiven, but a deliberate one should be punished. Then he decrees by a general judgment that every injustice shall be avenged by equal punishment (talionis lege). For love demands that public peace be maintained, but when the

If the evil are not kept in check, peace cannot exist. Therefore, it is the duty of love to administer the laws strictly and without mercy, to take vengeance on the wicked, so that the good and godly may be preserved. Again, it is the business of love that the severity of the law be mitigated by equity, that he may obtain mercy who, though he resembles a wicked and harmful man, yet is neither wicked nor harmful because he has done it contrary to his will and unwillingly. Therefore, three cities are commanded to be set apart as a refuge for people who have unintentionally committed a death.

V. 4-7. if someone strikes his neighbor, not intentionally 2c.

He explains with an example how he wants to understand the unintentional death stroke, which is crasso enough, namely, if someone handles something else, as if he chops wood, and leads him the iron from the handle and slays the neighbor. Here you see quite beautifully how God requires fairness in the laws, how he wants people to judge not only according to their deeds, but also according to their will. For this example must be applied to all laws in general, so that in everything that may be sinned against, it is the heart rather than the hand of the sinner that is considered, as Moses here expressly declares that he who has not killed someone out of hatred, but by chance, without his will, is not guilty of manslaughter. But this attitude (animus) must be proved by certain signs and circumstances, so that no one may say after such an event: I did not do it with will. Therefore, Moses sets the example of the iron falling from the handle and clearly states the circumstance that proves that the man who killed him was busy with something else and did the work of killing against his will. In the same way, if someone knocks out another's eye out of carelessness, either with his fist or with a stone, but by all means with something else than wanting to knock out his eye, he is not guilty of this wrong. Likewise, if he has

I was an eyewitness (vidi factum) that one brother pierced and killed another with his sword because he wanted to stab the wild boar that had his brother under him. For so it is in this life that everyone must expect danger from his neighbor. For whoever wants to live among people (societate communi), and enjoy peace, security, protection, and make use of all rights, advantages and goods, must also bear the dangers, damages and disadvantages, and all dangers, however they may happen. Thus the jurists say: one citizen owes another a fire, that is, if someone wants to be a citizen, he must stand with his neighbor in danger of conflagration or some other danger.

V. 8. 9. And if the LORD thy God shall enlarge thy border 2c. If you will keep all these commandments 2c.

You see that it is quite different with the legal promises for the temporal kingdom than with the promises of grace or the spiritual promises. For the legal promises are based on the will and merit of men, as he says here, "If thou shalt keep otherwise." Therefore they are not fixed nor everlasting, because no merits of men endure (permanently), just as neither do men themselves, however holy they may be. But the spiritual promises, regardless of merit, are based solely on the eternal mercy of God, which is given freely by grace, for "it is not up to anyone's willing or running, but up to God's mercy" [Rom. 9:16]. Therefore, in those [legal promises] free will prevails, indeed, it corrupts and ruins everything. In these, however, grace and the Spirit reign and sustain.

V. 10. So that innocent blood will not be shed.

You see that a death stroke that is not premeditated is declared by GOD Himself to be one that has no guilt (innoxium), as He also said shortly before [v. 6.], "That he does not strike the soul of him in whom there is no judgment of death, because he did not bear hatred to him before." See the heart, which is not guilty of hatred, makes that the deed also does not have the guilt of the death blow. That is why he wants to have many cities for refuge, because in a large nation there are many dangers that one suffers from the other.

And it is to be noted that the word where he says [v. 6. Vulg.], "Lest he that is nearest to him that is slain pursue him, and smite the soul of him that is not guilty of death," is by no means to be understood as if that avenger, if he be a private man (privata manu), should or may kill the slayer of death, as the text seems to read to seditious people, but that, taking up the cause of him that is slain, the judges by lawful witnesses should settle the matter. Because this is done at his instigation and urging, it is said that he does it, according to the word [of the jurists]:. What others, prompted by us, do, 2) it is rightly said that we have done it. For no man is allowed to avenge himself, but: "Mine is the vengeance", says God [Deut. 32, 35]. That is why he has appointed judges and authorities.

V. 11-13. But if anyone bears hatred against his neighbor 2c.

Here also thou seest that vengeance is commanded to the authorities, for he saith [v. 12.], "Let the elders of his city send and fetch him thence," and yet, as if the avenger himself should do it, he immediately adds, "And let him deliver him into the hands of the neighbor or avenger," not as if he himself, as a private person, should strike him with the sword, but should convict him of his guilt in court, and put him to death. Yea, even as if the whole people should do this, he says [v. 13. Vulg.], "Thou shalt not have mercy upon him, and shalt put to death the innocent blood of Israel." So it only remains that those rights and the Public executions of rights are indeed ordered to the people, but to such a people, which is provided with sovereign persons and judges, who, if the avenger accuses and the witnesses prove it, judge and kill according to the law with just judgment.

But he wants them to have no mercy on a deliberate death-beater, because he has sinned out of malice and disturbed the public peace. And by this example you see that the liberties of the Oerter, which are with us instead of the cities of refuge, are only to benefit the innocent, but to benefit the guilty nothing. For so he also commands in Exodus 21:<sup>2</sup>, 14, that one should seize a deliberate killer and even tear him away from the altar of the Lord and put him to death. Nowadays, however, these sanctuaries (immunitates) serve completely without distinction and mostly only the guilty as a place of refuge, and protect public injustice, perhaps after the example of Romulus, the father of the Romans, who first made Rome a protector (patronam) for the robbers through the sanctuary.

V. 14. You shall not push back your neighbor's boundary.

An excellent passage against avarice and tyranny, for the sake of which not infrequently even death is committed in order to be able to take the borders. Therefore, it is the duty of the authorities to ensure that one citizen is safe from the other with regard to his inheritance. Especially in this people of Israel this was necessary, where he wanted that the hereditary estates should not be mixed with each other.

V. 15-18. Let no single witness appear against anyone 2c.

So he also said above in chapter 17, v. 6: "On the mouth of a witness no one shall die. These are beautiful sayings (gnomae), worthy that they would often be in everyone's mouth, because Christ also cites this saying more than once [Matth. 18, 16. Joh. 8, 17.]: "All things shall stand on the mouth of two or three witnesses." But how, if both witnesses say the untruth (falsum), which is shall the judge then do? The answer to this is: If he knows that they speak falsehood, he shall not judge; but if he does not know, he shall judge according to the testimony of the witnesses. For this is enforced by the order of the court instituted by God, who commands that two witnesses be believed. God will see to it that he repays those witnesses in kind, and they may see to it that they answer to God for having abused his order and reputation to the destruction of their neighbor. Such false witnesses arose against Naboth, the Jezreelite [1 Kings 21:13], against Christ [Matthew 26:60] and Stephen [Acts 6:13]. And whoever perishes in this way must consider his misfortune as such, as we have said above, that one citizen must expect it from another, as there is conflagration, pestilence, contagious disease, war, wounds and all kinds of other damages. For just as one must suffer the danger of conflagration from one's neighbor, so also false witness and all other troubles.

V. 19: Do to him as he would have done to his brother.

Here you have an obvious and clear text that the attempt (conatus) should be punished, even if it does not come to the execution of the deed, because he orders to kill the witness, and without mercy to take soul by soul from the one who has given false testimony against a soul. For this reason, he immediately adds the law of retaliation (legem talionis), that one should do to the one who bears false witness as he himself wanted to do, so that one can also say here: There is no fairer law than that those who plot to put someone to death (necis artifices) perish by their own plot. For in this way "tooth for tooth, eye for eye" 2c. is understood not only of the completed deed, but also of the enterprise of the attempt.

But here is a question left, which concerns the innocent and unintentional death-beater. If he is innocent, why is he subjected to such a punishment that he is killed?

is forced to live outside his city in the city of refuge as an exile until the high priest dies? Furthermore, if he is found outside the border of the city of refuge and is killed, it is determined that the avenger of blood [if he slays him] is not guilty of blood, as is written in the fourth book of Moses Cap. 35, 27. is written? The answer to this is: Just as he who is killed by chance is forced, together with his own, to suffer this evil from his neighbors and those with whom he lives in a civil way, as I have said, so also he must bear his banishment according to the same right as an evil that befalls him because he has neighbors (ex vicinitate). The law, however, makes such a strict provision about this, in order to deter the more from the intentional death blow, and in order to compensate and make up for the damage, although it was not inflicted with will, but is nevertheless difficult to bear for the friends (molestam), in some way, as it were<sup>1</sup> ) by an opposite damage.

To kill one's neighbor means to corrupt one's soul and deceive one's conscience with the word of doctrine. If this happens without intention, that is, if the word is not acted upon according to its right meaning, as the fathers are sometimes wont to do, since they have made Peter out of the rock (petra), Christ, or have taught the works too much and have drawn the words of faith carelessly (imprudensius) on the outward appearance, as if they had rules, As they have established rules how to live, certain orders of fasting, feasts and other ceremonies, they have indeed killed souls as far as the deed is concerned, but they did not intend to kill, but the fate and the harm (casus) of human nature, which is blind and imperfect in faith, has brought them down. They are given a free city, the promise of salvation, namely the word: "Forgive".

1) Instead of v[1 nt in the Jena and the Erlangen habe" we assumed with the Wittenberg velut.

our guilt", and their weakness is borne until the priest dies, that is, until they realize in fuller faith that it is Christ who by his death destroys all sins and makes us free. For by this consciousness we are all obtained to know that all sins, whether committed in ignorance or in weakness, are remitted in Christ, if we flee to him and ask that they may be forgiven us.

But he who in ardent hatred knowingly kills someone will be killed without mercy. These are the heretics who, on Satan's impulse, deal with seducing souls, luring them into their sects, tearing them away from Christ and the pure word, even delighting and boasting in the multitude of those who are lost and cling to them. Therefore they do not deserve grace, nor do they have forgiveness of sin, since they are condemned by their own judgment, Titus 3:11, and commit a sin unto death, which, as it is not borne, so it is not forgiven. For it is blasphemy against the Holy Spirit, for which one should not ask, as John says [1 Ep. 5:16].

Not that one should not ask for any sin, but that one should not ask God not to count it as sin or to accept it as righteousness, as Moses asks in the fourth book Cap. 16, 15, that God should not turn to their sacrifice, that is, that he should count it as sin, as it is in fact sin, because they do not count it as sin, but praise it as righteousness. Otherwise, we are asked for all sin that we recognize, and so it is not imputed, even if it should continue, as the remnants of sin are in the flesh, Gal. 5:17 ff. For this is the opinion of John, since he does not want one to pray for a sin to death, that is, he does not want it to be considered a sin that is not imputed, or not a sin, as he wants it to be considered of all sins that we recognize and confess. For if one prays for such a sin, that it may not be counted as sin, that is, to ask that its heresy and ungodly nature may not displease God, or that he is a god, pleasing to the ungodly being, against the 5th Psalm, v. 5.

That one should not push back the limits set by the forefathers [v. 14], that is, that one should not add anything to the doctrine handed down by the apostles, as if one could thereby better counsel the matters of conscience. And this passage the sophists and the bishops raise high for themselves, crying out for their statutes and customs: one should not move the boundaries which the fathers have set. But by fathers they mean their bishops and teachers, but not the apostles. Thus they justify (stabilize) their fables with a figurative speech, not seeing how they themselves are the first, and only of all (even if the spiritual interpretation would hold), who move the limits, not only of faith and spirit, which are set by the forefathers, the apostles and Christ, in the Gospel, but also their own, which are set by their predecessors and by themselves, since that is their only endeavor, that they change and heap laws with laws, and, as that one says, establish laws and repeal them again for money, so that one sees that they have the legislation instead of a game and the dice, in order to play their game with it in the consciences of men; and yet they hold against others that they should not transgress the limits which the forefathers have set.

The law of retaliation: "An eye for an eye" 2c., means that the false teachers will be punished by God, just as they themselves have done harm, so that they will be killed if they have killed; if they have harmed and made people weak in faith or works and have not taught the pure word, they themselves shall also receive again from God according to the same measure, as Paul says in the letter to the Romans Cap. 14, 1) 15. that they sin against Christ by corrupting the weak, for whose sake Christ died. Thus the false witnesses who bear witness against their neighbor are those who make a conscience of sin and death where it is not, so that they kill the souls that do not die, and

| Make alive those who do not live. These then shall be carefully searched out [v. 18], and done to them as they thought to be done, that is, by the word of Scripture they shall be overcome and condemned, that is, by the word they shall be condemned to eternal damnation. | They will be judged if they do not repent, and it will be proven to them that what they have taught is false. Thus they are killed and condemned by the spirit of the mouth of Christ, that they may live if they will, or perish eternally with their doctrine. |

The twentieth chapter.

V. 1. ff. When you go to war against your enemies 2c.

Moses still remains with the matter of the death stroke up to the 23rd chapter. Therefore, so that everything in this people would be guided by a certain word, he also gives them a law for war, which is truly very beautiful and would have always given them the most glorious victory (victoriosissimam), if they had kept it. For as often as the Jews have been defeated, they have suffered this because they did not keep this law, since it was impossible that they could have been defeated if they made war according to this law. First, he takes away their confidence in their weapons and power, lest they should think that it was they who were victorious and triumphant, and lays an insurmountable foundation and constant strength of victory, namely, a word of glorious promise and faith, saying, "Fear them not, for the LORD your GOD is with you." He then commands that this word be preached and inculcated by the priest before the battle, saying, "Israel, listen. You are going to battle today against your enemies; do not let your hearts be troubled, do not be afraid, do not be terrified, and do not be afraid of them; for the LORD your God is going with you to fight for you with your enemies to help you." Dear one, what wonder is it if a people armed with such promises, even without weapons, defeated and beat not only their enemies, but even the whole world? What walls, what weapons, what power, what multitude could resist those for whom the Lord contends? Are not the Egyptians in the

The people of the Red Sea realized this when they said [Ex. 14:25], "Let us flee from Israel; the Lord is fighting against us on their behalf"? From this came the defiant boast [Ps. 44, 7.]: "I do not rely on my bow, and my sword cannot help me", and again [Ps. 147, 10.]: "The LORD does not delight in a man's legs, nor in the strength of his steed", and [Ps. 33, 17. 16.], "Horses do not help, and a mighty man is not saved by his great strength," and [Ps. 144, 1. 10.], "Blessed be the LORD, who teaches my hands to fight, and my fists to war, for he gives victory to kings." So says Jonathan the son of Saul [1 Sam. 14, 6.], "It is not hard for the LORD to help by much or little." Hence it is taught that the wars of this people should be waged by faith in the word of GOD. For by faith David slew Goliath, and obtained all his victories. But as often as they have made war without faith alone, with their great numbers and power, they have been defeated. Secondly. He clothed those who were thus armed with the word of God also with the armor of the flesh, and put the army in battle order, and called the newcomers and the timid to go home, and appointed a chosen crew, and arranged everything not differently, as if they were to wage war in confidence in their power and weapons, after the manner of the other nations. He does this in order to hide himself under the outward mask, and secretly, through faith in his word, to prepare the victory, so that it would not seem as if Israel was tempting God by fighting bare and unarmed. Now

But he teaches them to use weapons and armor, but not to trust in them. For He does not want them to be victorious by arms or by armor, but under arms and armor, so that faith may have a place, which has to do with that which is not seen [Heb. 11:1], and a temptation of God may be avoided, which leaves in place what God has outwardly given for use in war. That God hides Himself in this way (de hac larva) is also what we said above. For David did not say: I will wage war without a sword, and without my bow I will be helped, but: I will indeed make war with sword and bow, but I will not put my hope in it. I will not live without bread and wine, but I will not set the hope of life on the bread and wine. So it is in all other things.

Thirdly, lest the Jews should think that they were born only to kill men, and not rather to preserve the godly and quiet, and to chasten the ungodly and turbulent, he prescribes a law that they should first offer peace to their enemies, which also some Gentiles have kept, as the poet 1) says of the Romans:

[The subjugated spare, the proud you must fight].

And Augustus always preferred peace to war, and said that one should only wage war out of urgent necessity, since war, he said, is like a golden fishhook, where the cost is greater than the gain, and yet, if it is lost, cannot be compensated by a catch. And we see almost in all wars, by the outcome they have, that God is present as judge, so that those who leave peace and first start war are always defeated. Thus also the king Josiah fell [2 Chron. 35, 22. f.], because he despised the peace that was offered to him, and began war against the king of Egypt. Thus are the world empires, which were brought about by war, perished by war, and even the last empire of the Romans, which forced everything under itself, became a robbery of all nations.

Fourth. This law of war is given against the foreign nations, that when those who resist are subdued, they shall slay all that is male, but spare the women, the children, and the cattle, and all the spoil of the city, and divide it among themselves. But the Cananites and Amorites themselves, in whose land they would dwell, the LORD commands to be utterly banished, that nothing may remain from which they may learn ungodliness and abomination.

According to the secret meaning, the wars to be waged in the cause of faith are meant here. Here it is above all necessary that we know that God is among us and fights for us; in this knowledge we can safely and courageously wage the wars of the Lord. But after that [it is necessary to know] that our powers, that is, wisdom, knowledge, understanding, then also our weapons, that is, the sword of the spirit and the Scriptures, are only an outward effort (operam), under which God is powerful in us, and fights and conquers, as Paul says [2 Cor. 10, 4.], "Our weapons are not carnal, but mighty in the sight of GOD," so that we do not boast as if it were we who have won the victory, but GOD alone helps us to victory everywhere, who works all things in us all.

We have three kinds of enemies: first, those who accept the peace offered and submit to us; second, those who resist. Moses refers to these two as foreign peoples who are far from the land of promise. The third kind is inward and in the homeland, as there are the Cananites, Amorites 2c. These mean three kinds of heretics. The first are not stubborn, give way to admonition with ease, and as subjects make peace and serve in love. The second are those who resist and defend themselves with the weapons of Scripture. Of these, those who are male are to be killed; the rest are to be taken as a prey, that is, by the word of the Spirit, the chief and mightiest among them are to be

If they are obstinate, they are to be abandoned forever as if they were dead and considered heathens and tax collectors; but the rest of them are to be accepted and distributed so that our love may work on them (distribuendi in opera caritatis). But the native and near ones shall be utterly destroyed with all. These are the ones who are completely hardened and obdurate, incorrigible people. These are to be put under ban by the word and separated from us.

For here it is not an outward sword that strikes the bodies, but the word of God that strikes the consciences. But when the consciences are overcome, then enough is overcome, because the arrogant mind is destroyed, which rose up against the knowledge of God [2 Cor. 10:5]. The rest, which still lives in the flesh, must be carried, even though it is weak. For after the ungodliness of the heart is killed, the weakness of the flesh does no harm, since sin in the members is now no longer imputed, after the head of the serpent is cut off, that is, the sense and delusion of ungodliness. But where the head and the delusion do not depart, that which is best lived in the flesh must also be killed at the same time as the ungodliness of the heart, that is, banished, because there is no forgiveness, no mercy, no grace left for the sin that is still left in the flesh, since they hold on to the ungodliness of the heart. These are the Cananites and the nearby Amorites.

Offering peace means offering the gospel of peace and the teaching of a calm and cheerful conscience, that is, of pure faith, to the godless and restless teachers and tormentors of consciences who struggle with works.

That one should not cut down the trees that bear fruit means that if they have true sayings of Scripture, one should not deny them. For there has never been any heresy that has not also said something true. Therefore, one must not deny the true for the sake of the false. The trees that do not bear fruit are to be cut down and used as bulwarks, which means that the scriptural passages which they misrepresent and hold against us are to be driven back on those who use them in this way, and they are to be refuted by their own useless lies.

That a new spouse, and one who builds a house, and one who plants a vineyard, should not be sent out to war, means that a newcomer should not be put into the ministry of the word (as Paul teaches [1 Tim. 3, 6. f.]), "lest he puff himself up, and fall into the snare of the blasphemer." So also not a fearful man, that is, one who is weak in faith, but, as he exhorts Titus [Cap. 1:9], one who holds fast the word of pure doctrine, and is mighty in the word to exhort and overcome the gainsayers, lest he either perish or flee in the war, that is, either be overcome by ungodliness or yield to ungodly teachers. For what he says here about dedicating the house and making common the vineyard and bringing home the wife means that a fighter of the Word must be trained by application (usu), so that he knows the teaching not only by hearing but also by experience. For according to the Hebrew way, a house is dedicated when it is taken possession of by being used and inhabited, and the vineyard is made common when someone takes possession of it by using it and benefiting from it. The bride is taken home when one lives together with her.

The twenty-first chapter.

V. 1. ff. If you find a slain man in the land that is yours 2c.

Moses remains in this chapter still with the things, which concern war and blood. First, he introduces a great ceremony (ceremoniam), which is to take place when a slain man is found in the field, and one does not know the culprit: how one is supposed to pay off the debt. This evil also belongs to that which is civil, and of which we have said that one must suffer it if one wants to live together with neighbors (jure vicinitatis). Otherwise, why should those who live in the immediate vicinity of the place of death (occisi) be the most burdened with guilt, since it is possible that he would have been killed by people living far away or by strangers? But this law, in my opinion, is given so that the rough people of the law would be deterred by this outward show of sadness and repentance 1) and held back from the death stroke, just as children are used to be deterred from evil by outward things that are shown to them (spectaculis) and by frightening images.

Secondly, he gives them a law about the captive wives. And here you see how much the law allowed the Jewish men of war, that they were not only allowed to have several wives, but also, if they felt like it (si amor jusserit), a Gentile woman and prisoner of war. For since he dealt above with the men of war, who are not new husbands [Cap. 20, 1-4.], it is evident that almost all of them who were to do war service had been husbands for at least more than a year, and these married men of war are permitted to take even a heathen wife home with them, and, what is more, after that, if she displeases him, he [Moses] gives him the right to let her go from him, but as a free woman, so that she may marry another but not be sold or ravished.

1) We have adopted posnitsMias with the Jena instead of poslitsltin in the Wittenberg and in the Erlangen.

(prostitui) could. For it is not befitting for civic respectability that one sells or disgraces a humiliated woman.

But what is this? Were the Jews free to ravish the women? The text does not have the word "ravish" (prostituendi), fondas word which means to sell or to hire (locare), so that the meaning seems to me to be that she should not be sold for money, or in any other way given away for profit, to whomever the husband wants, namely to a servant or a friend, but she should be left completely free, so that she can rather, free of him, marry whomever she wants.

In short, this law also belongs in part to the things that Moses left for the Jews because of their hardness, as Christ teaches from the letter of separation Matth. 19, 8. For it is unjust that a woman should be cast away (dimitti) from her husband through no fault of her own and only because of her own will; nevertheless, this unjustice is allowed to the hard and rude (barbaris) people, so that they do not commit a greater misdeed (malum). But polygamy was common among this people, both according to the example of the fathers and according to the law. 2)

But this use, that she trim her nails and take off the clothes in which she is imprisoned, and sit and mourn her father and mother for a month, is instituted in order that the harshness of the deed may be alleviated, namely, that a heathen woman may be taken in marriage among the people of God, so that by these purifications she may be sanctified, as it were, and mixed with the holy people, after she has forgotten her people and her friendship and has become a new creature according to the flesh. For the brute rabble must be led and urged to respectability and reverence by outward ceremonies and ostentation, since they cannot be led by the spirit.

2) The last sentence is missing in the Wittenberg.

Thirdly, he gives a law about two wives and their offspring, lest the husband, according to his affection and love, should give the firstborn to the son of the wife whom he loves best, who is not the firstborn. For the firstborn was the noblest and highest honor of children, which was not by the will of man, as marriage to a prisoner of war, but by the heavenly blessing, whereby there is no respect of person. Therefore, it may not be transferred according to human will [from one to another], or changed according to the will of the lover or the beloved, so that this is a generally valid sentence (gnome) that this law contains: What GOD gives as a gift, man may not take away. This law was even harsh, since it prevents both enmity (vindictam) against the hated wife and favor against the beloved. For to put away enmity and favor requires no small virtue, indeed, it is impossible of nature. Therefore it is enforced by law and by force, which wickedness neither wants nor is able to do. So you see that polygamy is permitted by the law.

Fourth, he gives the law of the disobedient sons, who are to be punished by death. The best and most just lawgiver is Moses, who pronounces the death sentence not only for lesser offenses, but much more also for greater ones. Among men the laws and customs are such that they punish murder and theft with death, but adultery is seldom punished with death. Furthermore, disobedience and the shameful life of children are not punished by death, much less offenses against sacred things (sacrilegia), and impiety and blasphemy against God and God's word. Here, however, Moses commands so strictly that the rebelliousness of the children be punished that he even commands that the parents themselves be the first to initiate this death penalty, since they themselves are to bring their own sons to court, accuse them and testify against them. This is how highly God values obedience and reverence to parents, and how God wanted us to follow this law as well, so that the licentious and insolent parents would be punished.

The youth would be taught more fear and timidity, which is being destroyed everywhere by such miserable examples and such impudent manners.

Fifthly and lastly, he decrees that the malefactors who are punished with death on the gallows should be taken away on the day, and that they should not be left on the gallows during the night. He adds the reason: "For a hanged man is accursed in the sight of God, lest the land be polluted." He says in active form: He is a cursed by God (maledictio Dei), that is, he is considered a cursed by God and before God and by God. Now, however, you are to put out of sight what you know is so displeasing to GOD that it is also cursed before Him, so that it will not seem as if you are hanging it as if you take pleasure in it, so that the land will be filled with the curse of GOD and thus be defiled. All this is ordained in order to make the killing detestable, as well as that worshipful use (religio) with the corpse of the one who was found slain, so that they would be deterred from killing, to such a degree that they would also kill the one who was worthy of death, forced by the coercion of the law, but themselves would like to kill only unwillingly, and should take away the killed as a gruesome image (spectrum) of the death stroke, so that the horror of killing would not become small and cool through the habit of looking at the corpse and to tolerate.

Secret interpretation.

Above [Cap. 19 It has been said that "killing" has a twofold secret interpretation. For either godliness or godlessness is killed; both are spiritual killing. The former is meant by the death stroke as guilt. The latter is meant by the sword of the avenging judgment as the punishment. Thus he is killed in an evil way who is alienated from God and the word of life by the word of ungodliness; but he is killed in a right way who is struck by the word of the Spirit as punishment and is frightened by the future wrath of God so that he may repent and live. If he is not made alive in this way

If he wants to die, he will remain a dead man in twofold death, both in his ungodliness and in the future wrath against his ungodliness, with which God will kill him. But we kill spiritually by shrinking. Therefore, the found corpse means either a killed brother or any killed people (populum), whom we find infected by false delusion, whose author or teacher is not known. Here, all those who are closest must run to it and, terrified in a godly conscience, take this guilt upon themselves, fearing that it might have happened through their fault, or that it might be among us who did it, especially the elders, that is, the ministers of the Word, and act no differently to remove this trouble than if they had caused it themselves.

Therefore, they are to take a young heifer from the cattle that has not yet pulled at the yoke, which is Christ in his flesh, which he took from our human race. But he is taken in the spirit, that is, preached and believed. But he was never under the yoke, that is, he was without sin, owing nothing to the law, but sacrificed for us according to his will. They shall lead it into a rough and rocky valley, which has never been tilled, nor received seed, and shall cut off its neck there, that is, they shall preach that he suffered in the world and for the world, which is barren, rough and ungrateful to God, never having heard or received the word of God before, but only preening in righteousness and wisdom of the flesh. Then, while the Levites stand by, the elders shall approach the slain man, and wash their hands over the young heifer, and pray that this blood may not be imputed to them, that is, over Christ thus preached and believed, the ministers of the word shall become innocent, and 1) act [as if it were their own business], 2) and pray that this offense may be forgiven them. Thus through Christ all things are forgiven, both the

The sins that are right and recognized, as well as the unknown sins and those that we fearfully suspect to be sins. An excellent example of this spiritual interpretation is given to you by Paul in the whole epistle to the Galatians, where he, having found the body of a slain man in the field of the church, and not knowing who had done it, runs to it as the neighbor and acts as if it were his own business. See there.

The captive woman who is taken as a wife, thinks St. Jerome, is the eloquence. For in such a way they consider the secret interpretations as a kind of game. We say that the secret interpretations must be applied to faith. Therefore, this woman is either the synagogue, or the church from the Gentiles. We understand by it (facimus) the synagogue, which was beautiful through the gifts that Paul enumerates Rom. 9, 4. 5. and says: "To whom belongs the law and the covenant, the glory, the fathers" 2c., and completely suitable for love and marriage, that is, to hear Christ's word. The hair (caesaries) was her shining priesthood; this is shorn off and cut off. The garment in which she is caught, the outward appearance of righteousness, also had to be put off, so that the true righteousness of the cross might be introduced, which considers everything that was gain before as dirt [Phil. 3, 7. 8.]. She shall also trim the nails, that is, she shall also lose the hardness of the law which lacerates the consciences. Then she shall mourn her father and mother, that is, she shall recognize and confess that sin is original and in nature, which cannot be removed by the righteousness of the law, but rather is increased. And so she should be married (maritetur), that is, receive and believe the word of God, and be the wife of Christ.

Up to this point, the spiritual interpretation of the synagogue for one part has endured, as it is the custom of Scripture to speak of the whole in the figure of the synecdoche, since it means only one part. Now follows from the other part, which is rejected, namely it is the same woman, who is accepted and rejected, because it is one and the same people, to the

1) et is missing in the Jenaer.

2) Such an addition: si sua res agatur, seems to us commanded by the context and by the parallelism at the end of this paragraph.

Partly accepted, partly abandoned. If then the woman displeases you, that is, in this ungodly part, you shall let her go free, that is, Christ has left the Jews and does not subject them to the law anymore, nor does he hand them over to another master, but they [the synagogue] are free to go away as they please and follow the master they want. Thus the Lord foretold Isa. 5, 2. ff. that his vineyard would leave him. Now you can draw this secret interpretation quite generally to all works saints, some of whom are caught by the word, who shave off their hair, trim their nails, and condemn all glory of former righteousness, and realize that they are sinners. Again, some are left as hardened in their minds.

Two wives of one man are the twofold and yet one church of the Jews and Gentiles. The synagogue is the hostile one, because it kills the prophets and crucifies Christ 2c.; the church of the Gentiles is the beloved one, because it accepts the word with joy. Nevertheless, the synagogue has the firstborn, because from it comes Christ, the apostles, the word, and not from the Gentiles, "because salvation comes from the Jews", Joh. 4, 22. Therefore, even today one should not despise the Jews, because from them, not from us, comes all glory, as Paul does Rom. 9, 3. ff. For they were the first Christians, and "to them is promised and trusted what God has spoken" [Rom. 3, 2].

The son, who is rebellious and a drunkard, means a teacher in the church who is first begotten by the Word, but then corrupted by human doctrines and dreams and stubbornly adheres to them. This one is to be accused and convicted before the court of the church, and to be killed with stones, that is, with hard sayings of the Scriptures, that is, to be overcome, so that he may live. If he does not want to live, then the severe judgment of death and the wrath of God must be applied, so that he may be killed and live.

The one hanged for an iniquity, who is to be taken down because of the curse of God, so that the land will not be defiled, means that an ungodly person, who by the word is condemned, and does not repent, should be completely removed, and should be set apart as a curse before God and considered a ban, lest, if it were tolerated among us, it should infect and corrupt very many of us, as it says in 1 Cor. 5, <sup>1</sup>) 13. 6: "Put out from among yourselves whoever is evil," for "a little leaven leaveneth the whole dough."

But what shall we say to Paul, who in his letter to the Galatians Cap. 3, 13. understands this passage of Christ, saying: "Christ became a curse for us, for it is written: Cursed is everyone who hangs on the wood." Jerome agonizes over this passage, saying that Moses speaks of a hanged transgressor, but that Christ committed no sin. But he does not see that Paul speaks in the most simple way, and Moses, who speaks in general terms, understands Christ correctly and according to the letter, without figurative speech. For if every hanged man is a curse before God, 2) as Moses teaches, Christ is also a curse before God, and if every hanged man is an evildoer, Christ is also an evildoer. Therefore, it should not have been said here how Christ was without sin, but how he had sin; likewise, it should not have been said how he was the one who gave and was not subject to this hanging, but how he was and could have been subject to it.

Here Paul solves the whole difficulty with one word, saying: "He became a curse for us"; for us, I say, not for himself. By this word he clearly teaches that someone has two kinds of sin and that a hanged man becomes a curse before God; once for himself and his own sin; such are all others; the other time for others and for foreign sin; such is Christ alone, who says, Ps. 69, 10.: "The reproach of those who revile you falls on me", and Is. 53, 4.: "He bore our sins", and again [v. 8.]: "For the sins of my people I afflicted him", and [v. 10.]: "So the LORD wanted to bruise him for the sake of our sins".

for the sake of other sins" 2c. Whether someone is hanged for himself or for another, the simple understanding of the law remains that anyone hanged for sin is a curse before God. Therefore, Christ, in bearing our sin, became a curse for us in truth, as the text reads to the letter. As he was circumcised and put under the whole law for us, while he was free from every law for himself, so he "who knew no sin was made sin for us, that we might have in him the righteousness that is before God," 2 Cor. 5,<sup>1</sup> ) 21. Thus he became a curse who did not know the curse, so that in him we might be a blessing from God.

But that this curse before God from the wood

To be taken, lest the land be defiled, means to preach and believe the gospel of the cross, namely, that the cross is glory, death life, sin righteousness, the curse blessing, damnation blessedness, or as Paul says [Gal. 6:14], that we glory in the cross of our Lord, that the world is crucified to us, and we to the world, according to the words [Matth. 5:10]: "Blessed are those who are persecuted" 2c. Otherwise, if this is not preached and believed, there is nothing more detestable, nothing more abominable, than the cross and death, and the whole land is defiled by this opinion and this vexation of the cross, for "to the unclean nothing is pure, to the pure all things are pure" [Tit. 1, 15.]. This [that everything is pure] happens through the word, that [that nothing is pure] without the word.

The twenty-second chapter.

V. 1. ff. If you see your brother's ox or sheep going astray, you must not withdraw from them 2c.

Up to this point, Moses has taught love almost only insofar as it belongs to the fourth and fifth commandments, namely, obedience to parents and the avoidance of death by which the person of one's neighbor is damaged. Now he goes on to the rest, so that he teaches to show love to the neighbor in regard to external goods, and treats in general the sixth and seventh commandment, in which adultery and theft are forbidden, but chastity and goodwill are commanded, which belong to love and are fruits of faith, Gal. 5, 22. But in this chapter he gives various laws on how to prove goodwill and chastity.

First, he commands that an object lost by a neighbor, whether it be an ox that goes astray or a garment or any other thing that is lost, be taken, preserved and restored, and not neglected as something foreign, but cared for as if it were our own. Sol

If anyone sees his brother's donkey fall, he should help him up as if it were his own. You see that this commandment teaches the same thing that Paul says in Phil. 2:4: "Look at one another's things." This is quite proper to love, 1 Cor. 13:5: "Love seeketh not its own," except that the gospel, in explaining the law more fully, teaches that this is to be done even to enemies, while Moses forbade the rude people of the law to hate their enemies.

Secondly. [V. 5: "A woman shall not bear a man's weapons, nor shall a man put on women's apparel." Here it is not forbidden that, in order to avoid danger, or as a joke at play, or to deceive enemies, a woman should not bear a man's arms, or that a man should wear a woman's garment, but that this should not be done in earnest and in ordinary life and usage, so that due honor and dignity may be preserved in both sexes, since it is shameful for a man to wear a woman's garment, and not decent for a woman to bear a man's arms.

But he seems to punish by this law some people in whom this way may have taken place, as the writers generally write of the Egyptians, that the women do man's work, but the men do woman's work, the women do business and feed the men, the men take care of the house, and many such things in an inverted and opposite manner than is the custom among other peoples, so that this law must be understood as a general one, namely, that a woman attends to female tasks, a man to man's business, and in general each, content with his fate, plies his trade and needs his gifts, Rom. 12:7, 8, that the cobbler should stick to his last, and that the common man should not be the ruler of the council, but that the variety and diversity of persons should exist for a good government. If this is reversed, it shall be as shameful as if, according to a reversed order of things, a woman wore a man's weapons and a man wore women's clothes. God wants His people to keep away from the customs of these peoples, since He has an abomination against them.

Third. If a nest is found on the way, the young may be taken, but the mother sitting on it should be let fly. What does this law teach but that they should also learn gentleness and goodwill through benevolent treatment of animals? Otherwise it would have to be regarded as a foolish law, since it not only gives a commandment about such an insignificant matter, but also promises well-being and long life to those who keep it, saying [v. 7]: "That it may go well with thee, and that thou mayest live long" 2c. This, too, can be drawn on it by a general and, as it were, proverbial figurative figure of speech (figura), that one should beware of all excessive exploitation (usum) of one's neighbor, as we say in German: A willing horse should not be driven too hard. So we should use our friends and neighbors in such a way that we leave something for them, so that we can also use them at another time and on another occasion. Let this be a saying to the Hebrews: When one has taken the young, let the mother fly, so that there may be they are well off. Otherwise, when they have completely sucked their friends dry, they must finally be in a bad way, so that this law is, as it were, contrary to the first one given, against those who like to have others show them kindness and love, but do not show any themselves, as if this were the will of the Lord, that those who always give abundantly should never cease [to give], but those who receive should never become full [to take], and that through the work of the latter the idleness of the latter should be nourished [2 Cor. 8, 13.], which is something quite unreasonable in social (sociali) life.

Fourth. When a house is built, a wall is to be made on the roof all around, lest someone fall down and bring a blood debt on the house. He speaks according to the custom of the people, who built the houses in such a way that the roofs were flat above, like the streets, which are paved with stones. Therefore we also read in the Gospel [Luc. 5, 19.] that they broke off the roof and let the gout-broken man down through the tiles, and Christ says that the Gospel should be preached on the roofs [Matth. 10, 27.]. For there people came together, played and ate, just as with us in the hallways. This can also be a proverbial and general law, that in public society one builds in such a way and behaves in intercourse in such a way that one does not cause danger, harm or damage to the other, but rather provides him with protection and benefit, so that you do not seek your benefit through another's misfortune, as it is said that selfishness destroys cities and empires. 1)

Fifth. The vineyard shall not be sown with divers seeds, neither shall it be plowed with an ox and an ass at the same time, neither shall any man use a garment of wool and linen mingled together. This law may have a reason of respectability in mind in the letter, but I believe that this is also a proverbial and general doctrine, by which the Jews are taught that they are to be of one mind, simple, honest, without sectarianism and the creation (studiis) of factions. For a house divided against itself becomes desolate, as the Gospel [Luc. 11, 17.] says, and through unity small goods become great, through discord the greatest goods fall apart, says Sallust. Therefore, some people say that civitas [city] has its name, as it were, from civium unitas [unity of the citizens].

But he adds the reason why some seeds are forbidden, namely, "that you do not sanctify in your abundance such different seeds besides the income of the vineyard". He calls "abundance" [the yield] of the harder fruits, as he calls "tears" [the yield of the juicier (liquidiorum) fruits, Ex. 22, 2) 29: "Your abundance and tears you shall not forgive" to offer. 3) So God, who loves simplicity (simplicitatem) and sincerity, does not want firstfruits and tithes of mixed seed to be sacrificed to Him. He also wants his citizens to be simple and sincere, of the same mind, and to keep their customs, so that they do not work with an ox and an ass, nor use a garment made of mixed material, and everything becomes unequal.

Sixth, he commands that they make lappets 4) on the four fiddles of the cloak. This is commanded to be worn by the Jews as a special sign by which they are to be distinguished from other peoples as a watchword and a sign of recognition. 5) Not that the Lawgiver had this in mind alone, but that it was to be a symbol of confession, by which they were to confess that they were the people of God, and from this arose the cause of their being hated and suffering persecution, so that through this saying (proverbio) of the Law God would train His citizens to patience, and they, exercised by the adversaries, would become the stronger, more united and more unanimous.

This is said about benevolence and love toward one's neighbor in bodily things by virtue of the seventh commandment, "Thou shalt not steal." Now he will deal with chastity by virtue of the sixth commandment. In this chapter Moses is not concerned with the order of the commandments, just as in the previous chapter he spoke of the death stroke rather than of the disobedience of the children, because in common life things do not happen and do not occur in order, which otherwise can be written in order; Moses indicates this by neglecting this order of the commandments.

Seventh, he gives a commandment of a woman who has not been found a virgin by her husband, and has been brought into an evil cry by him, either with truth or out of hatred 2c. It is uncertain what kind of a way (rite) this was, in order to inquire or prove publicly the virginity. For I see that almost everyone agrees that one can know privately at the first intercourse whether she is weakened or not, because the first intercourse is unpleasant and troublesome, since the hymen is injured, and a sign of it remains on the garment through the blood of the injured hymen, although Augustine also makes this uncertain, who says that this very hymen is sometimes injured by the women (matronis), or also by the girls themselves, by examining it with the finger. But let us admit that it is certain; how can it be proved publicly? Will the man say that the habit was neither unpleasant nor severe? If the woman denies it? Or shall she show the blood which remained on the garment? Who would tolerate that these shameful things (pudenda) are shown in public court? Rather, I want to say that I do not know this custom. I would agree with those who say that the father and the mother of the girl, when they give away the daughter, first inquire about her virginity through respectable women, who afterwards can be witnesses in court that she was a virgin, and that this is what Moses says here, that the father spreads out the garment, saying, "Behold, here is the virginity of my daughter."

ter," that is, through these women I show that she was a virgin, that is, as a sign I spread out the garment, the spreading of which is to mean that the matter is clear and proven, as it was the custom of this people to shake out the garment when they threatened, as Nehemiah did, Cap. 5,<sup>1</sup>) 13., and to tear the garment when they were angry, so also to spread out the garment when they wanted to express that a matter was clear, distinct and bright; although this custom of having a bride examined by women before the wedding is also disgraceful. But since we do not have anything else, let us allow it in the meantime.

This law also serves for general application against slanderers and spreaders of evil rumors. You see how severely this misdeed is punished here; First, he is chastised, namely with forty strokes less one, then he is fined a hundred shekels of silver, which are to be given to the girl's father, finally he is also forced to keep her himself, whom he hated so much and himself infamously, forever as punishment, while the one who had simply defiled a girl should only give fifty shekels to the girl's father and keep her, as he will say afterwards.

Furthermore, the woman who is not a virgin they stone. By this evidence it is seen that this law speaks of a bride committing fornication, which is a right adultery. For a girl who commits bad fornication is given in marriage to her abuser, as I have said. Or if it is not understood by a bride, the girl's fornication is punished so severely because she has fornicated secretly and willingly, and has deceived her future husband and dishonored her father's house. But by the girl who is to be given to her abuser is understood one who has been violently defiled. And this is the more probable to me.

Eighth, he sets a threefold kind of adultery. First, if a man sleeps with another woman, they shall both die. Second, if a man sleeps with another man's bride, but in the city, they shall both die.

1) In the issues: "7."

die. By town here is meant any place where the girl could have protected herself by screaming, but did not do so, as if she were in a forest or in the field and knew that people were near who could hear her. For a city is put here only for the sake of example, because in it people are at hand to help. So the one who does not cry out indicates that she has allowed herself to be ravished with her will. Thirdly, if someone sleeps with another's bride, but in the field, only the adulterer shall die. And here the field is also only mentioned as an example, that by it is understood any place where a single girl cannot help herself by crying, as if someone seized her alone in the house or in the porch or in the chamber, as Ammon did his sister Tamar; as if someone forced someone's bride in bed by a drawn sword not to cry out. This one, of course, is not in the field, and yet she is more than alone; she would cry out, but dare not for fear of death; therefore the equity of the law shall interpret it as if she had cried out, as the text says.

The last is the law: Whoever defiles a girl who is not a bride shall give fifty shekels to her father and have her as a wife. In the second book of Moses Cap. 22, 16, he calls these fifty sovereigns a "morning gift" which he shall give to the virgin; here he fixes them at so many sovereigns, which according to our coinage make about twelve florins, for a sovereign is the place of a florin. 2) But he adds there that he shall have her for a wife, [but only] if the father of the girl wants it; if he does not want it, he must nevertheless pay this morning gift. Would that God would use this law as an example also in our country, for the sake of the wretched female sex. 3)

What Christ is, as He Himself also did (whether it be an ass, that is, a slow, unsluggish, and weak in faith or life, or anything else, as there are errors and defects), 1) in word, in exhortation, in walk.

A woman does not bear the weapons of a man, and a man does not wear women's clothes, if faith is not perverted by works, that is, if what is due to faith is not attributed to works, and again, like those who are possessed by the statutes of men, who trust in men as their teachers, who must be served only by the works of love, which they do not do. On the other hand, they serve God, whom they should trust, with works and services of their own choosing, and do not trust in his word. But both are an abomination, for a man is not to be believed, but to be served by works; but God is to be believed, not served by works. Thus a man becomes a woman when he believes a man, and a woman becomes a man when he serves God with works, as is said elsewhere.

The mother bird is set free, and the young are caught on the way, that is, the synagogue is left, which by the law had the apostles and the first believers among them, whom Christ accepted to spread his word among the Gentiles in this life. The house, built with a wall around the roof, is the church of Christ, which he has so fortified by his word that no danger or trouble to the soul can arise from it, but that it can be used safely and confidently in every way.

The vineyard is not sown with various seeds, that is, in the church there is not both the teaching of faith and works, but the pure and simple word of faith. Neither is there plowing with an ox and an ass at the same time, that is, there is not a teacher in the church who teaches both faith and works, but a sincere and faithful servant in the truth. In the same way, we do not use a garment that is

We must live in such a way that faith is our life, not the hypocrisy of works, because the conscience cannot grasp this at the same time, that you base yourself on faith and works, although the work by heart is necessary for the ass and for the outward man.

The various seeds, the ass and the linen, are to be separated into their own fields, and they are not to be mixed together, that is, they are to be taught, believed and lived in such a way that faith alone governs the conscience without works, and works oppress the flesh without faith, so that the spirit and freedom may be inwardly in the heart, but the law and the yoke of works inwardly in the body, that the flesh may not have freedom but bondage, but the spirit freedom, not bondage, nor on either side either bondage or freedom.

The small tabs on the four fronts of the cloak signify the confession of faith in the outward walk through the whole world, which is to be spread in the four regions of the world. The Christians are to be recognized by this sign and be a foolishness to the Gentiles and an annoyance to the Jews.

An adulteress always means a soul that becomes unfaithful to Christ (fornicantem) by leaving the word and trusting in works. Therefore, by the word of the Spirit, both she and her husband, that is, the teacher of error, are killed. Furthermore, some are defiled here with their will, and do not cry out, although they are in the city. These are the ones who, having grown weary of the word, turn to fables and get masters of their own free will, since their ears are itching to hear something new; they do not ask the believers who are there for advice, so that they may be delivered. Others are those who alone are ravished in the field against their will. Rather, these are not adulteresses. Among them are those who are inwardly in sincere faith, but are forced to hear outwardly godless teachers and live among wicked people, like Lot in Sodom, and godly people among godless tyrants.

But the virgin who is not trusted, is the synagogue or any other community (congregatio) without the Word, which nevertheless has a beautiful appearance and spirituality (religiosa) in its own righteousness. Their virginity takes (violat) Christ by his word and keeps her as a wife, if the father wills it, that is, if she leaves her paternal statutes and is abandoned. But if she does not leave them, he gives her a morning gift, that is, temporal benefits for that righteousness and hearing of the Word. For one must assume a twofold virgin, if the secret interpretation is to hold, a virgin of faith and grace, and a virgin of law and works. Both are chaste and holy in their worship (religione). The defilement of the latter is pleasing to Christ, that of the former is an adultery and a mortal sin. Thus, the husband who mistreats the wife is

1) These brackets are set by us.

The same Christ who accuses the virginity of the synagogue, which shines through works (religiosam), through the gospel, that it is not pure in faith. But the parents, who strongly resist him, mean the battle by which the righteousness of the works is defended with the testimony of the Scriptures and the spread out garment. And Christ is chastised with strokes, that is, with blasphemies, and is atoned for; at last he is forced to keep them, because in his kingdom there must be seemingly beautiful hypocrites whom he must feed, and their [the hypocrites'] teachers under his name, who do not want to be overcome. But if she is convicted that she is not a virgin in faith (non esse virgo fidei), she will be killed, that is, killed by the word of God, so that she may live in the spirit, having lost the glory of legal virginity.

The twenty-third chapter.

Cap. 22, 30. No one shall take his father's wife 2c. 1)

Moses continues to teach the commandments of love, and still presses with various laws on the sixth and seventh commandment regarding chastity and peace and public respectability, until the 27th chapter. In the third book of Moses, Cap. 18, 6. ff., the persons are enumerated whom it is not right and forbidden to take in marriage; here only one person is mentioned, namely the stepmother, whom one should not take if the father is dead, much less if he is alive. This indicates that one should take much less close blood relatives than the sister, the daughter, the mother-sister (amita) 2c. Nevertheless, I believe that the marriage in the second degree was not seldom abated, since also in many other places there is not such a great strictness of the law.

But it is probable that that Corinthian, whom Paul condemns in 1 Cor. 5, 1, because he saw that freedom was taught by the law of Moses, abused this freedom and took his father's wife against this law. Therefore, Paul does not so much insist that he acted against the law as against nature, saying that it is such fornication that is not found even among the Gentiles who are governed by the law of nature, because nature teaches that such a marriage is an abomination, so that it is vain for anyone to presume to claim freedom from the law.

Secondly, a man who has his testicles cut out or crushed should not enter the church of the Lord. Here he is not talking about the place of worship, but about the church itself, and coming or entering the church is something different than being and living in the church. For how should those be kept from hearing the law and from worshiping who do not

1) In Hebrew, this is the first verse of the 23rd chapter.

Since the law is generally given to all who are of the seed of Israel, and does not exclude Gentiles from the law and worship, but rather calls them proselytes, and often commands that strangers be taken care of.

It is therefore "to enter into the community", to administer an office or public service (magistratu), because he does not say: to enter into the community, but: to enter into the community, just as Christ also calls those who do not enter the door into the sheepfold wolves, that is, godless teachers. Therefore, there may be those in the church who are cut off, but they should not hold any magisterial office, because of this physical infirmity, lest the office be looked down upon or reviled; and also because such people generally have a cowardly heart and are effeminate. But the magisterial office in an honorable community requires a man, as Bias says: Regiment shows what kind of man one is. 1)

Third, a whore child, that is, one born of a whore, shall not come into the community, that is, he shall not be considered fit to hold office or a position of authority, because of the contempt and disgrace of his origin and birth, even after the tenth generation, that is, forever, because even this is not proper in an honorable community. Secondly, because it is a proverb that whorish children are seldom good people and always have a great infirmity about them. This law is also kept by many peoples, especially in some imperial cities (municipiis), so that they do not admit them to the trades, perhaps because they have formerly experienced their unworthiness. Furthermore, it is right that those who are born in honor and in wedlock should be honored more in the outward show and appearance of the world than those who are born out of wedlock, lest marriage be regarded as equal to fornication, and the honor bestowed on an unworthy person give occasion to disparage fornication and to hold marriage in contempt.

Fourth. The Ammonites and Moabites shall not come into the congregation, even after the tenth generation, that is, forever. These heathen are not accused of any physical infirmity or defect of birth, but of their ungodliness and hatred of the children of Israel, that they not only did not forestall them with water and bread by the way 2c., but also desired that they should be utterly destroyed, desiring that they should be accursed by Balaam, whereby they showed their heathenish 3) and unquenchable hatred, from which they would never desist, as also the histories afterwards testify. But to make such a person a leader or a person in authority, who is known to seek your ruin out of natural hatred, is not only improper and inconsistent, but also foolish and sacrilegious and a temptation of God. But to enter into marriages with them and other covenants, and to have intercourse with them, is not forbidden here. For Ruth also, the Moabitish woman [Ruth 1, 4.], was a holy and godly woman. For he says here of men, not of women, so that I believe that it was not forbidden to take in marriage either the daughter or granddaughter of a harlot child, or the daughter adopted or begotten before the intercourse of one who had been cut.

"Thou shalt," he says [according to the Vulg., v. 6.], "make no peace with them, neither shalt thou wish them well all thy life for ever." What is this? Does he then forbid that one should not do good to the wretched or enemies or strangers of these nations? Did not David comfort Hanon, king of the Ammonites [2 Sam. 10:1 f.]? Did he not keep peace with his father? I answer: One must look at the object of which the Lawgiver speaks in the present. But he speaks of the enemies who glow with pagan and unquenchable hatred, that the same should not be placed in a magisterial office. It is forbidden (I say) to protect such haters and ill-willed people the public peace and the common good in

3) Asntio oäiurn, that is, their hatred as Gentiles Wider the people of the Jews. Nowadays, we would call it "national hatred.

He does not, however, forbid private individuals to do private good deeds, but rather commands them to do private good deeds, so that their hatred will not be declared just and they will not be accepted into governmental offices, lest their people (natio) gain the upper hand and rule. But he does not forbid to do private good deeds to private persons, but rather commands it.

Fifth. He lets the Edomites and the Egyptians come into the congregation of the Lord after the third member, because the Edomite (he says) is your brother, and the Egyptian has been your guest. Therefore, although you cannot take a king from them, you may give them magisterial offices and higher positions (praefecturas), but only to those who were born after the third member, so that they have already lost their kind and have passed into the blood of Israel. But the third member must be counted from the time they were converted to Judaism and became fellow Jews; otherwise, what should be the third member? And so you see that the Ammonites and Moabites and the sons of whores in Israel were not denied marriage, since he says that they were not to come into the church even after the tenth member, namely, after they had become fellow Jews. These members would not be there if they were not husband and wife among the Israelites and fellow Jews.

Sixth, he commands that when they go out of the camp against the enemies, they should beware of all evil. A dark saying, which can be understood in such a way that they, when they want to fight against the enemies, should first see to it that they themselves are good and without guilt, so that they would not be affected by a righteous judgment of God by having a beam in their own eye and trying to pull the splinter out of the eye of another, as it happened to them with the Philistines, 1 Sam. 4, 1) 2, and with the Gibeonites, Judg. 20, 2) 21, and elsewhere. For also the glorious promise Cap. 20, 14, where he promises that he will be with them in war, should not make them so sure that they think they can be evil with impunity, or that God wants to be with the wicked, or that they can escape judgment.

God if they did the same thing that they were judging and fighting.

Secondly, [this saying can be understood] in this way: If thou wilt fight, take heed that thou have not an evil cause, but a good and righteous one, for the promise of God does not extend to evil and sacrilegious causes to make war, since He says He will fight for them [Cap. 20, 4.].

But the following text seems to enforce that it must be understood by a certain martial discipline (religione militari) and chaste behavior in the camp during the war, since it itself interprets what is evil; first, if something happened to someone during the night, he should go out of the camp and return after bathing himself at sunset; secondly, they shall go out of the camp for necessity and behave honorably out of reverence to GOD, who is present in the camp, so that if they despise this and are disrespectful, GOD will not hand over the enemies to them, but rather hand them over to the enemies. This, then, is the evil from which they should beware if they wish to go into battle.

These two things are so small and little, yes, of course, why does he insist on them so much and make them big? For a very good and just reason, because war is in itself something very stormy, which wants to suffer nothing less than any law or respectability. For look at the warriors (milites), whether any wild animals are more cruel, unrestrained, unruly, insolent and shameless, both in deeds and words, than they. For nothing that they like is denied them there, if you look to morals and respectability. So the Lord wants his people to wage war with the greatest reverence, with the greatest respectability, with the greatest discipline. For this reason he also makes regulations about these small and natural things, so that by practicing these things and following their example they may be much more careful and have an abomination of deeds and words in which a willing and greater dishonorableness, shamelessness and lack of discipline is manifested in other things that are not necessary and not natural. For he who, because at night

1) In the issues: 16.

2) In the Jena and Erlangen: Zuä. 17.

If a man who has been harmed shuns the Lord and goes out of the camp, how can he stay if he has an evil conscience because of fornication, theft, swearing or any other sin? And whoever hides the natural walk with such reverence even from the camp, how should he dare to do or speak anything in a shameless manner in the camp? Therefore, by this law, he drives the rough and stubborn people to fear God in warfare, so that they may put away their presumption and insolence and fight with fear in faith in God.

Seventh. You shall not deliver up a runaway servant to his lord, but let him live with you where he pleases, and do not oppress him. This is also dark, for one may not keep the property (rem) of another. A servant, however, is the. A servant, however, is the property of his neighbor, just like an ox or donkey, which must be returned when found. This must therefore be understood by a cruel master who seeks the servant in order to kill him (ad mortem). For it indicates cruelty that he forbids to "deliver him up" (tradi), but that one delivers someone into the hands of another has in general the meaning that he is delivered up to death. So he wants the servants to keep their life and to give them food, so that in a well-ordered community the masters are not free to do anything. And in order to preserve his life, he was allowed to escape and become free, since he also had to be given freedom for a knocked-out eye, Ex 21:1, 26. For it is fitting for a good community that the servants be given life and food.

Eighth. "There shall be no harlot among the daughters of Israel, and no fornicator among the sons of Israel." He is talking about prostitutes and harlots, or public and shameless prostitutes, who feed on the prostitution trade, because even this public shamelessness and licentiousness of wicked people is not befitting for a well-ordered community, which must grow through honorable marriages and lawful (liberali) offspring. Lets Moses to whores from other peoples? This is what the text seems to indicate. 2)

Ninth. Thou shalt offer neither whore's wages nor dog's money. A strange law! Of course, the first part, of the whore's wages, is given, as one can easily see, so that public shamefulness is abhorred. For God hates predatory burnt offerings [Isa. 61, 8], as well as everything that is acquired with sin and ungodliness, since He wants one to serve Him with reverence. Therefore, it should not be brought into the house of the Lord, either as a sacrifice or for building, where it is common, and shameful or disgraceful, lest God also be held in low esteem, who allows it to be served with such bad and disgraceful things, as the great crowd easily despises those of whom they see that they take pleasure in despicable things. For he certainly wants the rough crowd to be seized by an outward appearance (larva) and to be held in fear and reverence.

And this is the reason why also the money, with which a dog is bought, is not to be sacrificed, because a dog is held in the Scriptures for the most contemptible animal, so that it also serves for proverbs, as Abner says [2 Sam. 3, 8.]: "Am I then a dog's head?" namely nothing more contemptible he could have put forward. So he who honors GOt with the proceeds (pretio) of a dog despises GOt and holds Him in low esteem, as if he wanted to sacrifice the money redeemed for dung to GOt. These signs show how little opinion the heart has of God.

It could be that all that has been said so far belongs to the previous, since he taught that those who want to fight should beware of evil, namely, that this requires a respectful behavior in the camp, and that by the custom and example of these two shameful and contemptible things, he generally all shameful and lowly gain

2) Instead of the words: 8io viäotur toxtus innuors What is found in the Jenaer and in the Erlanger, also in the Strasbourg edition of IMS, the Wittenberger has the words: Non oroão (I believe it nothing That the latter reading corresponds to Luther's meaning, there is no doubt. Perhaps something was omitted here (by mistake) in the first printing.

and to make money an abomination to the people. For the lesser and the smaller are forbidden, that it may be known that the greater and the more important are still more forbidden. For whoever does not dare to offer dog's money or whores' wages, one of which is acquired without sin, the other with sin but without harming his neighbor (sine injuria), how should the god esteem so small that he should dare to offer what he has acquired by theft, robbery, cunning, fraud, injustice?

Tenth. That one should not usury on a brother, but on a stranger, of this law enough has been said above [Cap. 15, 16.], where we dealt with the promise, 1) that the Jews would practice usury. From this it will be easily seen how the Jews were permitted to usury on Gentiles and strangers, not by their merit or right, but by the will of God.

Eleventh, he commands that a vow be kept, otherwise it will be counted as a sin. About vows we have spoken elsewhere superfluously, now we will only briefly say that two things must be in a vow, so that it is godly and of such a nature that it must be kept. First, that it be not contrary to godliness, or that it be not an evil vow. For in evil promises one does not have to keep his promise, as if you vow a good work in order to be justified thereby and to take away sins, it is an ungodly and evil vow, because it is contrary to faith in God, who alone justifies and takes away sins, Rom. 1, 16. But if you vow something of this kind, solely for the glory of God and freely, or for the benefit of your neighbor, it is godly and must be kept. Secondly, if you make a vow in things that are not yours, or otherwise impossible, as if you vowed to give a kingdom to Caesar when you would be a beggar, or to darken the sun. Such is the vow of chastity, because chastity is not in any man's power, but God alone. Therefore, chastity cannot be vowed unless you have it first, but you never have it. Therefore, this vow is nothing, and is as much as if you vowed that you would not be a man or a woman.

Twelfth. In the vineyard and in the seed of one's neighbor one may eat the fruit, but from there one may carry nothing away. This is a law of civil friendship, which indicates that one should be beneficial and serviceable to another, as if to teach that everything is common among friends, but in such a way that the other is not burdened, or that what is his is usurped by another.

Not to take the Father's wife means to leave the synagogue and every sect that has educated us by the law and by works, and not to be united with the word of life. This also Christ did, and we are to do it after him, because faith does not suffer the righteousness of works to remain and be joined to him. But the synagogue had our father, that is, the law, which Paul calls Rom. 7:2, the man 2c.

A eunuch, or one whose testicles are cut out or crushed, is one who has no knowledge of the Scriptures, or one who is injured and crushed by the wrong opinion of the works. Such a one must not be placed in the ministry of the word, since he is unfit, since he should have testicles, that is, the law and the prophets, which testify to the righteousness of faith, Rom. 3:21, that he is mighty in the holy scriptures, Titus 1:9.

The whore child is much worse; he is born of a whore [that is, such a person], who is completely stuck in worldly statutes of men and in carnal opinions, that is, he will much less ever be fit for the service of the Word, but he is also a disgrace to the church, and takes away the honor we have from Christ. But what are the bishops in the whole world now but whoremongers? they are not mere cuttings.

1) In the Erlanger: Iraotnmüs instead of: traetavilnus in the other editions.

According to the spiritual interpretation, the Moabites and Ammonites are actually the Jews, and after them the heretics. For both are the bitterest enemies of the church, who should have come to meet the suffering church with water and bread to help and comfort it, as its housemates and hosts. Not only do they not help her, but they also incite Balaam, false teachers, who curse the right way of the church with blasphemous teachings. Thus they desire with the most ardent hatred that the church be destroyed body and soul. Therefore, they are never, ever to be put into the preaching ministry.

The names are also correct. Ammon means a sad people, because such teachers of works make sad and sorrowful consciences. Moab means from the father, because they are outwardly proud and boast that they are of God alone and that their things are right and true, as Moab is punished in the prophets as proud and arrogant, and Ammon as bitter and cruel. Their birth also rhymes with this, that they come from the father out of incestuous union. The father is the law, from which they are born through wrong use, because they take the law as if it required works, not that it is the power of sin, as Paul calls it [1 Cor. 15:56]: "The power of sin is the law"; but those would say: "The power of righteousness is the law. Balaam means as much as: you devourers, because the godless teachers become more and more angry and devour many; in addition, the belly also devours their possessions, and they corrupt the bodies through the heavy yoke of works.

We are also suffering such things today. Those who are supposed to help us when we are suffering from the Gospel, go away themselves and not only abandon us, but also curse us through their blasphemous teachers. But God does not hear them; indeed, He turns their curse into a blessing, so that we increase all the more through their raging. Therefore, one must not make peace with them, nor wish them well, namely, so that their raging may prosper and go forth happily, but one must pray against it, that they may fall from their nobility and be cast out.

But they are called sons of "Beor" because this means a fool. For they speak foolish things, and contradict themselves, as Balaam also did when he blessed, contrary to his desire [Num. 23:20]. For there is no heretic who is not taken in his lies by men of understanding, that he speak against himself.

The Edomites are brothers, but weak in faith, and sometimes fall into a delusion. These are to be admitted after the third limb, that is, when they have grown and become stronger in faith with us. So the Egyptians are our guests who are weak in life. Neither of them are to be regarded as abominations because of their weakness, but inan is to accept them, so that they may also teach at last.

In the fight against the enemy one should beware of all evil, so that if something has happened to someone at night, he should go out of the camp 2c., that is, if in the conflict and in the challenge, for fear of death, the word has escaped him, that he either denies it or does not act rightly, let him humble himself and separate himself from the church until the sun sets and the challenge is over; then let him bathe himself, and after confessing his sin, let him return to his duty. For God's word must be acted upon with fear and reverence, and enemies must be fought against, lest we lose the word through presumption and lack of reverence, and, where God forsakes us, be overcome.

In the same way, the excrement of need should be buried and hidden outside the camp with a little shovel, that is, the natural infirmities that are left in the sinful flesh should be killed and hidden by the word of faith, so that God will not see them. But they will be hidden if we do not let them reign in our bodies. In this way, then, a minister of the Word must have both the loins of the mind and the loins of the flesh girded, that he may be sound in the faith of the Word, and holy after the flesh is slain.

The servant shall not overtake his master-

The flesh is to be steamed (mortificanda) in such a way that it is not killed (occidatur). For the law, the master of the flesh, condemns it utterly and wants it dead. But consideration must be given to the flesh, that it may live, but not that it may sin, though it cannot live without evil desire, but it shall not reign. For that we may work good and teach faith, it is necessary that the flesh should live, though it cannot live without infirmities, which are hid by the small flesh. So also Paul teaches the Colossians [Cap. 2, 23. 1 that the flesh, as a weak vessel, deserves its honor.

The harlot and the fornicator mean the godless saints in hypocritical worship, as it seems according to the letter that among the people of the Jews there were certain sects in worship, which were called, as we read of Jehoshaphat, the king of Judah, who put them away from the temple [2 Kings 23:7]. But it means XXXXX and XXXXX fornicators and harlots, although according to the sound (allusione) of the word it also means holy men and holy women. For means holy, Isa, 6, 3rd, "Holy, holy, holy." Therefore I believe that by XXXXX is signified the worship of Priapus, in which they committed fornication 2c., and they are (as I said) the saints and righteous of Satan under a beautiful seeming worship.

The whore's reward seems to be the temporal glory of the ungodly worship of which I have spoken. This glory is not to be sacrificed, that is, preached, as if it pleases God or befits us, since the glory and reward of our righteousness is a good conscience toward God, and by heart cross and shame before the world. At-of which those fornicators flee and seek glory before the world, but inwardly they are bad and shameful as dogs, and therefore such a reward is an abomination to God, that is, a rejected and evil conscience.

The brother is not to be oppressed with usury, but the stranger, that is, no law requiring works is given to the righteous, but to the unrighteous, so that the wicked may be humbled by the knowledge of sin. For the office of the law is to require usury more than we are able, until we groan after faith, and, having become brethren, are delivered from usury, Ps. 72:12 ff.

The vows do not easily allow for a secret interpretation, because this is a moral work; however, it can be said that there is only one vow that we owe to God, namely that we believe, praise and glorify him that he is our God. This confession and praise is signified by all outward vows made to God. About this vow the 50th Psalm, v. 14, says: "Offer thanks to God, and pay your vows to the Most High," and the 116th Psalm, v. 14: "I will pay my vows to the Lord, above all His people," so that "vow" is the same as the sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving; for this one thing we owe to God; we have promised it and can keep it.

To eat of one's neighbor's vineyard and not to carry away anything means that each righteous person may take possession of the goods of the other righteous person in spirit. This is the fellowship of the saints, by which it happens that all things are common to all, and yet through use and mutual benefit nothing is taken away or diminished from the other, but is left whole, yea, increases through use and fellowship. So much is lacking in it that anything could be taken away or diminished from it.

The twenty-fourth chapter.

V. 1. ff. If someone takes a wife and marries her 2c.

That the law of divorce is only a secular law, and that it was left out because of the hardness of the common people, is sufficiently proven by Christ (Matth. 19, 8). Therefore we do not read any example of this law, which holy men would have left us. For even Abraham did not let his Hagar go until God commanded him anew [Gen. 21:10-12]. In a community, however, many things must be left undone for the sake of the hard and unyielding, so that no greater evil may occur.

Therefore, a distinction must be made among the laws, so that there are some that command good and others that forbear evil. Among those that command good, the first is the law of faith, which also rules over love, in such a way that if faith should require it against God, the neighbor is to be denied love, because God, who is worshipped by faith, must be preferred to a man who is served by love. According to faith, it is love that governs all laws, both ceremonial and secular; but faith is exempt.

Second. A young husband shall be free from all common burdens for one year. This is a law of equity and civil benefit. For it is reasonable that a newlywed (sponso) be allowed a year with his wife. It is useful so that the community grows through offspring and households (familiis), which would not happen if the husband were exposed to war and common dangers immediately after the wedding, and men would not easily be found who would marry. But that this is a general law, and must be extended to other cases, is sufficiently evident from Cap. 20, 5-7, where a bridegroom who has built a house and planted a vineyard is declared free from military service. In the same

In the sense this is also understood of the assumption of any other new office, by which a household is established, so that this law could serve as a proverb of the freedom of all who enter (neophytorum), namely: One must give a year to a bridegroom 2c.

Thirdly. "Thou shalt not take for a pledge the lowest and the highest millstone." This law likewise teaches in a general proverb that for the sake of debts no one should be deprived of his craft, by which he is nourished and sustained, as with us cruel people (barbaros) such rampages are found that we either imprison debtors, or forbid them their craft or their work, whereas here he says it is enough that he has given his soul in pledge, that is, that he himself is entirely a debtor, and by this craft he must acquire that by which he pays his debt. It is therefore cruel and inequitable to hinder his craft, namely, that he is forced to pay the simple debt with twofold damage; one is that his mill stands idle in the meantime, the other that he loads new debts on himself from elsewhere, or sells his own in order to pay.

Fourthly. Whoever steals one of Israel, either to sell him or to desecrate him, that is, (as we have interpreted the same word above [Cap. 21:14]) to hire him out for gain, or to deliver him to another, he shall be put to death. This law applies to thieves, murderers and robbers, and to those who capture people to extort money, as with us the vultures and wolves of the merchants are called noblemen.

Fifth. Beware of leprosy according to the teaching of the priests, the Levites; only let them teach as I (says he) have commanded them. 1) That is, the lepers are to be kept away from the common traffic of the citizens.

1) According to the Vulgate: juxta iū, xraeospi eis.

because leprosy is contagious and a community needs a clean and strong people. He gives the example of Miriam, the sister of Moses, who was excluded by the command of the Lord [Num. 12:14]. If she was not spared so that she could have remained in the camp, then no one should be spared. Others want to understand it like this: Take heed lest thou commit such a sin as to be beaten with leprosy, as Miriam was beaten with it, or if thou be beaten with it, that thou do as a leper ought toward the Levites.

Sixth. He who calls in a debt shall not enter the house to take what he pleases, for that is violence (as our cruel usurers 1) do with debtors, robbing them of what they want by judicial power), but what the debtor brings out according to his ability he shall take. Then it shall be returned before sunset, if he should be poor and in need of it. Of course, this law allows to reclaim what is his, which is forbidden by the gospel, 2) even though it prevents violence. But in a civil nation, such laws, which are somewhat lenient, are necessary in order to avoid greater evil. For if reclaiming did not take place, the worthlessness of idle people would find nourishment, and the fortune of the godly and good would be exhausted. Although the godly suffer both in faith, the law and the authorities must not tolerate this, just as the godly also bear all other evils, and the sword is nevertheless an avenger against the wicked, which a godly can also use for others, as I have said elsewhere.

Seventh. 4) One should give the poor his

1) äünisias of δανειστής. The Wittenbergers and the Jena edition seem to have taken this word for a proper name, formed from "Dan", because they write it with a capital initial.

2) The words: guoā svanMliuw xroUiüst are missing in the Wittenberg.

3) Instead of camouflage in the editions may well be stiarn to read what we have assumed.

4) Here the Wittenberger has again: 8sxto and darnach in the following wrong counting.

He does not reserve his reward for himself, lest he cry out to the Lord 2c. This and the preceding law also show sufficiently how God takes care of the poor and afflicted, so that all who are abandoned and oppressed in the world can take comfort in God. At the same time, they teach that in times of need, the debts of the poor should also be forgiven, and that they should be helped in a well-ordered community, so that an intervention (actio) because of debt claims only takes place against the idle and frivolous.

Eighth. "The fathers shall not die for the children" 2c. That is, the wicked are to be punished in such a way that the good are not also injured at the same time, as in the Gospel it is forbidden to pluck up the tares for the sake of the wheat, lest the latter be injured. For if a guilty person cannot be punished without an innocent person being injured at the same time, the evil person is to be tolerated rather than the good person injured at the same time. This law is necessary for persons in authority, so that they do not, in a tempestuous excitement of the mind, let the severity of the law prevail, and by punishment sin more than he who deserves the punishment. Such is the case when a whole community is involved in war because of a villain, and similar things.

Ninth. "Thou shalt not bend the right of the stranger or the orphan, nor take the widow's garment in pledge." All these laws, as you see, are ordered for the sake of love and mutual goodwill. That the right of the orphan shall not be infringed includes at the same time that no harm shall be done to an orphan or a stranger. And the widow's dress also generally means everything she needs to live. Higher than all debts and rights is the law that the poor person is entitled to the necessary food and clothing, which he is not to forego so that the creditor may be paid, but the creditor is to forbear and give so that the poor person may live. And he adds the cause [v. 18.], "Thou shalt remember that thou wast a servant in Egypt," as if to say: As thou wouldst have been would do to you. For as thou hast been a servant, so mayest thou be made a servant again. So learn by your own example what you owe them and what you should do.

Tenth. What is left over in the fields, vineyards and oil gardens is not to be collected but left for the poor. This confirms what has already been said, that one should not only leave food and clothing for the poor, but also give them some of our abundance, so that they may share in our goods in their need, remembering again what we would want to happen to us in our need, as he says here, "Remember that you too were a servant in Egypt," and that it may happen again that you must be of service. I believe that Moses here acted very richly and clearly on the seventh commandment: "Thou shalt not steal," where it is forbidden to do harm to external goods and commanded to look to the benefit of one's neighbor.

The outcast woman is the synagogue and all the sects of the works saints. The "unwillingness" or the nastiness is the seemingly beautiful righteousness of the works, which is full of ungodliness and hardness of heart. The bill of divorcement itself is the testimony of the Scripture, which Christ gives into its hand, which it also bears against itself. The second man is the law. When he has died, that is, after the law has passed away, he [the first man, Christ] does not accept her again, even so, if she does not believe; for the synagogue never returns to its first glory, nor is it accepted again by its first husband after she has married the other, even though he dies, because Christ does not admit the righteousness of works apart from faith in him. The new husband is a neophyte in the faith who is not to be placed in the public preaching ministry, as Paul says [1 Tim. 3:6]. It can also mean Christ who rules the new believers kindly and does not immediately expose them to the cross and persecution until they become strong. So he is cheerful with them for a year, that is, he gives them peace and joy in the word just accepted, because the wedding party does not bear sorrow as long as the bridegroom is with them, Matth. 9,<sup>1</sup> ) 15.

It is rightly said that the lower and the upper millstone mean hope and fear, or the law and the gospel. For the law, the word of wrath, is the upper millstone; it sustains fear and humbles through knowledge of sin. The gospel, the word of grace, sustains the conscience through faith, so that it does not stand in fear. Both preaching is necessary. In a general sense, however, it means that not too much should be done on both sides, so that you neither punish sin too severely nor treat the sinner too kindly, neither comforting him too much nor frightening him too much. For guilt means sin, for the sake of which the lower millstone is taken away if punishment is too much; in turn, the upper one is taken away if indulgence is too much.

To steal a citizen means to turn him away from faith through false teaching (verbo) and to hand him over to works and external righteousness, which seeks reward and makes rich thieves, that is, godless teachers, John 10:8: "All who came before me were thieves" 2c. But he is killed by the gospel, that he may live, or eternal death is announced to him.

It is quite clear that leprosy is the plague of spiritual wickedness, therefore one must carefully guard against it according to the judgment and ministry of the Levites. For a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump [Gal. 5:9].

He who reclaims the debt does not receive what he wants, but what the debtor carries out to him, that is, the sinner is not to be atoned (mulctandus) according to our arbitrariness, but according to what he can bear, and if he is completely poor and weak, then everything must be restored to him and let up for the sake of the weakness of the flesh, according to the words Gal. 6,<sup>2</sup> ) 1.: "If a man would be overtaken by a fault" 2c. "Before sunset", that is, before he is in despair.

or be consumed by sadness, as Paul says [2 Cor. 2:7].

Thou shalt immediately give the laborer his wages, that is, to those who are oppressed by labor and wearied by the burden of the law and tormented by an evil conscience, thou shalt preach the word of life and exhort them to faith, or else he cries to heaven, because the oppression of consciences is the greatest tyranny; this [cry] 1) God, who is reconciled, soon hears against the tyrants of souls, unless his wrath be there, in which he punishes the whole world.

The Father is not to die for the Son, that is, even though we all die in Adam's sin, that sin is remitted after the gospel is revealed. And whoever

1) To Huum Will have to add about full olnmntium.

After this he no longer dies in his own sin but in the sin of others, as Ezek. 18, 2. 4. proves that it will happen that every man dies in his own sin. For now the teeth of the children are no longer blunted because the fathers ate herbs, because it now happens in the spirit, so that whoever dies dies because of his unbelief.

That the rest of the harvest and the grape harvest be left for the sinners means, since we gain everything through faith in Christ, that we should leave our remaining things to serve the sinners, so that they also may live with us through faith and the word which they have from us. And we must not live in the flesh as if we alone wanted to believe and be saved, but we should know that we live for this reason, so that we may also be useful to others for life and salvation.

The twenty-fifth chapter.

First, a law is given concerning the punishments of transgressors, that those who are not to be punished by death or money, but by beatings, shall be punished according to the measure of their transgression, only this shall not exceed forty [strokes]. The cause is given: lest your brother be despised and abominable before you. He wills, therefore, that the punishments shall not be inflicted according to our will or out of revengefulness, but according to a moderate rule and with regard to respectability. This is befitting for a righteous community.

Secondly. "Thou shalt not bind up the mouth of the oxen that thresh" [, this is commanded], that they, being exercised by kind conduct toward the beasts, may become the more benevolent toward men. But it is a proverbial saying, which Paul richly interprets in 1 Cor. 9:9 ff. so that he says: "Does God take care of the oxen? Although God cares for the oxen, he does not write this for the sake of the oxen, since they cannot read, so that Paul's opinion is: This saying will be

This is not only understood by the oxen, but in general by all workers, that they should live from their work, as Christ also says [Luc. 10, 7.]: "A worker is worth his wages. Therefore, he who does not give a worker his living, or does not also give him all kinds of good things, Gal. 6,<sup>2</sup> ) 6. is the one who ties the mouth of the ox that is threshing.

Third. The law that one should take the surviving wife of the brother and raise up seed for the deceased brother was given for a very good reason. First, the reason given in the text is so that the generations would not perish but be increased, which serves to elevate a community and make it stronger. Secondly, that in this way God provides for widows and the wretched [female] sex, that they should be taken in and fed, since a single (per sese) woman is a weak and wretched vessel, and even more so a widow who is both abandoned and despised.

2) In the issues: 6n1. 5.

But he compels this demonstration of love by an exceedingly great disgrace, that he should be called a barefooter, and one should spit before him: Fie on you! that he should be worthy that all should despise him and spit at him on the earth and say: You are a fie on you, because he does not want to build up or increase the community in which he lives and whose rights he enjoys. But the unshod foot shall be a sign of shame and a cause of eternal disgrace, that he is worthy to be barefooted also, that is, without gender (familia) and subordinates signified by the shoe, since he makes himself a barefooter by this one act of not wanting to edify his brother's gender, so that the sign is similar to the act by which he sins.

Fourth. A woman's hand shall be cut off without mercy, who, to save her husband, seizes by the shame another man who contends with him. Truly a foolish law, as it reads. But this is to say that a woman, because she is fainthearted, is wont to do harm where we are most hurt. For example, such a tongue, which is ready (levis) to speak evil and to revile, easily injures the good reputation, since it attacks first of all that of which we are to be ashamed. This means the bodily seizure of shame, by which the person of the man is also greatly injured and violated (cogitur), and yet it is a feminine violence, which is even more effective (vincit) than the strength of a man; to say nothing of the shamefulfulness and shamelessness, which this law also condemns in a woman, although in this case it is useful and necessary for the woman and the man, so that the general opinion of this law could be that one should not do evil, so that good may come from it.

Fifth. Right weight and right measure must be maintained in a community, so that the poor and the neighbor are not cheated. This also applies generally to all commutationes in all contractuum, that the seller give just and equal (aequa) goods for the money of the buyer. For here the

The people's greed has led to unbelievable unworthiness and artifice in altering, adulterating, dressing up and decorating the goods, so that it must be no small matter of concern that the authorities take good care of the community in this respect.

Finally, he commands that the Amalekites be utterly destroyed under heaven because of the cruel outrage that they not only did not refresh those who were weary on the way, but even killed those behind them with shameful deceit.

But that he commands the Amalekites to be destroyed, he does not do so that they should avenge themselves, but God avenges himself through the hands of Israel. Otherwise, if He had wanted them to seek their own vengeance, He would not have delayed it so long, since those who had been injured had long since died, but He would have allowed them to avenge themselves immediately at the same time. Therefore, we are taught here that only this is true vengeance, which is not carried out according to our will, but at God's command and for God's sake, so that we alone are instruments of God's vengeance, and do not presume anything of vengeance, as you see here.

The exactly determined measure of the blows, so that the brother does not go around in a terrible way, means that the flesh is to be chastised in such a way and the sin is to be punished in such a way that its vices are oppressed, not that it itself is destroyed. The number "forty" also means elsewhere all stages and the epitome of the killing of the old man in the Scriptures.

That one should not bind up the mouth of the ox that threshes, can also mean, in addition to the simile (metaphoram), of which we have said that it means that the servants of the Word are entitled to a living from their office, according to the secret interpretation (allegorice), that a teacher should not be forbidden to preach the Word freely, by which he consumes stubble and hay, that is, converts the godless people and incorporates them into Christ.

The brother's wife left behind is the synagogue or the church which the deceased

Christ left in the world as a barren woman, because he did not receive from her the children of the law. We therefore receive her and impregnate her with the Word, so that she may bear children not to us or to our name, but to Him and to His name, so that, though we teach the people, we do not teach them otherwise than in the name of Christ, so that the children begotten by the Word may not be called Pauline, Apolline, or Petrine, but Christians alone, that we may build His house, not our own.

But whoever does not want to do this, the church should accuse him as one who wants to teach for himself and not for Christ, who does not want to please God but men, who does not want to draw the disciples to Christ but to himself. Therefore she should publicly take off his shoe, that is, deprive him of the authority to teach, and make the declaration that his word is not "a doing of the gospel" [Eph. 6:15], as Paul says, so that all may know that he does not walk rightly, booted in the gospel truth, as Paul did to Peter. Further, let it spit out before him, that it may bring him into contempt by the opprobrium of the name of heretic, that he may be called a barefooter, that is, a heretic who walks not in the shoes of the gospel.

The two men who quarrel with each other are the law and the gospel, or rather the teachers and ministers of the law of works and the gospel of grace. These are constantly arguing about works and righteousness. The woman who has the shame of the other man

The one who takes hold of it is the wise people, who want to settle this dispute by forbidding to teach and [enjoining] to teach in a certain way, thereby hindering the ministry of the word. Their hand shall be cut off without mercy, that is, their work and conduct shall be utterly rejected, because this dispute will not be ended for eternity unless God is judge. Wrath and strife shall indeed be cut off where it concerns the matter of love, but in matters of faith it can never and must never be cut off, because there must be divisions [1 Cor. 11:19].

That two weights are forbidden and equal weights are commanded, that is, that a sincere nature (simplicitatem) is maintained in the church, so that we have one mind and opinion, which Paul often mentions [1 Cor. 13:11].

That the Amalekites are to be slain means that by the word of the Spirit those are to be slain who not only do not comfort the weak in faith and those who are weary in the way of God and those who are wearied by many tribulations, but add to it the pain of the wounds and kill the wounded. The 109th Psalm, v. 16, gives you an example of this, saying: "Because he had so little mercy" 2c., therefore [Ps. 69, 29] they "shall not be written with the righteous" 2c. For it shall be declared unto them that they are worthy of eternal death, as indeed they are.

The twenty-sixth chapter.

V. 1. ff. When you come into the land 2c.

After the explanation of the holy ten commandments is finished, he concludes in this chapter all the sermons that have been preached about the commandments by adding, as it were, as a corollary or instead of a conclusion to the speech, the customs of offering the firstfruits and tithes, thus confirming the covenant between God and the children of Israel.

But thou seest how beautifully he teaches to set the words [v. 3. ff.] in the offering of the firstfruits, that we may know that this offering is nothing else but a praise and thanksgiving for deliverance from enemies and for the possession of the land, not unlike when an hireling confesses by his interest to his lord that he has his field by the grace of him. But the firstfruits were the [fruits],

| which they offered to the priests on the feast of Pentecost, of which it is said in the 16th chapter. So he does with the tithes in the third year, teaching that they are to be given to the Levites, the fatherless, the widows and the strangers, with the confession that they have fulfilled the work of love. "I have brought" (saith he [v. 13.]), not for sacrifice, but to a special place, where in every city such tithes were collected for the poor, as it were into a sack (bursam) or common box. "I have not transgressed Your commandments (namely, as far as this work is concerned; otherwise, who fulfills even One commandment completely?), nor have I eaten of it in my suffering (that is, I have not done it sorrowfully but cheerfully, for a cheerful giver is dear to God), nor have I eaten of it in uncleanness" (that is, not with sins or uncleanness, but in holiness I have set it apart). For the sacrifice of the unclean is as little pleasing to [GOtte] as the sacrifice of the afflicted. "Neither have I given of it unto the dead," for thereby he who does this would also be defiled, and so the offering of tithes would also be defiled. V. 16. Today the LORD your God gives you 2c. These are words of the confirmed covenant, that they should keep the aforementioned commandments, and he adds the promise that if | they would keep the commandments, the LORD would make them high above all nations in glory and honor and honor, which he did as long as they kept the covenant. And this is the end of the holy ten commandments and [other] commandments. Now what is dealt with in the following chapters are some ordinances to be kept according to the occasion of the time, exhortations, orders, curses and blessings, to remind the people to keep the commandments of God. The secret interpretation of the firstfruits has been sufficiently discussed above [Cap. 15], that they signify the confession of faith and the thanksgiving of the righteousness of the Spirit, since we confess at the same time how great an affliction we have been subjected to, from which the Lord has delivered us, and how great goods we have received through faith. But the bringing of tithes means that we are completely given over to the service of our neighbor through love, as Paul says (Gal. 5, 13.): "Through love serve one another." But this does not happen if you have not first fulfilled all the commandments of God as one justified by faith and are righteous. Further, cheerfully, not sadly or unwillingly; finally, without impurity, that is, not desiring to be repaid in kind, but out of a simple and pure heart. You shall not give anything to the dead, that is, there shall be no unfruitful work in love, but it shall all be living, holy, free, joyful and pleasing to God. |

| V. 1. ff. And Moses and the elders of Israel commanded the people 2c. What he commanded here about the altar that was to be erected on Mount Ebal from unhewn stones and about the law that was to be written on it is a temporal commandment that was to be fulfilled only once. Joshua also fulfilled it after he had taken the city of Ai, Jos. 8, 30 ff, | There the blessings and the curses were read before all the people, and the burnt offerings and peace offerings were offered, as Moses says here, admittedly in order to provoke (as I have said) the raw people by this outward show, so that they would be mindful of the law, since they are more moved by outward ceremonies than by mere, naked words. This altar later achieved great aer- |

The people sacrificed there and served God, puffed up by the example of the fathers, who sacrificed there only this one time, by order of Moses, who had commanded that this should happen. For the woman of Samaria also held this against Christ, John 4:20, saying, "Our fathers worshipped on this mountain." But they did not see that this temporary commandment did not have to be made a perpetual example, since they had elsewhere the express command, Ex. 29, 1) 10. f., that they should sacrifice in the place which the Lord had chosen, which Moses also repeated so often in this book [Cap. 12, 14, 16, 2.]. But the place he had chosen was always certain, namely, where the Ark of the Covenant was, over which he had promised to dwell among them, so that we see that we should not trust and base ourselves on the example of the fathers or a past word of God, which has already ceased with a past event (facto), but only on the present word of God, which concerns a present fact.

This is to be noted in this chapter, that Moses chose for the blessings the more respected (potiores) tribes, namely Simeon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, Joseph (which includes two tribes, Ephraim and Manasseh) and Benjamin, and so here are seven tribes, all children of the free, Rachel and Leah; but to the curses six tribes, the children of the maidens, Zilpah and Bilhah, with the two sons Reuben and Zebulun of the free, Leah. Perhaps because the blessing is more honorable and worthy than the curse, so it had to be adorned with the more distinguished tribes.

Again, here he lists no blessings but only curses, since he ordained seven tribes to bless, and in Joshua it is written that they also proclaimed the blessings [Jos. 8, 33. f.]. I think this is because Moses wants to show that he is a servant of sin and death through the law, which keeps all under the curse, Gal. 3, 10. And finally, this people of the law is also ruined by the curse.

gone. But Joshua adds the blessing to signify Christ, who brings blessing to all who [desire] to be done away with the curse of the law [and] groan after him. And Judah also is here ordained for Christ's sake among the number of them that should stand to bless, because he should come from Judah.

Moses also took care that where he spoke of blessing, he added [v. 12] "the people," saying, "to bless the people," but where he spoke of cursing, he omitted "the people," saying [v. 13.], "to curse"; then that he commanded rather of the blessing than of the curse, that the blessing was first, as that which is more excellent, better, and more desirable for the people, but the curse abhorred, so that he had rather let it stand, that it might not affect the people.

But this stone altar, on which the other law (Deuteronomy) is written, is, according to the secret interpretation, the people of the law itself, on which the law of works is written as on a hard heart, which does not yet have the spirit that softens (the heart). Furthermore, the unhewn stones are the Israelites themselves, who are indeed outwardly ordered by the law in appearance, and are neatly smoothed with lime to form an altar, but in themselves they remain inwardly unworked, and have a heart that is unwilling against the law.

The two mountains mean that the people are divided into two parts, namely that among them there are those who keep the law in the spirit; these are on Mount Ebal and inherit the blessing; but the others who only express the law by works without the spirit are on Mount Grisim and are under the curse, Gal. 3:10.

But here one must not pass by the apostle Paul, who is a wonderful interpreter of this passage (Gal. 3, 10.): "Cursed be every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law, to do them." For this he interprets in an affirmative way, in this way, as he says: "For those who deal with the works of the law are under the curse."

For it is written: Cursed be every man that abideth not. "2c. For what more wonderful thing can be said than that he who practices the law with works is said not to abide in the words of the law or not to prove them [in his life] (confirmare)? How can it be that the same one who does it [the law] does not do the words of the law? Shall it be said that he who does not lie with his sister, with his mother-in-law, with his stepmother, with his cattle, lies with them? And shall he then be accursed because he lieth with them, seeing he lieth not with them? For the same way of speaking applies to any part of the law as to the whole law, so that he who, doing one thing, does not do it, is equally cursed, as he who, doing the whole, does not do it.

Although I have said enough about this in my [shorter] interpretation of Galatians 1), I must repeat it briefly because the occasion demands it. Paul reads Moses in the spirit - as he says Rom. 7, 14: "The law is spiritual, but I am carnal" 2c. Therefore, because the flesh does not fulfill the spirit, it is impossible for any part of the law to be fulfilled, much less the whole, as he says Rom. 8:3: "For that was impossible for the law (because it was weakened by the flesh)." Therefore, if you look at the outward appearance (larvam) of the works, there are many who fulfill the law, at least in many pieces, and so they do not seem to be under the curse, like the hypocrites. If you

1) In Galatis INS18. This refers to the "shorter interpretation of the epistle to the Galatians" found in our edition vol. VIII, 1352 ff.

But if you look at the spirit that has read the law, there is no one who fulfills even one letter or one tittle. And so all are under the curse, and those most of all who practice the law by rote with works, without the spirit within. For these do the works, either forced by the punishment or irritated by the benefit, in constant hatred of the law, and so they do not fulfill it while they fulfill it, do not do it while they do it. For they do it with the hand and with the work alone, but refrain from doing it and do not do it with the heart. But God looks at the heart [1 Sam. 16, 7], and according to it He judges by His spiritual law.

So it is true that he who is flesh alone without the Spirit lies with his mother-in-law, sister and cattle, and does everything that is forbidden, and omits all the commandments, while he does not lie with them, and while he does not do what is forbidden, and does not omit the commandments, for if you look at the outward work, he is holy, but if you look at the heart, there is no work so shameful that he would not do it if shame, fear, and punishment did not oppose it, so that Augustine rightly said: There is no sin that one man has done which another man could not do, for we are all of One substance, One flesh, having all the same wickedness, being thus corrupted and accursed by the first sin of Adam. It follows, then, that the Jews were most deserving of the curses in chapter 28 even when they shone through the most apparent works without the Spirit, as can be seen from all the prophets, who echo their hypocrisy and scare them with such curses.

The twenty-eighth chapter.

V. 1. ff. And if thou shalt obey the voice of the LORD thy God, that thou shalt keep 2c.

As this chapter is the longest, it is also the easiest, for it contains nothing more than a large heap of blessings and curses, by which he continues the previous chapter.

and explains. Therefore, we have nothing concerning history that we can interpret here, 2) only that we say that one must consider it from the heart (affectu), how terrible it is to be under the law. For these curses, or those that resemble them, are borne by the conscience that serves sin, that feels anguish and shame in all things, for "the wicked have no peace" [Isa. 56:21], and no place is safe, no hour tranquil (secura), no creature reliable. Again, these and such blessings are enjoyed by a pure and godly conscience, to which everything is lovely and favorable (applaudunt).

Hence, also, after all the curses, gathering them, as it were, into one main sum, he describes the evil conscience, saying [v. 65.], "The Lord will give thee a trembling heart, and faint eyes, and a soul withered through sorrow." For thus the consciousness of sin by its nature makes fearful men, so that they are startled even by the rustling of a flying leaf, Deut. 26:36. and, as the poet says, He blanches at any lightning. Then it makes the face sad and pale; for as a merry heart makes a merry face (as Solomon [Proverbs 15:13] testifies), so a sad spirit digs wrinkles in the forehead, so that the poet again calls happy the one who does not blanch because of any fault. Moses calls such a face here "languishing eyes", because the eyes are the most prominent part of the face, in which cheerfulness or sadness is most evident. But the soul, withered away by sadness, is all life in the outward senses, sad, depressed, sullen, and morose, so that the man has no desire to live, and yet is afraid to die, as follows:

V. 66. f. And your life will hover before you. Night and day you will be afraid, and you will not be sure of your life. In the morning you will say, "Oh, that I might live to see the evening! In the evening you will say, "Oh, that I might live to see the morning!"

I have not yet seen a passage that expresses the sorrow of an evil conscience more clearly, with such puffing and appropriate words and sayings. For so stands the heart which has offended God, that is, which is tormented by the consciousness of sin. It also fears there (as the psalmist [ille Ps. 53, 6.] says), where everything is sure. But Isaiah has summed it all up in One Word and says [Isa. 57, 20.]: "The wicked are like an impetuous sea that cannot be still." Thus the wicked are driven by the storms of thought, fear, distrust, despair, so that in truth they can be compared to a turbulent sea.

But it is not necessary to think that he wants the whole people to be subject to all these curses, and everyone to every curse, just as it is not to be understood that the whole people should be honored with all blessings, namely, that everyone should receive every blessing, but it is enough that all this is fulfilled in such a way that one takes a part for the whole (per synecdochen). While all blessings are given to the godly, this is done in such a way that they are distributed: one gets these, another those, the whole people and all get some; likewise some [blessings] at always another and another time: so also the curses must be distributed among persons, oerters, times, and a certain number (numerus), so that some are given to all (as captivity, desolation, servitude), some for a time (as tribulation among the enemies), some to some people (as pestilence, diseases, expulsion). 1) And this is the reason why the wicked do not feel their curses enough, again, the godly seem to be subject to many curses, while we do not see in each one all the individual blessings.

According to the secret interpretation, by these bodily curses are signified all the damages and destruction that human statutes and twisting of the Scriptures produce in the wicked. There is lack, hunger, thirst, fever, heat (ardor), festering, various pestilences, gluttony (devoratio) of children, imprisonment, servitude, disgrace, ignominy, futile labor and loss of all goods. But while all this happens and is carried out, it will not be felt before the rage and frenzy of the mind, which is enchanted by those abominations. It will but are felt afterwards. And here is not a distribution of the ills according to places, persons, times and number, but every soul suffers all these ills at the same time and forever.

1) This last bracket is set by us for the sake of uniformity.

Again, those bodily blessings signify the heavenly blessings with which we are to be blessed in Christ. Here is abundance, supply, riches, health, strength, salvation, victory, honor, glory, and the fullness of all goods, and even these are not only distributed in part (per synecdoche) to persons, places, times, and numbers, but everything is available to all always and everywhere.

The twenty-ninth chapter.

V.1 These are the words of the covenant which the Lord commanded Moses to make with the children of Israel in the land of Moab, the second time after he had made the same 2c.

This chapter with the two that follow is, as it were, the last sermon that Moses preached to the people, and it contains exhortations and reminders and other things of this kind to put the law to their hearts. And he says that this covenant was made "in the land of Moab the second time, after he had made it with them in Horeb," that is, it was renewed for the sake of those who were not in Horeb and were born in the meantime, when their fathers died in the wilderness, so that they should not think that the law, which was given to the fathers and was not kept by them, did not concern them. Therefore the lawgiver Moses had to live so long that he also renewed the law to the other generation.

V. 2. ff. You have seen all that the Lord has done 2c.

Ye, saith he, and your eyes have seen, as he speaketh unto the seed of them that have seen these things, but they themselves have not seen them, being born in the wilderness, and all the fathers were dead, except Joshua and Caleb, in whose stead they came up. Unless this is understood to be said of the descendants who were almost grown up when they went out of Egypt, and by the fathers who had died [are understood] those who were in full manhood, and, as the text says, the men of war who were from the twentieth year and above had been counted, 4 Mos. 1,<sup>1</sup>) 3. that in such a way Moses addresses those who were nineteen years and under at the time of the exodus from Egypt or at the time of the counting, then the word of Moses could not exist. Or one would have to say that he speaks after the figure of speech of the synecdoche to those who belong to the people, although this had already died, except for two 2c. who had seen these signs. But I like the first opinion better.

Moses speaks this in the manner of a reproach and uses this former harshness to make the admonition sharper, as if he said: "See to it that you keep the commandments of God better in the future than you have kept them up to now. For even though you have seen all these things, you have not become more understanding and obedient, "for (he says) the Lord has not yet given you until this day a heart to understand, eyes to see and ears to hear". Therefore it is to be feared that he may not give you these things in the same way hereafter. Therefore you must be anxious and diligent to earn this grace through humility, that you may obtain an understanding heart, hearing ears and seeing eyes.

Here you see that it is not enough that signs are shown and the word is taught, if there is not also the spirit inside, which teaches. Thus Pharaoh with his own did not turn to the signs of Moses, and the Pharisees blasphemed even the signs of Christ. So great is the hardness of man's

1) In the editions: Nurne. 2.

The heart is so weak that it will not be moved by signs and wonders, it will not be instructed by words, it will not be frightened by threats.

And it is quite clear that from this passage the prophecy of Isaiah Cap. 6, 10. is taken, and similar ones, which the evangelists, since also the same hardness [of the Jewish people] moved them,<sup>1</sup> ) so repeat (Matth. 13, 14. Marc. 4, 12. Luc. 8, 10. Joh. 12, 40.), by saying: 2) "Blind their eyes, and let their ears be thick" 2c. And obviously Moses indicates by this word that those who deal with the works of the law would be such people in front of others that they do not keep the commandments of God, since he is sure that not all will be given this grace. Therefore, he speaks in such a way to humble and frighten them, if there were such people who realize that it is not in their power to keep the law, and would humbly ask God for His grace, as spiritual people do; but the presumptuous hypocrites do not.

After that he repeats the benefits that for forty years in the wilderness their clothes did not become stale and their shoes did not become outdated, that they did not eat bread and did not drink wine and intoxicating drink, by which the LORD showed them and they should know that he was their GOD, namely, that he could feed and clothe them without human intervention (opere), as he said above Cap. 8, 3: "Man does not live by bread alone, but by every word of GOD" 2c.

Then he tells of the victory they had over the two kings of the Amorites, and that the land had been divided among them, and concludes, "Keep therefore," 2c., "that you may act wisely in all your doings," that is, that you may wisely and happily carry out all that you have undertaken. For this is what the Hebrew word [XXXXXX] expresses: "that you may act wisely," as it is written of David (1 Sam.

18, 30] that he acted more wisely than all the servants of Saul, as it is also said to Joshua [Jos. 1, 7]: "That you may act wisely", that is, happily and prosperously, and not commit foolishness; but this will happen when they will keep the law of God.

Then he confirms the covenant by listing by name all the ranks (ordines), the rulers, the officials, the elders, the tribes, the children, the women, the strangers, except for the hewers of wood and the drawers of water, so that all and every one, both those present and those absent, would know that this covenant concerns them. Moses certainly could not have spoken these words alone in such a large nation, for how could all hear him? It is therefore necessary that he had this preached in a prescribed sermon by the priests and Levites at different places in the whole people (per populum).

But he beats and preempts the secret malice of the heart, by which many console themselves inwardly when they hear the threats and curses of God, and say: It will not be so bad, and remain so secure in their wickedness. This is what most of all, deceived by the pretense of godliness, do the idlers and the idolaters, who believe that what the law threatens does not concern them, as can be seen in all the prophets. For as godliness by its nature brings with it the fear of God, so godlessness and hypocrisy bring security. Against this security of the godless Moses now proceeds very sharply, until the end of this chapter, as do all the prophets, and says before that they are most threatened by curses and desolations, so that they, reversed (subversi) like Sodom and Gomorrah, become the talk (fabula) and the mockery of the whole world.

And Moses shows in this passage that his sermons thunder especially against the hypocrites and works saints, who presume to fulfill the law without the Spirit, so that from this passage the prophets have taken a large part of their sermons against the same hypocrites and idolaters. Therefore he calls such a person a root that bears gall and wormwood, using the following words

1) Wittenberger: wonente instead of: movents.

2) In the form, as here, the saying is found only in Isaiah, but not in the Evangelists. Therefore it can hardly be doubtful that instead of "tioentss in the editions cioeiitis (referring to Esaiaes) must be read, after which we have translated.

bitter words and things attack the bitter and pernicious hypocrisy. These words are also used in the Epistle to the Hebrews [Hebr. 6, 8], 1) and almost also by Peter in the Acts of the Apostles, Cap. 8, 23, against Simon the sorcerer. So such a teacher of works is a root that bears gall and wormwood, for he brings bitter fruit by his teaching and examples, that is, the works of the law without the Spirit, which are sweet on the outside through false appearances, but on the inside they trouble and embitter the conscience. That is, they portray God as bitter and angry, since He is blasphemed by such righteousness, ascribing to our powers what belongs to His Spirit.

"So (he says) the drunken woman goes along with the thirsty." "The drunkard" he calls a teacher who is full of his own opinions in the law of God. Therefore in the prophets, especially in Isaiah, much is said about this drunkenness and spitting and wine (Isa. 28, 1. Jer. 25, 27. 48, 26.]. But "the thirsty one" is the listener who is eager to know godliness and accepts and drinks everything without any distinction.

1) The words "gall and wormwood" are not used in the briefs to the Hebrews, but: "thorns and thistles". Therefore, "these words" is to be interpreted by "bitter words".

At the end he adds [v. 29.], "The mystery of the Lord is revealed unto us, that we should do all the words of this law." This also belongs to the sharpness of the exhortation, as if he wanted to say: The mysteries which God thinks concerning us, that He may curse the ungodly and bless the godly, and all that He wills that we should do, are revealed to us, and not to other nations, but not in vain. As if he wanted to say: Therefore fear. He who reveals these things reveals them for this reason, to frighten you, so that you may be sure that all these things will happen if you do not keep all the parts of this law.

The thirtieth chapter.

V. 1. ff. Now when all this comes upon you 2c.

In this chapter, Moses attaches the hope of repentance and the promise of forgiveness of sins if they repent, so that those who would recover through the instruction of the tribulation would have something to take refuge in, namely these promises, as King Manasseh turns to them. For just as the hard and sure wicked need a hard and severe rebuke, curse and threat, as we saw in the previous chapter, so the crushed and humbled and terrified need a sweet and wholesome promise and comfort. And Moses, in this chapter, truly holds out to them glorious promises of grace, so that he says [v. 5] that all good things will be shown to them, that they will be much more than before, [v. 9:] that the Lord will rejoice over them, so that the text is easy for the reader.

V. 11. ff. For the commandment which I command thee this day is not hid from thee 2c.

This passage the sophists draw on that they say, it is possible for us to fulfill the commandments of God, yes, it is easy for us. For these blind readers fall in such a way that they understand what Moses says: "It is not hidden from you" (Non est supra te = it is not too high for you) in such a way: It is not beyond your strength, nor is it impossible for you, and do not consider that if this were true, one would seek God's grace in vain. For what is it necessary that the grace of God should help me in what is possible for me and not beyond my strength? If they had had the Hebrew text, they would have taken much more out of it and would have been puffed up. For the Hebrew says thus: "This commandment, which I command thee this day, is not marvelous unto thee nor heavy." Because XXXXXX means sometimes the miraculous and heavy, which exceeds our forces, and to which we are not able to reach. But we want to come to Moses now.

In this passage, Moses wants to show the way in which God's commandment is fulfilled, and first says: "It is not hidden from you, nor is it too far away," that is, you think that the commandment can be fulfilled immediately when you hear it; therefore, if it were not heard, you might say: I would do it if it were there. Now that what I am to do is not there, who will bring it to me from heaven or from beyond the sea, that I may hear it and do it? But it will not be fulfilled by hearing and by a work, but rather when the word will be in your mouth and in your heart. In the mouth, I say, and in the heart it must be, if you want to fulfill it, not in the ear or in the hand. Wherefore in the text these two passages are to be observed, the one [v. 12. 1: "That we may hear it and do it," the other [v. 14.], "In thy mouth and in thy heart." In these two passages, I say, lies the meaning (vis) and understanding of this text.

For there are two kinds of doers of the commandment; the first of whom he says, "That we may hear and do." These, presuming on their powers, immediately say and boast that they do it when they have heard. These do not assert (causantur) their powers, but hearing, and say, If we but hear, we shall do it straightway. This Moses rejects, and says of the others, "The word is in your mouth and in your heart," that is, it claims the heart, not the hand. But it is not in the heart unless it is written in it by the Spirit of God. For in the heart is what I want, what I love, what I like, what pleases me. That therefore the law should be in the heart, that is, that it should be loved, which is impossible for our powers. This the 37th Psalm has followed, saying [v. 31.], "The law of his God is in his heart," and the first Psalm, v. 2: "He delighteth in the law of the LORD." But if the law is loved in the heart, it is fulfilled in truth, for the law requires a heart (affectum) which loves it and has pleasure in it; so is done to him enough and so it is fulfilled, if one loves it. So Moses is clear: "The word is in your mouth and in your heart that you do it", as if he wanted to say: You will not do it unless it is in your mouth and in your heart.

But why does he first say, "In your mouth," before he says, "In your heart," since it is in the heart rather than in the mouth, because it is loved rather than taught? He does this to indicate the way in which the commandment of God is fulfilled, that this is done through the word of the gospel, which is first preached with the mouth, then believed through the sermon (auditu). So Moses directs the people by this text to another future word, which, received with the heart, produces love against his commandment, as if he wanted to say: You will not fulfill my commandment if you hear it, but if you love it with your heart. You will not do this if the word is not preached with the mouth and believed with the heart. So my commandment will not be difficult or distant.

It remains that we now look at Paul Rom. 10, 6-8. who cites this passage differently than Moses has, saying, "Righteousness by faith thus saith, Say not in thine heart, Who shall ascend into heaven? (This is not different from bringing Christ down). Or, Who will go down into the deep? (This is not different from bringing Christ from the dead). But what does the Scripture say? The word is near you in your mouth and in your heart. This is the word of faith which we preach" 2c. Here we say first of all that Paul intentionally did not want to quote Moses literally, at least in the first part, but in a rich (abundant) spirit took the opportunity from Moses to write a new and own text, as it were, against the works saints. That is why he also omitted the part that is set twice in Moses [v. 12 and 13]: "And get us to hear and do it." Further, he does not say that it is written thus, but he says that righteousness by faith speaks thus. But afterwards, where he quotes Moses literally, he says, "But what saith the scripture?"

to indicate that it is the words of his Spirit and not of Moses that he ascribes to righteousness by faith, even though there is a similarity (analogia) between them.

In the simple sense, Moses and Paul agree in the last part, because Paul wants that through the words: "The word is near you" 2c. it is taught that one believes with the heart for righteousness through the word of faith. Moses wants the same thing when he pronounces the sentence (sentit) that his commandment is fulfilled when the word is in the heart, that is, when it is loved, which happens through faith. But what Paul plays on the occasion of the words of Moses: "Say not in thine heart, Who shall ascend into heaven? This is not different,

For to bring Christ down," 2c., he thunders against the works saints. For since these fulfill the commandment with their works and out of their strength, they deny that Christ ascended into heaven and descended into hell, that is, they deny that he died for us and rose again, so that we might be justified by the word of faith and fulfill the law. For he looks upon their heart, saying, "Say not in thine heart, Who shall ascend into heaven?" as if to say: The ungodly does not believe that Christ has gone up to heaven, but draws him down from heaven, because he does not believe that through his resurrection faith is given, which fulfills the law.

The Thirty-First Chapter.

V. 1. ff. And Moses went and spoke these words 2c.

"He went away after the preaching of the law, the exhortation, the threat, and the way of fulfilling the law were finished, and everything that his ministry required of the people was accomplished. But after he had returned, that is, on another day, he spoke what is written in this chapter. It is written how he prepared himself for death, took leave and promised that the nations should be destroyed, how he appointed Joshua as his leader, how he commanded that the law should be written and read every seventh year, and how he made a song in remembrance. And so Moses concludes his sermon in this chapter. For the 32nd chapter contains this song, the 33rd chapter the blessings; the 34th chapter cannot have been written by Moses.

First of all, he says that he is a hundred and twenty years old and can no longer go out and come in, that is, take charge of the affairs of the people and administer his office. But even this would not have prevented him entirely, if the Lord had not said that he should not go over the Jordan. He therefore proclaims to them that the LORD will be their guide against the heathen who are to be destroyed; but under the LORD Joshua will be their guide in his stead; and he adds glorious promises, saying [v. 6.], "Be of good courage, fear not, neither be afraid of them: for the LORD thy God himself will walk with thee, and will not turn away his hand from thee, nor forsake thee." The same he repeats and speaks [v. 7.] to Joshua, when he was called before the people, and appoints him as leader, so that in such a way both the people and the leader may base themselves in faith on the word of the promise of God, their supreme leader.

After the leader had been appointed and the people had been encouraged, he ordered the law to be read publicly every seventh year by the Levites in the place the Lord had chosen. Then the Lord calls Moses and Joshua and commands them to make a song as a testimony of the future transgression and punishment, for it was certain that they would later fall into transgression.

| because they did not all have the Spirit; since, as Moses testified [v. 27], they disobeyed the Lord while he was still alive, how much more after his death! Finally it is commanded [v. 26] that the book of the law be placed in the side of the ark of the covenant for a testimony against them. And after the elders and officers were gathered together, he spoke the song.The secret interpretation of the dying Moses and the appointment of Joshua has been touched upon above [Cap. 3], therefore it must be briefly repeated here. Moses is the office of the law, | which does not lead to perfection, that is, to righteousness, but it shows sin, and requires grace, which it does not confer, therefore he dies and departs on this side of the Jordan in the land of Moab, that is, in the righteousness of works. Joshua follows him as a leader, that is, the ministry of grace, and leads the people into the land of promise, that is, to the true righteousness in Christ, as the Israelites pass dry-footed through the Jordan, that is, as both sin and death recede and give way to grace. |

The Thirty-Second Chapter.

| The Song of Moses is full of rebuke and reproach because of the so many and so great benefits that have been shown by God to the ungrateful and wicked people. And he clearly indicates that it will happen that they will leave God, turn to foreign gods, and the aforementioned curses will come upon them. And in this Moses does a work worthy of him (officium), that is, worthy of the office of the law, namely, that he bites, accuses, chides, threatens, curses, and through and through shows nothing but anger, and yet knows well (sentit) that the people are not made any better by it, so that one can also see here, as it were in a mirror, the nature of the law, that it causes anger and keeps it under the curse.V. 1. Take heed, you heavens 2c.He calls heaven and earth, that is, all creatures, as witnesses. And it also happens that when the wicked are afflicted, they think that all creatures are hostile to them. This is done by the consciousness of sin, which is indicated to them by the law. Thus the whole creature agrees with the law as a witness to it.V. 2. My teaching drips like the rain 2c.But he wishes that his teaching may trickle and flow like the rain and the dew, | like the drops and downpours on herbage and grass, that is, that it may be strong and fruitful, lest he sing in vain and tell a story to a dove, singing of great and necessary things, that is, that one should serve the true God, and of the danger of those who forsake God and turn to idols.He opposes drops, rain and dew to clouds without water, as there are human teachings that are of no use. Therefore he wants his word to be rain, not an empty cloud. He opposes herbs and grass to pebbles, sand and similar unfruitful things, on which it rains in vain, although the rain is beneficial, that is, he wants listeners, with whom his word brings fruit. For both are necessary, that the teaching be wholesome, and the hearer be taught (docilis).V. 3: For I will call upon the name of the Lord.That is, I will sing about calling upon and serving only One God against the idolaters who will be among my people.Give glory to our God alone.That is, do not honor any other God, nor ascribe any glory or power to any, but to ours alone. |
|--|--|

GOtte. For he alone has glory, greatness, power. All other gods are vain, lying and nothing.

V. 4. He is a rock. His works are blameless.

He calls God a rock because he is faithful and reliable to those who trust in him. He calls his works wholesome, blameless, perfect works, and speaks of the works that he works in us and all the godly who worship him in truth, contrasting them with the works of vanity with which we, having invented them from ourselves, serve either GOD himself or other gods. These [works] are not blameless and perfect, but rejected and condemned.

It is the same thing that follows: "All that he does is right," that is, the whole life of his faithful is right and true, going along in word and commandment, not in his own ways and opinions. Thus "God is faithful, and there is no evil in him; just and pious is he." He says all this of God, provided one serves him and believes in him, not only of God according to his nature, as when he said against false gods and those who serve them: Whoever serves this God is certain to have a faithful God with whom he is at peace. In this service there is nothing evil, but only justice and righteousness, and all this is faithful, certain and well founded. On the other hand, the idolatrous have nothing certain, nothing faithful or certain, but they waver, since their conscience is always inconstant and uncertain, so that everything they live and do is only wickedness and evil, however much they may appear otherwise.

V. 5. The perverse and wicked kind fall away from him; they are stains and not his children.

Thus he says of them that it will come to pass with them that they will not remain in the wholesome doctrine and the right service of God, but, as it is wont to happen with an evil, adulterous kind (as also Christ [Matth. 12, 39.] calls them), they will be corrupted, so that now they are no longer children, because of their shamefulness and their corrupt service of God, which they themselves invented, but bastards, yes, adversaries.

V. 6. Do you then give thanks to the LORD your God, you foolish and foolish people? Is he not your Father and your Lord? Is it not he alone who made you and prepared you?

Here he begins to reproach the ungrateful people, and see how fervent and exceedingly violent words he uses. For all this (he says) that GOD is just and pious, his works are blameless 2c., and that he is your father, which was highly to him that he obtained you; likewise that he made you when you were not a people, and made you a ready people, that is, prepared you and made you, that all might go forth well; for all these things (I say) you pervert and pervert all things, so that now you are no longer children of such a father, but a perverted kind, following after strange gods and after their own lusts.

V. 7. Remember the former times until now, and consider what he did to the fathers of old. Ask your father, and he will tell you; your elders, and they will tell you.

He begins to enumerate in order the benefits that have been poured out on the ungrateful people and have been lost on them. He used "your father" in the singular instead of the plural, as if he wanted to say: If you look at the ancient fathers, as Abraham, Isaac and Jacob and their descendants, you will see how much good he did you in those, how much he cared for you.

V. 8 When the Most High divided the nations and scattered the children of men, he set the boundaries of the nations according to the number of the children of Israel.

The first blessing is that although he is God, and God of all nations, since he scattered them, Gen. 11, 8, and divided the whole earth among them, he gave to each nation its part and its border, as Paul teaches in the Acts of the Apostles, Cap. 17, 26, following this verse, yet he did not choose all of them to be the people whose God he was in particular by true and right worship, but he set boundaries so that only where the children of Israel were, his people would be; but where the children of Israel were, his people would be.

the border of the children of Israel ceased, then the people of God should cease, and the borders of the Gentiles should begin.

V. 9: For the Lord's portion is His people, Jacob is the cord of His inheritance.

That means, his people does not extend further than Jacob or Israel is. For by these words it is described how this people is specifically God's people.

V. 10 He found him in the wilderness, in the arid desert, howling. He led him and gave him the law. He guarded him like the apple of his eye.

That is, he made a covenant with him on Mount Sinai, where he found him and accepted him, after which he led him around in the wilderness and instructed and protected him so that he never lacked anything. This is the second glorious blessing.

V. 11: As an eagle carries out its young and soars over them. He spread out his wings, and took him, and carried them on his wings.

With these words he indicates how he took care of them in the wilderness, carried their customs, and tried them and did them good, so that they learned to fly, that is, to trust in him, as we saw in Cap. 8.

V. 12. The Lord alone guided him, and no foreign god was with him.

That is, under Moses, the true service of God went on in the wilderness. God Himself went before them both by word and by the outward guidance of the cloud and the fire.

V.13. He made him come up on high on the earth, and fed him with the fruit of the field, and made him suck honey from the rocks, and oil from the hard stones.

This is the third benefit that describes the wealth that was given to them in the land of Canaan. Canaan, namely, that they dwelt in a high and excellent land, and were abundantly fed by the fruits of the field, that is, he gave them to dwell in an good and fertile land. Then he says in a poetic way and in figurative speech that honey is sucked from the rocks and oil from the stones, namely, the land is so good that where there is no field, but rock and stone, there is still oil and the bees carry honey, since the oil trees also like to grow in stony and barren places, and the bees carry honey everywhere, even where there is no field.

V.14. Butter from the cows, and milk from the sheep, with the fat from the lambs, and fat rams and goats with fat kidneys, and wheat, and watered him with the blood of grapes.

Here, too, he describes in a poetic way, as it is wont to happen in songs, the wealth, that they should be fed with butter and milk and fat lambs, and with fattened rams, and with rams with fat kidneys, that is, which were also well fed and fattened.

Another translation has translated thus: "And with rams of the children of Bashan", because the translator did not know the Hebrew way of speaking, that "child of Bashan", that is, a child of fatness, is the same as fat, as a child of the year, that is, a yearling; a child of peace, that is, a peaceable one; a child of death, that is, doomed to death. Thus he calls the wine "grape blood", because in those countries red wine grows in general.

V. 15. But when he became fat and full, he became horny. He became fat and fat and strong, and let go the God who made him. He despised the rock of his salvation.

That is, the one who made him and saved him from all evil, in whom he should have trusted, he, puffed up and satiated by wealth, neglected by devoting himself to other gods, as follows:

V. 16: And hath provoked him to zeal by strangers, by abominations hath he provoked him to anger.

Those who should have been grateful to him for this, turned and irritated him rather, by they forgave him evil for good, as we see in the histories, how they fornicated with foreign gods. A satiated belly does not endure godliness, because it stands in safety and does not care about God.

1) Namely the Vulgate, which offers: Lt srietum Worum Lasan.

V. 17. They sacrificed to the devils of the field and not to their God; to the gods they did not know, to the new ones that were not before, which your fathers did not honor.

That is, the idols in the field, namely in groves, in valleys, on mountains, of which nothing was said to them in the Law, of which they had also heard nothing, but after their ears pricked; as soon as someone brought up some new worship, they flocked to it most strongly, and left God, whom they had learned from their fathers.

V. 18. You have forgotten your rock that begat you, and you have forgotten God who made you.

This is a bitter rebuke and reproach of ingratitude that they forgave so much evil for so much good. Therefore now follows with what punishment they should be beaten for such a great guilt.

V.19. And when the Lord saw it, he was angry with his sons and daughters.

The wrath is all the more terrifying because the sons and daughters offended such a great father with such and such great sins.

V. 20. And he said: I will hide my face from them, I will see what shall befall them at the last, for it is a perverse way, they are unfaithful children.

"That the face of God be hid" means that they become blind, that they neither recognize nor find him, however much they seek and call him. The meaning of this is known from the antithesis [Ps. 80:4], "Let thy face shine, and we shall recover." He calls them "unfaithful," that is, those who are not children in truth and in heart, but outwardly pretend with a fictitious appearance (hypocrisy) of works, and boast that they are children.

V.21. They have provoked me against that which is not God; with their idolatry they have provoked me to anger. And I will provoke them again in that which is not a people; in a foolish people will I provoke them.

That is, just as they have forsaken me and accepted another god, which was not to my liking, so I will again reject them and accept another people, which will also torment them greatly, as happened according to the testimony of the apostle Rom. 11:25, when the Gentiles were accepted through the gospel. Therefore, the Jews are angry to this day in an unforgiving way that we say they are not the people of God and claim that we are the people of God, according to this verse.

V.22. For the fire is kindled by my wrath, and shall burn unto the lowest hell, and shall devour the land with her increase, and shall set on fire the foundations of the mountains.

"The fire" here does not mean fire alone, but under the fire [is meant] the whole desolation, as was the fire of the king in Babylon and of the Romans, where the land, though not the whole land, was burned and laid waste, as in Jerusalem and other places, where also not one stone was left upon another. This means that he says it will burn to hell, that is, there will be nothing left on earth, neither buildings nor vegetation, but also the ground itself and the mountains where the buildings stood will be burned, as if the fire wanted to burn from above through the earth into hell, as we see in the places that are devastated by fire.

V. 23. I will heap all calamities upon them; I will shoot all my arrows into them.

The arrows mean here the plagues and the omission of the divine wrath. And he himself now describes these arrows and evils in the following verse by saying:

V. 24. They shall faint with hunger, and be consumed with fever and sudden death. I will send the teeth of beasts among them, and the poison of serpents.

Here he mentions four or three arrows, famine, fever, pestilence, wild animals, after which he adds the sword in the following verse, and the prophets often repeat these plagues. Our translation (the Vulgate), which says: Cum furore trahentium super terram, has not taken into account that this is a poetic paraphrase, as it is used in songs, and that "those who drag themselves along in the dust" (trahentes in pulvere) are called the snakes.

V. 25. The sword shall take them away outwardly, and inwardly terror; both young men and virgins, babes with manhood.

That is, all protection is taken away from them, and everything they can trust.

V. 26. I will say, Where are they? I will lift up their memory among men.

That is, after everything they have is destroyed and made into nothing, they will be mocked: Where is your kingdom now? Where is your priesthood? Not as if nothing or no Jews were left, but that they will have no certain place, kingdom or priesthood, as all other nations have. And "that their remembrance may be abolished," that is, that nothing more may be praised of them, as before, that they were anything, or could be anything, after the manner of other nations, and as they were before.

V.27. If I did not provoke the wrath of the enemies, lest their enemies should be proud, and say, Our power is great, and the Lord hath not done all these things.

He says this because he has at times postponed this wrath and has also delivered the unworthy, and those who did not deserve it; but this he has done for the sake of his name, so that he would not be blasphemed by the idolaters. So in this verse he cancels the boasting of the Jews and preempts it, since they might want to say: We are not as wicked as Moses sings, nor does he sing of us, for, as experience testifies, God has often wonderfully delivered us. To these he answers: This has not happened by your merit, who always have kept everything that was said before.

Because I had accepted you as a people, I am forced to take care of my name for you, who are exceedingly unworthy of it. But I will not do this forever, nevertheless your deserved end will finally come.

V.28. For there is a people where there is no counsel within, and there is no understanding in them.

That is, they care for nothing, neither for anger nor for mercy, nor do they care how their cause stands before me; they presumptuously imagine that I am merciful to them, while I am angry. Therefore they are not anxious to get counsel for themselves and to mend their ways.

V. 29. Oh that they would be wise, and hear these things, that they might understand what is to come upon them hereafter!

All this is said because they do not consider their present condition and their future punishment, as if they were sure that they were good and hoped for the best, while by far the opposite is true and imminent.

V. 30: How is it that one shall chase a thousand of them, and two shall make ten thousand to flee? Is it not so that she has sold her rock, and the Lord has delivered her up?

That is, through the Babylonian as well as through the Roman captivity they were supposed to realize from experience that they were abandoned by God, since one Gentile put a thousand Jews to flight, while before the opposite happened, that one put a thousand Gentiles to flight, Deut. 26, 8.

V. 31 For our rock is not like their rock, for our enemies themselves are judges.

This is understood to say that the other gods and worshippers of the gods themselves admitted that the God of Israel was such a God that if he did not surrender it, no one could overcome his people Israel, but if he surrendered it, they could never stand, as Balaam therefore advised the king of Moab that he should cause the people to sin, and then he would be victorious. So here Balaam is one of the witnesses, of which Moses says here, who said glorious things about God. Witnesses are also the Egyptians, who said, Ex. 14, 25: "Let us flee from Israel, the LORD fights for them." Witnesses are also the Philistines, 1 Sam. 5, 7, who were afraid of the Ark of God. Thus no gods have so assisted their peoples, so shown their power 2c. For there is no other nation so highly exalted, as is said above Cap. 2, 25. is said.

V. 32 For their vine is of the vine of Sodom, and of the field of Gomorrah; their grapes are gall, they have bitter berries.

That is, instead of the sweet fruit, they bear the exceedingly bitter and evil fruit of idolatry, and are worthy to perish like Sodom and Gomorrah. For he says everything with fierce indignation against the godlessness and idolatry that rages under the name of God and among the people of God.

V. 33. Their wine is the poison of dragons and the gall of fierce vipers.

That is, its doctrine and life is so harmful and poisoned that it incurably poisons very many, because it is worked in vain by so many prophets 2c. It remains a poisoned vine.

V. 34. Is not this hidden with me and sealed in my treasures?

That is, I know all this wickedness and keep it hidden, even though I am outwardly forced to do good to these wicked because of my name. But they do not see what is decided about them with me, therefore they are safe. Therefore he frightens them with this serious threat, so that they may see, not how much good they have received as unworthy, but how much evil they have deserved, lest anyone think that he has a gracious God because of this, because he showers him with goods, but then be most afraid of what is hidden with him and sealed up in his treasures.

V. 35. Vengeance is mine, I will repay. In his time shall her foot slide; for the time of her calamity is at hand, and her future hasteth on.

This he says, because at last the larva of good deeds will cease, under which they are safe, but the punishment will come forth, which has so long been postponed for the sake of his name, namely, that they shall be made nothing at all among the Romans, which they have long and always well deserved. For so their foot slid, that their kingdom was no more. And so you see that Moses clearly prophesies that the end of this people will come one day, that is, of its kingdom.

V. 36 For the LORD will judge his people, and have mercy on his servants. For he will see that their power is gone, and both the shut up and the forsaken are gone.

That is, he will not spare even his people, so that they will not boast that they are his people. But he will be reconciled, regardless of the person, only with those who serve him, that is, with the survivors of the people who have been converted to Christ. Otherwise, their power will be gone from all of them, so that even the closed and abandoned will be gone, that is, nothing of the kingdom will be left in the land of Judah, because all of them will be scattered among the Gentiles.

V. 37. And they will say, Where are their gods? their rock in which they trusted?

Thus both the conscience and the persecutor scorn them. Then they will see what they have been and done under their security, who their God has been, and whom they have served, as follows:

V. 38. Of which sacrifice they ate fat, and drank the wine of their libation. Let them arise and help you, and protect you.

While they thought that at that time they were eating from the sacrifices of the Lord, but now they see too late their idolatry (vanitatem).

V. 39. Do you see now that I am alone, and there is no God beside me? I can kill and I can bring to life, I can strike and I can heal, and there is no one to deliver out of my hand.

Thus, experience teaches what they have not learned before under the security.

V. 40. For I will lift up my hand to heaven, and will say, I live forever.

This is said in the manner of a swearer, or one who boasts that apart from God no one (nihil) can boast either of his being (esse) or of his life (vivere), but he alone says, I am, I live; namely, so that he may be feared and our presumption destroyed.

V. 41. When I shall sharpen the lightning of my sword, and my hand shall take hold to punish; then will I again avenge myself upon mine enemies, and recompense them that hate me.

That is, terrible is my vengeance because it pierces through (and cannot be stopped, like lightning) by my enemies, whether they be Jews or Gentiles.

V. 42. I will make my arrows drunk with blood, and my sword shall devour flesh, over the blood of the slain, and over the prison, and over the uncovered head of the enemy.

This vengeance will I repay (says he), that my arrows shall be full of blood, and my sword shall not wound, but devour the bodies: so many shall be slain, so many shall be taken captive. Then also the Head of the enemies will be bare, that is, they will be deprived of the kingdom, that they shall be scattered throughout the world without the glory of the kingdom.

V. 43. Rejoice, all you who are his people.

That is, the Gentiles will be united in faith with the believing remnant.

For he will avenge the blood of his servants.

Namely, those who kill the prophets and apostles.

And will be gracious to the land of his people.

Namely, [the people] who are left of Israel who have converted; to them he will prepare a new kingdom under Christ, amen.

V. 48. And the LORD spoke to Moses 2c.

Finally, he describes the commandment of the Lord from the death of Moses, how he showed him the whole land of Canaan, but did not allow him to go in because of the sin of unbelief he had committed (admissum) at the Haderwasser. The mountain Abarim is the same as the mountain of Arabia, on the top of which is the mountain Nebo, on the top of [the mountain] Pisgah [5Mos. 34, 1.], on which Moses went up and died.

The Thirty-Third Chapter.

This is the blessing that Moses, the man of God, blessed the children of Israel before his death, saying, "The Lord came from Sinai, and rose up to them from Seir; he came forth from the mountain thereof, and came with many thousands of saints.

I understand this to mean the glorious and magnificent (insignificant) arrival of the Lord in the land of promise. For there he came, starting from Mount Sinai, where he gave the covenant of the Law, and rose from Seir, that is, he passed through the land of Seir to Canaan, and so he came like the rising sun to be with a new kingdom to enlighten that land. It is the same that he came out from the mountain Paran, because he passed through there in the borders of Edom. He came with many thousands of saints, that is, with the people of Israel, of whom there were many thousands, though not every one was holy; yet there were baptizing saints, because many of them were holy.

At his right hand is a fiery law to them.

Whether thou wilt understand this indeed of the law of Moses, wherewith he ruleth them in his right hand, that it burn in the spirit and loved, namely by the saints, or [whether you want to understand it] by the fire rot with which he led them, I do not argue about that, although the former understanding pleases me better, because it was an extraordinary boon that this people was entrusted with the law, the word of God.

V. 3. How he loves the people!

Namely, since he so dwells with them, wanders with them and has as it were intimate contact in this whole procession through the desert 2c.

All his saints are in his hand.

That is, "his saints," namely, of the people or in the people; "are in his hand," that is, you defend them, because that is how you love the people.

They will sit at your feet and learn from your words.

That is, this too is a pledge of his love, that he has instituted the ministry of the word in this people, where the hearers can sit at his feet and hear his word, as in the synagogue and in the temple or in the tabernacle.

V. 4. 5. Moses commanded us the law, the inheritance of the congregation of Jacob 2c.

Here Moses talks about himself, what kind of man he was after his ministry. First, that he himself brought the law, of which he has already spoken. Secondly [v. 5], that he was in the full power (plenitudine) of a king, when the princes of the people were assembled with the tribes of Israel. That is, he was among them instead of a king and by the power of God and in the place of God, so that, beyond the written law, he also governed them by utterances (oraculo) of the living voice from the mouth of God.

V. 6. Let Reuben live and not die, and let his mob be few.

The same blessing it is that Jacob gives Gen. 49:4 [Vulg.], "Thou shalt not grow," namely, that he should not perish altogether because of the sin he committed against his father.

V. 7. This is the blessing of Judah: Lord, hear the voice of Judah.

This is understood by the kings of Judah, who often achieved victory, more by faith and prayer than by the sword.

And bring him to his people [Vulg.]

That is, to rule over Israel and Judah.

Let his power be great, and let him be helped against his enemies.

That is, may he become strong in faith and be delivered from enemies; for this kingdom has suffered many enemies.

V. 8 And unto Levi he said, Thy judgment and thy light abide with thy holy husband, whom thou temptedst in Massa, when ye disputed at the water of the Hader.

He wants to say: The priesthood and your office be blessed, both with praying and teaching, as it was with Moses in the desert, whom you tempted. For "right and light" is what Moses put in the tabernacle (hosen), Ex. 28, 29. f., by which one received God's answer (oraculum) in things that one wanted to do.

V. 9. 10. He that saith to his father and to his mother, I see him not; and to his brother, I know him not; and to his son, I know not; they keep thy speech, and keep thy covenant. They shall teach thy statutes unto Jacob, and thy law unto Israel: they shall put incense before thee, and whole sacrifices upon thine altar.

That is, there will be many hypocrites, both in works and words, because their hearts are not righteous. But those who have first died to the world, and live and serve God alone, do and teach righteousness. Such people are required by the law, whose incense and sacrifice is acceptable. He thus indicates what the servants of the Word should be like, namely, dead to the world. This is what Moses desires, saying:

V. 11. Bless his wealth, O Lord, and let the works of his hands be pleasing to you.

That is, whatever he has to accomplish in the service of the word, let it go out blessedly, that it may please thee and bear fruit among the people.

Break the backs of those who rebel against him and of those who hate him, that they may not get along.

That is, let the false prophets and kings and princes and hypocrites who oppose his fortune with their idolatries (vanitatibus) not prosper.

V. 12. Benjamin, the beloved of the Lord, will dwell safely with Him; at all times He will protect him, and he will dwell between his shoulders.

Perhaps Moses says this because the tribe of Benjamin dwelt between the tribes of Judah and Ephraim, both of which were royal and powerful, and had the temple in its tribe.

V.13. And to Joseph he said, His land is in the blessing of the LORD. There are noble fruits from heaven, from the dew, and from the deep that is below.

This is that he has a gracious heaven, whereby everything grows abundantly to him, so that heaven, earth, seas and everything is salutary to him.

V. 14. There are noble fruits of the sun, and noble ripe fruits of the moons.

That is, the sun and moon are favorable for the fruits of the earth.

V. 15. And from the high mountains toward the east, and from the hills for and for.

That is, that both the first and the last mountains, which are in front and behind, all have abundance, although in my opinion this all seems to be figurative, so that you must understand that the kingdom of Israel is in bloom, since the sky is favorable, and the dew, and the deep, the sun, the moon, the ancient mountains, the hills of the world, that is, since God and men give it everything, kings, princes, the great, the rich, the peoples and the common people; namely these different estates he indicates by these different names. For of the fruits of the land he says immediately [v. 16.]: "And noble Fruits of the earth and what is in it," that is, everything that the earth produces and that animals and men beget.

V. 16: The grace of him that dwelt in the bush come upon the head of Joseph, and upon the crown of Nasir among his brethren.

That is, the grace of Christ was upon them, that there might be an abundance of prophets. This also happened, because the kingdom of Israel had many prophets.

V. 17. His glory is like a firstborn ox.

That is, it is a handsome realm of power and men.

And his horns are like unicorns' horns.

That is, kings and princes and dukes who are exceedingly strong for war.

With the same he will push the peoples to the house, to the end of the land.

Namely, of the land of Israel by driving them out.

V.18. These are the thousands of Ephraim and the thousands of Manasseh. Zebulun, rejoice in your exodus; but Issachar, rejoice in your tents.

He uses opposite allusions. For Zebulun has his name from living and staying, and from this he says that he rejoices in his going out. Again Isaschar has his name of the wage, which is increased by the going out, and from this he says that he is glad to remain at home. He wants to say: Blessed are you, Zebulun, if you go out; blessed are you, Issachar, if you do not go out but stay.

V. 19. They will call the nations to the mountain and there offer sacrifices of righteousness.

This seems to me to belong to the history of Deborah, where Barak, after an army had been gathered on Mount Thabor, carried off the victory over Sissera [Judges 4:4 ff].

For they shall suck the multitude of the sea, and the sunk shooters in the sand.

That is, they will have an abundance of goods supplied by the sea and metals of the land.

V. 20. And to Gad he said, Blessed be Gad the space maker; he lieth as a lion, and taketh away the arm and the crown.

This seems to me to have been fulfilled by King Jehu, who made room for the fear of God after the servants of Baal had been destroyed, and like a lion, after two kings had also been bravely slain, broke through, as it were, the arm and the crown [2 Kings, chap. 9 and 10].

V. 21. And he saw that a head was given to him, a teacher who is hidden.

I believe that this is said of the good prophets who were safe under Jehu in his kingdom, who were previously cast out among the servants of Baal, so that the singular ["one teacher"] stands for the plural. "One teacher" (portio doctoris) thus stands for many teachers (collectio doctorum).

Who came with the rulers of the people, and established the righteousness of the LORD, and his judgments upon Israel.

For he led the rulers and the people away from those idolatries, therefore he was also praised by GOD.

V. 22. And to Dau he said, Dan a young lion.

For they fought valiantly against Lais or Lesem [Richt. 18, 27.]

It will flow from Basan.

That is, they will be green from the city of Dan to Bashan.

V.23. And to Naphtali he said, Naphtali shall have enough of what he desires, and shall be full of the blessings of the LORD.

For the land of his tribe is fertile, as in Galilee.

Towards evening and noon will be his possession.

"Noon" namely of the Galilean Sea.

V. 24. And to Asher he said, Asher be blessed with sons.

Namely, he had many offspring.

Let him be pleasant to his brothers.

That is, he has a lot of favor.

And dip his foot in oil.

That is, it will have a lot of oil.

V. 25. Let iron and brass be on his shoes.

That is, 1) he has a lot of ore and iron.

Let your age be like your youth.

That is, he may excel through powers of the body.

You see that here the tribe of Simeon is left out and not blessed. For what cause, who can know? Because that the Jews pretend that it happened because of the selling of Joseph and because of the fornication with BaalPeor, I do not care about that. Jerome thinks that Judas Iscarioth, who would come from this tribe, deserved this; but let fables remain fables. But it is certain that Simeon did not have his own lot like the other tribes, but he had it in the tribe of Judah [Jos. 19, 1.]. Therefore he must be content with the general blessing that follows.

V. 26. There is no God but the God of the righteous. He who sits in heaven is your help, and his glory is in the clouds.

That is, the one who shows his majesty through thunder.

V. 27. This is the dwelling place of God from the beginning, and down in the world are His arms.

That is, though he dwells in heaven, yet his arms rule in the world, that he may deliver his own, as follows.

He will cast out your enemy before you, saying, Be destroyed.

Namely, by the word alone, he will cast him down.

V. 28. Israel will surely dwell alone, and the eye of Jacob will be on the land where there is grain and must.

1) Instead of iäso in the Erlanger is to be read with the Wittenberger and the Jenaer iä "st.

That is, he will feast in a fertile land.

His sky will be dripping with dew.

Namely, that he might make the land fertile.

V. 29. Blessed are you, O Israel, who is like you?
O people, you will be blessed through the Lord.

Not by human power, like other peoples.

Who is the shield of thy help, and the sword of thy victory. Thine enemies shall lack; but thou shalt tread upon their high places.

As if to say: With your strength you would not be a match for your enemies, but he is mighty who is your sword.

Now compare the song of Moses with this blessing, and you will see opposite things. Because there he condemns the whole people, here he blesses every single one, but for the sake of the promise, which happened to the fathers. Thus, because of a few good people, the blessing is given to the whole nation, and yet, because of the wicked, the nation is finally destroyed with the kingdom, after the good have been separated from them.

The Thirty-Fourth Chapter.

V. 1. And Moses went from the plains of Moab unto mount Nebo 2c.

Moses did not write this chapter, but Joshua or Eleazar, unless you want to say that he described his death in this way, since he knew it beforehand. But that no man was able to find his grave [v. 6], it is rightly said that it was done for this reason, so that the Jews would not make an idol out of it. But it means more that, since the light of the gospel has come, the office of the law is so taken away that the Jews can neither find it nor ever restore it.

But that it is written that Moses, when he died in the hundred and twenty years of his age, was so vigorous that [v. 7.] his eyes did not darken and his appearance (forma faciei) did not decay, this is told as a great miracle, since of the other fathers, as Isaac, Jacob, Eli and others it is written that they had dark eyes because of their old age, and still today those who are somewhat advanced in age decrease in eyes and appearance. Therefore i) it is a wonder that the form of his face was so flourishing that he lacked neither color nor beauty (species), since nature brings it with itself, that old men become shapeless through wrinkles and pale appearance. But this is even more of a miracle in Moses, since he was overwhelmed with so many hardships, dangers and business in his whole life, that it is to be wondered at that he was not exhausted and out of shape before others, or rather died. Our translation [the Vulgate] has: "and his teeth were not moved," namely, deceived by the similarity of the expression, since freshness (vigor [XX]) and jaws (maxilla [XXX]) are written in Hebrew almost with the same letters.

The perseverance (perseverantia) of the vision and power of Moses, according to the secret interpretation, means that the power of the law does not diminish by any length of time, by any amount of works, but always presses the guilty conscience and keeps it in turmoil until it dies, that is, until it is taken away by Christ, through the institution of the new office of grace. But when Christ arrived, the old law was also near its end, according to the words in the Epistle to the Hebrews [Cap. 8, 13.]: "But that which is old and past age is near its end."

Finally, Moses [vv. 10 ff.] is praised for his greatness, that after him there arose no prophet like him in such great signs, which by him were in Egypt and in the wilderness, but especially that the Lord knew him face to face, that is, who was so familiar with God and talked. This is not said for all times, but as long as the ministry of Moses lasted. For all who came after him taught Mose's doctrine (Moses), as lesser ones who were under him and taught by him. But at the same time it is certain, what is said in Cap. 18, that after Moses another one should be raised up, the Mosiah.

Christ, to whom this great Moses should give way, since he is far greater in dignity and power, as we have seen there. This also means that nothing greater can be taught and presented, as far as laws are concerned, than the law of Moses. For everything is supreme in it, except that the great law should give way to the greater gospel.

B. D. Martin Luther's interpretation of some chapters [Cap. 1. 4-9] of the fifth book of Moses. *)

Preached at Wittenberg in 1529.

Preface about this book.

(1) We have now read four books of Moses the prophet, in which we have seen how he gave many beautiful laws to the ancient Jewish people, and how he divided them into two kingdoms, spiritual and corporal. After this we have also heard of many beautiful examples of faith and unbelief, obedience and disobedience of the old fathers and patriarchs, what and how it happened to those who transgressed such laws and ordinances; which then should be an example to us, according to which we should also judge ourselves, and follow their faith, and beware of unbelief, lest we also fall into the misfortune into which they came. For all these things are for us to

This is the example we are to follow, so that we do not fall into an ungodly way of life, as St. Paul admonishes the Corinthians [1 Ep. 10:6].

002 Now we would gladly recite unto you the fifth book of Moses also, that ye might have heard the whole of Moses. Now the fifth book of Moses is no other than a long sermon, so that before his death he blessed the people, and fasted everything in brief that had been taught by him before, and all kinds of stories that had happened, so that they might take it with them, described, into the land of Canaan, where they would go, and not forget such sermons and stories, but read them all their lives.

*) As we can see from the first words of this paper, Luther preached continuously on all five books of Moses. On December 13, 1528, he stood at your 31st chapter of the fourth book of Moses (compare Col. 1362 of this volume), during the months of April and May 1529 Luther's sermons suffered an interruption because of his hoarseness (De Wette, Vol. III, p. X), after his return from the conversation at Marburg, in mid-October 1529, Luther was at the 7th chapter of the fifth book of Moses (cf. in this writing Cap. 6,? 103 and Cap. 7,? 9 ff.), and on the fourth Sunday of Advent, December 19, 1529, he had reached the conclusion of the 9th chapter (Eisleben edition, vol. I, p. 555). After that, the sermons on this book were no longer continued, "because (so Aurifaber says) the Diet of Augsburg followed it in 1530. Only after Luther's death was our writing, which contains the interpretation of Deut. 1-9. (with the exception of Cap. 2 and 3, which Luther passed over because they repeat what was said in the third and fourth book), in 1564 by Aurifaber from postscripts of ltl. Georg Röer, Ll. Anton Lauterbach, superintendent at Pirna, and Philipp Fabricius, former pastor at Ringleben. It is first found in the Eisleben edition, vol. I, p. 484; then in the "Altenburg", vol. IV, p. 707; in the Leidiger, vol. IV, p. 2VS and in the Erlanger, vol. 36, p. 164. We give the text according to the Eisleben edition.

But especially every seven years, at the feast of tabernacles, to read to all the people of Israel, as it is written in the 31st chapter [vv. 10, 11] of this book. For this reason he includes the best of the other books in this one, and at the same time makes an enchiridion or compendium, a short excerpt and summary of the four preceding books, and leaves the rest, so that one might well call Deuteronomy a lengthy sermon, in which he has abundantly deleted or interpreted the ten commandments, and among them especially the first commandment is abundantly traced. For this is the well and the main source of all commandments, laws and arts, and what flows out of this commandment and goes in again is right.

3. therefore, there must be no interpretation of the ten commandments in the Old Testament, because Moses himself had done this with his own special book. So now we call the fifth book of Moses an extensive explanation of the ten commandments; and because you heard in the first four books a short, bad explanation of the ten commandments, and otherwise you also hear the ten commandments preached many times a year, we now want to take before us this extensive interpretation, so that you can see how far and wide their understanding extends. Let this now be the preface, that we take this book before us as an ample interpretation, especially of the first commandment. We cannot preach anything more useful than about God, whether it is about His laws and commandments, or about His gospel and promises.

The first chapter.

V. 1. 2. These are the words that Moses spoke to all Israel beyond Jordan, in the wilderness, on the plains, toward the marsh, between Paran and Tophel, Laban, Hazeroth and Disahab, eleven days' journey from Horeb.

1 Here he indicates the place where Moses preached this sermon, and it is said that this sermon or book was preached beyond the Jordan, because Moses did not cross the Jordan. The Jordan divides the land into two parts: Moses was there in the morning when he struck the two kings, Numbers 21:24, 35, Deut. 2:33, 3:3, and this was the place. First they were at Mount Sinai when they received the law, as it is written in the 20th chapter of the other book of Moses. From that place to Kadeshbarnea is eleven days' journey, or thirty miles, according to our reckoning, for they did not make a long day's journey, because they could not hasten with all their household, their goods and their cattle. Now this is nothing special for the simple, for we are not interested in it, only that one knows where this book was made. Above the eleventh day's journey, they drew four umpteens years. But you have heard the reason why they wandered so long. They had eleven days to travel from Sinai to the Promised Land, and yet they had to spend forty years on it, because they had disobeyed God, disobeyed and disbelieved, and disobeyed God's words, would not follow God, and disobeyed Moses: Then they were all punished, and their purpose was turned back, so that eleven days became forty years, until all the fighting men died who had come out of Egypt, except Joshua and Caleb, who came into the promised land from the same whole multitude; the others, who had been begotten and brought up in the meantime, had to go astray and remain there in the wilderness.

(3) Now you have heard what this example means. Moses always points to it as a great example, that he had to deal with it for forty years, which could have been done in eleven days, as if he wanted to say: This should not be thrown to the wind and forgotten, but should always be kept in fresh memory, sung about and said, so that everyone may take offense at it and be pious. For it is a terrible example against all who disobey God and murmur against Him, so that they may beware, lest they also be punished as the Israelites were punished.

V.3 And it came to pass in the fortieth year, in the first day of the eleventh month, that Moses spake unto the children of Israel.

4 These words indicate at what time Moses wrote this book, namely after forty years, when they came out of Egypt, not more than two months before Moses died; so that the book is like Moses' testament. These are his last words and sermons, so that he blesses the people and repropose God's law and commandment to them, which he has recently compiled here, and as if he had wound it onto a small book 1) or put it into a booklet; item, repeats and reproaches God's good deeds, which he proved to them, since he had saved and led them out of Egypt as a merciful father. He also tells them about all kinds of promises that will happen to those who keep God's commandments; in addition, he gives a serious warning about how God will punish the transgressors of his commandments. Especially in the 18th chapter [v. 15] he preaches about Christ, whom he portrays as a teacher and preacher, whom all the world should hear 2c.

(vv. 5-8) On the other side of Jordan, in the land of Moab, Most began to interpret this law, saying, "The LORD our God spoke to us in Mount Horeb, saying: Ye have been long enough in this mountain, turn ye, and go, that ye may come unto the mountain of the Amorites, and unto all their neighbors in the plain, upon the mountains, and in the valleys, toward the south, and toward the fords of the sea, in the land of Canaan, and unto mount Lebanon, unto the great waters. 2c.

(5) You see that this book is an interpretation of the Law and a narration of the previous history. Moses begins to gloss over the laws he had given, saying, "The LORD our God spoke to us at Mount Horeb (that is, Sinai) and said: You have now been long enough at this mountain."

This is the beginning of this sermon, as if to say: "Dear children, you know that we were at Mount Sinai and received the Law, and God commanded us to go straight to the land of Canaan, which He had promised to our fathers, and according to the command we should soon have entered the Promised Land. Moses does not indicate this in vain, but to remind them of what had delayed and prevented them from entering for so long, namely their own wickedness and guilt, that they had disobeyed God; otherwise they would have entered long ago. It has been a long time, but now it will be over; therefore I will tell you how far and wide is the land where you are to dwell. How he describes the land herewith.

7 Lebanon is a great mountain, greater than the Thuringian Forest. So far shall your land be, unto Phrat, unto Lebanon, and unto the ford of the sea. This was the first command. But they became transgressors, and sent in spies to see the land; and they frightened them, that they would not go away, saying, Who shall enter there? There dwell giants within, which have strong and strong cities; we saw giants within, against whom we are as grasshoppers to be looked upon; therefore we will not enter. [So they failed to keep the promise to themselves, so that they had to stay outside for forty years. This sin touches Moses here, and punishes the unbelief and distrust of the children of Israel.

V. 9-12. Then I said to you at that time: I cannot bear you alone, for the LORD your God hath multiplied you, that ye are this day as the multitude of the stars of heaven. The LORD your God, the God of your fathers, make you many thousands more, and bless you as he has spoken to you. How can I alone bear such trouble, burden and strife from you?

(8) We have seen how Moses begins a long narrative of the great sins for which they had to stay so long in the wilderness and wander about; and he sets forth the cause in many words, why they could not take the promised land, namely, because God had commanded them to go into the land, and they had not wanted to.

1) Kleuel--Kleuel.

After that he sets this text. We must look at it, because it is his teaching for the worldly authorities. So he says, "Before we went out, I had the people in a regiment. He does not speak of the spiritual regiment or of the priesthood, of which it is written in the fourth book, but of the temporal authority, that he took heads from the tribes, and set them over a thousand, over a hundred, over fifty, and over ten. And there also the old little words come from, dean, who set over ten to rule; as we also say: four-man, three-man, two-man, there ten-man, 1) hundred-man, thousand-man and fifty-man 2c.

10 Thus he ordered the people, which is a very fine order. Matth. 2, 6. is also taken from this text: "And you Bethlehem are by no means the least among the princes of Judah"; since Micheas speaks Cap. 5, 1.: Among the thousands of Judah, that is, among as many as may rule a thousand men 2). These words of the prophet are also drawn from this. So far 3) has this order gone down to a thousand; then out of every tribe a prince ruled over the thousand men; and over all the princes at last was Moses. It was a fine order beyond measure.

The first is a dean, that is, ten men carry it to one; for one man can well see ten; then the hundred 4) over a hundred. It is from the measure a beautiful way to govern, lovely and fine order. The government was not so difficult then as it is now, since everything is mixed and blended together. There is no such order in the world now, nor will there be again. It was not in the monasteries. If the fifty men could not settle something, the matter was brought before the hundred 5) men. Now one prince alone shall settle it all. This shows the text here, since Moses speaks: "I can you not bear alone." Necessity drove him to it, and his brother-in-law Jethro instructed him, Ex. 18, 19. ff., that he said, "How can I alone bear such toil, burden and strife from you?"

(12) Take now the text, and let us take it to heart, and let us keep it against all proud and hopeful heads, which would gladly reign; for I would that God would give them enough to reign. It is a great thing for such a one who likes to rule, for he thinks: Moses is a prince, sitting on top; so also: A prince has a fine, splendid castle, wears precious stones, golden chains, velvet; and opens his mouth, holds such against his poverty, little house or thatched roof, and thinks that a prince has it much better than he. So a fool looks at the regiment.

013 But hear how Moses looks, who says here: "I cannot bear you alone; how can I alone bear such toil and burden and strife from you?" As if he should say, "The devil is a ruler!" There is nothing more than toil and labor in it. The more force, the more worry and sorrow. Now I am talking about the regiment itself. Moses says that it is toil and trouble and strife, and that he has nothing to gain from it, because he must be driven and plagued by everyone if he wants to get rid of them in any other way. But if a ruler sees through his fingers and lets evil and vice go unpunished, he is held dear. Therefore, they are great fools who only look at the great splendor and honor, beautiful clothes and golden chains of princes and lords.

014 And if they should consider what is written in the chains of care, and labor, and danger, and toil, they would say, And if they had vain gold, let us take our little hut or our little thatch for it, and let him keep his great castle, saying, God keep me from thy chains of gold and thy pearls. For they are so placed in authority that the tickle passes them by. For whoever wants to be a pious prince, if the world would give him as many gifts, his work is not paid for; a greater reward is due to him.

6) In the original: large.

to it. It is a big thing to govern, and no wise man desires it. Much a bigger thing is it about the spiritual regiment or about the pastoral care.

(15) The peasants do not regard this as such, but as said above [12], they close their eyes to the burden and toil that secular and ecclesiastical rulers have to endure, thinking badly that ruling is nothing else than carrying tame pigeons; but they do not see the burden and displeasure of the people and the devil, whom one must have as an enemy; item, God's judgments, which they must fear. That is why the peasants in the riot said, "We also want to carry marten pigeons and gold chains, and eat partridges. But it is finely made equal on earth. Tell me, how can one have and lead a better, calmer 1) and more peaceful life than that of a citizen or farmer?

16 Our Elector, Duke Frederick, who had also experienced the life of all classes, used to say shortly before his death that the bourgeois life or the peasant life was the best life, because kings and princes had only splendor and appearance, but the subjects had gold. How so? The burghers and peasants sit safely at home, behind the stove, with their fields, house and farm; theirs is well preserved in good peace. What do you think is a small treasure, to have a florin in one's pocket, item, to wear a gray skirt, or a sweaty shirt, or to live in a straw house with peace? It is much better than the prince's treasure, and his collected treasures or golden chains.

17 Duke John, Elector, no prince has a florin in his custody with peace; if there is a war in other countries, he must ensure that such a war does not also come to his principality. What good are his golden cups if he cannot use or enjoy them? You must not do that at all, but live as if you were lord of the land, and Duke John must be your servant and protect you, so that you may have peace and good quarters, and eat your bread in peace. Yes, he must (to speak with vacation) still wipe each one's butt. No one sees or recognizes this, but only one sees: "Oh, I have a house covered with straw, I have to wear a linen smock, I have to lie on hay, and yet I do not see that you are lying behind the stove, I am safe, and I have my quiet life in peace, which no prince has.

(18) Then you should consider that your gray skirt is more beautiful than his marten skirts and other such beautiful garments; so you can sit quietly and not let anyone trample you underfoot and oppress you. Here some other prince writes a useless letter to the Elector; there a courtier gives him a sting; there he may not otherwise eat a good morsel with peace. He has much care, yes, much more care and worry in his marten hood than you have gray threads in your skirt. You are at peace with your wife and children, and drink your coffee more safely than he drinks his malmsey: if you are not at peace, it is your own fault.

Therefore God also commanded that one should honor the authorities, princes and rulers, and pray for them, as St. Paul 1 Tim. 2, 1. 2. says: "I therefore exhort you that first of all one should make supplication, prayer, intercession and thanksgiving for all men, for kings and for all authorities, that we may lead a quiet and peaceful life in all godliness and honesty" 2c. And Jeremiah the prophet exhorts the Jews of Babylon in prison 2) to pray diligently for the king of Babylon; for if it were well with him, the Jews also would have it well, Jer. 29:7. Therefore do not murmur against them, reviling and blaspheming them; for we have more goods than they, though it seems not. For we have more peace in our poverty than they have in their riches. And choose here, whether thou wouldst not rather have one florin with peace, than a hundred with strife.

20. item, tell me if you would not rather have a cow, and eat a bowl full of milk behind the stove, or roast pears with than nine and ninety cows that are not yours, and you would have to be in the same half of them all the time? Will you not say: I let them have a good year, I will rather enjoy with peace, which gives me a cow. In the prince's hood there are many a worry, many a hair on it, for he must have every evil thing wiped on it. He must fear that he does not have the prince as an enemy, or that he does not enrage him in any way; on the other hand, your gray skirt is a piece of gold for the sake of peace and tranquility. The three pieces are better than gold and all treasures. Therefore write about your house: The house of peace, in silence.

I am very angry with the peasants who want to rule themselves, and who do not recognize their wealth, that they sit in peace through the help and protection of the princes. You faint-hearted peasants and donkeys, will you not hear it? That thunder may smite you! You have the best, namely benefit, custom, juice from the grape, and leave the husks and grains to the princes. You have the marrow, and still you should be so ungrateful, and not pray for the princes, and only want to give them nothing? But those who are sensible peasants and citizens are fine people. I heard a farmer say that if he had two cows, he would give one so that he could keep and use the other in peace.

(22) For when there is war, you gladly give ten florins to a lord for peace; but now you grumble when you are to give a penny for interest and bullets. Therefore God will punish you for such ingratitude. Now the peasants in the marketplace rule and do as they please, not content that God lets them sit in peace and quiet. But once a misfortune comes upon you, it will teach you what peace is. Remember this. Now just confidently collect on the register. Old guilt does not rust. Remember this well.

23. the less one would be, the more cheerful he should be, because he has the best, he has the marrow and the juice of the goods, the forsten have only the sleeves. It is the same with a servant, maid, or other servant. The head of the household is always in a more dangerous and troublesome position than the servants, for he must be famulus communi. The master must be his own servant, if he wants to find justice in the house; the wife must be her own maid, if she wants to create counsel in the house. They must bear the care, and so on. The higher a man is, the greater his unwillingness. Moses saw this and said, "I cannot bear all this toil, burden and strife from you.

024 Moses ought not to speak thus, but to say, I am glad that I go forth, and that I wear chains of gold. But he says, "It is a toil, a burden and a trouble, and he complains greatly about it. Who has ever heard that such titles should be given to a regiment or kingdom? Who has made the book that one should put himself into all things and deal with them? Therefore it is a great and dangerous thing about authority, and God has commanded that one should serve the lords with all diligence, and be obedient and submissive to all authority or authority; as St. Paul says, Rom. 13, 1. 2. 4. For the authority that is everywhere is ordained by God," so that "he who opposes authority opposes God's order, for it is God's servant, an avenger of punishment on him who does evil. Item, St. Peter also gives the same in his epistle, that one should be obedient to all authorities, even the unrighteous and evil ones, 1 Petr. 2, 13. 18.

Load.

25 This "burden" has not pressed the pope. "Trouble" in the regiment is that one has a lot to do in a large community or group; there one has beaten another, one has violated his wife 2c. Above this is also "burden," that one must take upon himself all the care, labor, toil and hardship of the regiment, that the subjects may have judgment and justice, protection and protection. This does not come easily to the regents, nor is it sweet; they do not sit there on a collective cushion or pillow; they do not walk on roses, but must leave many a sweat over it.

1) Here the postscripts seem to be deficient. "The three pieces" are probably (816) "a guilder in a bag, a gray skirt, a straw house" with peace.

26 Meanwhile you turn behind the stove, and turn the devil a rotten meat; you do not think of the care of your authorities; you live as if you were a squire; you go to your field and to your garden; but Moses and other authorities must take care, and advise how to protect you and become your servant. Otherwise you should have ten guards to watch over you and your house, and keep your sheep, and yet you should not keep any of them; indeed, you should give a hundred guilders for a good escort over the land. But the prince must provide for all this. Behold, thus "toil" and "burden" are with one another; not only is there toil in ordering the things, but there is also burden in carrying them out.

27 Thirdly, there are the troublemakers. These are vain dragons; there is no pleasure among them, but heartache and hell. All rulers and pious fathers of the house feel this well, what a great thing it is to serve or govern others. I would give you an example, and explain to you what the three things, "burden," "trouble," and "strife," mean; then you would see into a prince as into hell, as Moses also does here.

(28) This is why I have acted and interpreted it, so that I may draw you away from the unpleasant ingratitude toward the rulers and overlords, and that you may not only see the benefit and the good in them, but also consider the danger of ruling. Turn the page and look at the good you have and the misfortune a ruler has, then you will lift up your hands and thank God for it, and gladly be satisfied with your happiness and status, and pay no attention to the slate roof against your straw house. Great saints we are, who become impatient over a small boil or swelling in our body, and do not think that our whole body, on the other hand, is strong and healthy. Yes, it should be ordered to you, God will make it according to your will.

29. God has made it so that each class shall bear its own adversity; and not the unpleasantness, but also the good, shall be borne.

1) Rotten -- lazy. (Dietz.)

in our ranks. And notice this: The lower an office or rank is, the better and better is the same rank. That is why Sophocles the pagan says: "If all the people's misfortunes were gathered together in one heap, so that the judge came and distributed them at the same time, each one would say: Give me back my misfortune; I would rather bear my own than have it distributed at once. It is divided equally enough; the only thing that is lacking is that it be recognized on the right. But because [it] does not happen, the holy scripture tells us that even if the authorities, princes and lords would give their necks and bellies for the subjects, the unreasonable, ungrateful ass, the common man, would soon forget it. So they do: The peasant looks at the small things, that he must give interest 2c., and does not consider the great peace, so he has, and the heavy burden and trouble, so the authorities carry for his interest and bullet. The rebellious peasants wanted to make it so that no peasant should have no trouble; but if the trouble had gone out of one place, it would have been caused again in a thousand places.

(30) Thus Moses lamented that he alone could not bear the burden and trouble of governing the people. From this we learn what a great, difficult and dangerous office it is when one man is to govern another, whether in the spiritual or in the temporal government, that it is the prince's, father's and mother's office, or mine, the preacher's office, in whatever office it may be. Therefore, God also wants to honor the authorities and not to insult or revile them, but to be obedient and subject to them.

V. 13. Create wise, knowledgeable, experienced men among your tribes, and I will set them over you as heads.

(31) These are all the prefaces to the interpretation of the Ten Commandments, as we will hear in the third and fourth chapters, which divide the people into two kingdoms. Now,

2) In the original and in the Erlanger: "not" instead of "right": ,right".
"3) Here "man" is of the neuter gender; in the Erlanger incorrectly: "the other".

there is the text: "Pray to me wise, understanding and experienced men" 2c. Where do you take them? Where will they be found, as he requires people for the regiment here? He sets three pieces that belong to the regent. Such regents and chiefs shall be among them.

32 This text is a pattern and rule for all those who are to be appointed to offices. But where men are born to office, and the government is inherited, as it is with princes and lords, and as father and mother leave to their children a household and a government, care must be taken that they are brought up rightly and well; there is the greatest art in this, that a young ruler may be well brought up. In this place, however, he speaks of those who are chosen and elected to be princes, heads, and thus henceforth rulers. They are to be wise, understanding and experienced people. And afterwards [v. 17] he will set a rule for them, that they judge without respect of person, and that they judge rightly. Cause, for the judgment is God's, 2 Chron. 19, 6. 7.

33 Therefore, the first thing that belongs to a minister is that he be "wise," that is, God-fearing, godly. For the 111th Psalm, v. 10, says: "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom. And after that, that he also knows what concerns his office, and has the rights and laws that belong to it, so that he does not have to learn it first, and does not preside over his office, so that he sits there as a stick or block. For fools should not be set over eggs, they break them. That is why wise and prudent people belong to the princely and governmental state. That is decided right away, who shall rule the world. Force and power will not do it, but wisdom.

No empire has ever existed by force, but it must protect itself with wisdom. If the Roman empire is ruled by force, it will be like the wild forest among the unreasonable animals, where one animal eats another; the fox eats the hare, the wolf eats the fox, and the wolf is torn to pieces by the bear. In the same way it would happen with violent government among men. For he who would be stronger would rise up with his power.

The prince is a single person, and has a great, great crowd, in which there is greater power than in the prince, his kingdom or regiment. The prince is a single person, and he has a great, great multitude, with whom there is greater power than with the prince, his kingdom, or regiment. Therefore the regiment should not be where the greatest power is, as the rebellious peasants thought. So Moses says here: "Provide me with people who are wise, understanding and experienced; not those who have strong fists, not those who are in a mob and want to wield the sword alone, but wise people who rule according to the laws and order that are presented to them.

35 In the same way, Antonius Teucher, Lord of Nuremberg, Emperor Maximilian's high noble memory, answered when he had ridden in there once and a large world of people had rushed to see the Emperor's entry, and the Emperor had asked later: How could this large people be kept in obedience? Then Antonius Teucher, as a wise man, said: Most gracious emperor, by good words and severe punishment. And he spoke wisely, for one must govern with words, with laws and wisdom. Therefore also in the spiritual regime Christ rules through the word, as it is said in the 110th Psalm, v. 2: "The scepter of your kingdom will go out from Sion", that is, the gospel is to be planted and preached from Sion into the world. So the word must also be used in the worldly regime, for there everything proceeds better through wisdom than through force; wisdom is empress in the regime, so that she knows her rights and laws, and judges and passes judgment according to them.

(36) Then they shall also be "prudent," which in Hebrew is Nabon, that is, a diligent man who takes heed that it go according to his wisdom. For so it is in the government, that a man may be hurried by his affections, as, with wrath, envy, jealousy, favor, and go after his own head; and when the blood so rages, it often happens, that one of the laws and rights

Forgets, rules according to his head, and then says he judges according to the laws, as angry, grim and vengeful judges do, with whom flesh and blood float above. In our spiritual regime, we also feel it finely, since the sects and the spirits of the mobs also preach just as we do; but they preach according to their heads and affects, and yet hide and conceal their affects with some sayings of the holy scriptures. To this then belongs a mind that does not let wisdom be taken from it by hope, envy, favor, and the like, but abides by wisdom, and by the same right judges it.

(37) I distinguish wisdom from understanding thus: Wisdom is a common knowledge of what is right, how one should govern. Prudence, however, or understanding, is its own guardian of wisdom, so that one does not allow oneself to be taken in by affectations, by which one is often deceived. For if a wise ruler is also careful about this, and pays close attention to the affairs, so many pleas, cases, complaints, petitions 2c. are not so careful, and a word never enters a magistrate's ear, if he does not pay the most diligent attention to it, and with his wisdom looks keenly on it. Because everyone who comes before the judge adorns his case as best he can, and each party wants to be right, and so can easily deceive the judge. Therefore it is decreed that a ruler should diligently interrogate the parties, as it is said in the proverb: One man's speech is half a speech. For this reason, they should both be interrogated, because each party would like to capture the judge and bring him over to his side.

38 For this reason, a wise man must have a good mind, so that he can protect himself through prudence. I have often encountered this, and it certainly also happens to those who are ordered to interrogate cases, that the parties deceive the judge. We are most lacking in prudence, wit and sharpness, lest one let his wisdom be turned into foolishness by his own enemies and evil mouths. That is why it is finely written in the Old Testament: One man's word alone shall not be heard. And a man has but one mouth and two ears, that a ruler may hear with one ear the plaintiff, and with the other the defendant; as the mighty king Alexander Magnus heard with one ear the plaintiff, and with the other the defendant.

The court has always listened to the plaintiff, and the other ear has been closed to hear the defendant's excuses and responsibilities.

39 For the world is so desperately wicked and evil. If a man has a cause, he usually comes to the judge with both ears covered, and justifies himself and his cause; but if the opposite comes, it is much different. But it happens much more when a man deceives himself by his wisdom. Therefore it is necessary for him to be prudent, and not to be sure in his wisdom; no one believes and relies too much on his wisdom, but examine all circumstances. Now prudence is a valiant wisdom that looks on the redoubt.

Who are known among your tribes.

40 "Known people" are those who have a good reputation in the city, and are fine respectable people, of a good walk; for he does not want to have bad boys. And this point is as good as the previous two. It would be good for such a rule to be in the whole world, so that no one would suffer in the kingdom, nor be accepted into the same 1) community, unless he had a good testimony. For that is where all the trouble comes from, that this rule is not followed; that, especially under the papacy, all strangers and unknown persons are admitted into the cities as mayors and councilors. No one has thought of the word that Moses uses here, "to be known. No one should suffer in a city if he were known in the city and had a good report from his neighbors; and if he already had all that, it may still be God's and his grace that it will turn out well.

One must not seek misfortune and choose an unknown person as a ruler; one should take the smartest and best-known for this purpose; it should nevertheless become as God wills, and may nevertheless be happy. One should not paint the devil on the wall or ask him to be one's godfather, he comes from himself. Governing is such an office that concerns God; therefore, a ruler should be known and have a good testimony. For the devil is the father of lies [Jn 8:44], and where he can call a ruler, he can call a man a ruler.

Il any - some, any.

If he is the smartest, he will only do it gladly. Let every man who is in the regiment reach into his bosom and feel whether he has not often been made a fool of.

42. he shall have a good testimony, that men may testify of him that he is a wise and prudent man, 1 Tim. 3:7. but thou mayest say, where are such now? Where do you take them? Moses and the prophets are now dead, Peter and Paul also dead. What has happened to those whom Moses himself chose to govern? Are they not all hanged on the gallows afterward, Numbers 25:5, who were wise men, men of understanding and acquaintances? Therefore I say that ruling and being in authority is a difficult thing, and I would like one who likes to rule to have enough of ruling. With fear and trembling one should attack ruling. God wants those who are prudent, wise and learned. But where will they be taken from? Do they have to be so wise, intelligent and knowledgeable? They will not be found who are so completely righteous.

(43) Ambitious people make themselves believe that they have great experience and that they are the wisest of all, but they bankrupt others, disgrace and blaspheme them, and want to do everything and master everyone. We do not want to go there yet. God protect us from preachers who please everyone and who have a good report from everyone. If all people thought I was a good preacher, I would never want to be a preacher. The reason is that those who are the smartest can beat the others and reform them. But if you look at them rightly, there is not a grain of wisdom in them; yet they bear witness to great wisdom.

(44) In a city there must also be such people who judge and master all the others, and yet they themselves are the most foolish, or real fools in their skin. Whoever wants to be a preacher must have judges who have nothing else to do but to judge us and to know what to say; but if they should try it for half an hour, they would be like the piper who spoiled the dance. So there were not many of them who thought anything of Moses, but they grumbled against him, thinking him a madman, and sat down to judge him.

against him at all times, even to stone and slay him and Aaron, Numbers sixteenth chapter, vv. 1. 2.

(45) Therefore, choose for offices in a city people who are pious, skilled, experienced, honorable, married, who raise their children honestly, and who are also peace-loving. Whether they are not as prudent and wise as Solomon and Moses, there is no power in it. It is enough that they have a prominent reputation among sensible people. For others, who want to be wise, are glorious, proud donkeys; and when it comes to choosing a ruler, take the one whom you consider pious, and let the donkey go. You will not find the likes of Solomon, David, Moses and Aaron, but if you have a pious, honest man, whether in the village or in the city, take that same honest, sensible man, who has lived his life well, and put him in charge; God will prosper and bless his government. If such men are not wiser than Solomon, they do not have Venice to govern. What they lack and are lacking, then, let them command our Lord God; and if there are others among them who have no pleasure in it, let them go.

(46) Choose wise men to rule in your village or town. You will soon see which is a pious citizen; you can sense it from his outward appearance, just as a schoolmaster can soon recognize and distinguish a discipuli ingenium. I will soon see what a preacher is up to. The play is set for this reason, so that God will have prevented people from choosing rulers according to wealth, money, goods, friendship, favor or force. If we do not choose according to this rule in spiritual and secular government, God will not give grace to rule.

But so the world does not gravel and choose now. Let God say that he is a heretic, unwise, adulterer, or whatever else he wants 2c., but if he otherwise has great friendship, favor, wealth, he will get through. Where is wisdom then? Oh, no one asks. It is right. In the papacy, no one paid attention to whether a bishop was learned, but only whether he had great wisdom.

Let him be noble, powerful, and of noble lineage. If now in the worldly kingdom wise people are to be chosen for the government, how much more should one not choose in the spiritual kingdom according to nobility, good, friendship, favor and the like! One should primarily see whether he is a God-fearing, reasonable, sincere and honest man. For even a craftsman would rather accept a journeyman who is honest in his trade than one who is rich, the child of great men, and yet a knave 2c. Such a ruler is to be honored and promoted, who is wise, understanding and well-known, even if he is poor; not for the sake of favor. Well, that is this piece.

V. 16. 17. And commanded your judges at the same time [saying:] Interrogate your brethren, and judge rightly between every man, and his brother, and the stranger. Ye shall not regard persons in judgment, but ye shall hear the small as well as the great, and shun no man's person: for the office of judgment is the LORD's.

The Lord Christ has the inherent grace not to be afraid of anyone or to pretend. He has come to this, as the servants of the Pharisees confessed, Matth. 22, 16, that he was a teacher who came from God and taught the way of God rightly, and did not inquire of anyone, nor did he pay attention to the appearance of people. We humans, however, all have the defect of judging according to the reputation of persons, or of judging according to favor and fear. Therefore, God commands the rulers here not to look at any person, great or small, and not to be afraid of anyone. These are choice, exquisite words, a golden text; [for] this reason, not a rich or powerful man, but a wise and understanding man belongs to the regiment.

49 So the pagans also said, when, the wise man Bias: When one comes into the regiment, there one sees what kind of man he is. Magistratus ostendit virum. One does not find out what a man is like until he enters the regiment. Before that he is wise and prudent, yea, wiser than a hundred Solomon, in his mind; yea, he hath in one finger thirty Solomon sitting, knoweth and can govern a whole city; but when he is called, he is neither fit to boil nor to fry, in one thing he cannot find a hair's breadth that would be honest and serviceable.

(50) This text is necessary for a ruler to prepare himself and walk along the road, not looking in fear or love or at anyone's person, but walking straight through, putting all circumstances out of sight, putting fear and love aside, and thinking as if no man lived on earth who could harm or serve you. As the matter is, so judge. But there must be a man's heart that stands firm and stiff, just as a stone cliff or rock in the sea stands immovable, where all the bulges, waves and water waves strike and squeeze against the rock. Otherwise, if one lies in hatred, he soon bends justice; and if one judges by love, he lets another enjoy favor and friendship 2c. And there the right must win a waxen nose, there one then also takes a handful of favor, and leaves one a sackful of art or right. So now a man belongs to it, who can stand in the middle, and can let creep there favor, hatred, clamor, harm, and sit free 2) and not respect any of them. But there must be a man's heart. That is why it is necessary for him to have helpers who sit with him in the government and also keep faithfully.

51 But who will help? Moses says: "The office of judgment is the Lord's"; and in the 32nd chapter, v. 35, God also says: "Vengeance is mine, I will repay. This shall be your comfort. In every council house this text should be written, that the Lord says: "I take care of it; the office that one holds is God's office, and those who sit in office sit in God's place, and their judgment is even as that which God Himself judges from heaven; as St. Paul also says to Romans Cap. 13, 2: "All authority is from God, and whoever resists it resists God Himself." And Daniel speaks Cap. 2, 21. , 4, 22.:

2) In Walch's old edition and in the Erlanger: Schaden und Freisitzen, and 2c.

God orders and changes the regiments, and gives them to whom He wills. And where there is no comfort, what should one do? That is the wall, the rampart and the defense, which holds the regiment, whether spiritual or physical; otherwise it would be against the devil and the world, who storm and rage against it, unruly. How could a mayor stand against so many people's hatred and anger without this word? Therefore they do not hold the reign, but the text that is written here: "The office of judge is the Lord's." God is the foundation of all courts and authorities.

This text should be dearer to me than four thousand satellites, for it is first of all a wall and defense of the regiments; a regiment should also groan and rely on it. The devil may oppose it, as has often happened, and would like to throw it all over, but it will return to its former state. This sentence, that the judgment is of the Lord, has protected kings, emperors, princes and lords until now, otherwise they would all have been slain long ago. This should now frighten the subjects and urge them 1) to be heartily obedient to their overlords and to remember: If you disobey them, you interfere with God and sin, not against the mayor or your ordinary authorities, but against God. Therefore the pagans have called disobedience against the authorities crimen laesae majestatis, that [it] is a sin against 2) the majesty, and have not unjustly pretended it, and have also snatched away the heads of the rebels and wanton boys who have set themselves against the authorities.

(53) Secondly, the text is also set for the comfort of princes and all pious authorities, that they may know where their comfort is. If I were a prince, I would rather have this text than four hundred thousand soldiers in armor, which we must have, but we should trust and rely on this text, because God has taken the reins and said, "It is his. And if anyone hears this, he should drop his hands and feet.

and do no wrong in the reign. Therefore the princes have no other protection than the Lord, otherwise they must perish; when through the peasants' rebellion the devil intended to overthrow and kill them from their offices.

(54) Therefore let him who is a ruler know that his office is the office of God. Therefore let every man rule in such a way that he looks at no one, and does not judge out of love or hatred, fearing no one, being afraid of no one, but saying, "He who commanded me to rule is greater than all men. Ye are indeed kings, mighty, rich 2c. but there is another that saith, "The judgment is mine." He will be strong enough for me. All authority comfort, defiance, terror and admonition is in this text. It is short, but it reaches out and reaches far. And whoever is to rule or wants to rule in the world, may well rejoice in this text, which tells him that he leads a divine state, office and profession, is God's servant, and performs divine works. In sum, not one alone, but all rulers everywhere are in a blessed state. This is the text which Moses spoke of the authorities, and which precedes the interpretation of the Ten Commandments, that he might have fasted the people in spiritual and bodily government, that they might have good rulers and overlords before all things, and afterward be more skillful to hear the Ten Commandments.

55 Thus far we have heard from his own words what kind of man Moses is, how he begins this book, in which he will explain the Ten Commandments, and before this, how he considers the need of both regiments; namely, that first, before he gives the Ten Commandments, he appoints the persons, princes, mayors, councillors or judges, who are to receive justice, and gives them this rule, that they should be wise, prudent [people] and known among the people. And when they take up the office afterwards, that they close their eyes, and do not look at any person, be he equally mighty, rich, of great standing, 2c., and go through with the judgment straightway; as he also shall not judge anyone to love, sorrow, friendship or disadvantage, but know that rights and judgments are not his, but commanded him by God, for it is said: "The office of judgment is the Lord's."

56. so he has taught and taught how to

1) Erlanger: stopped.
2) Erlanger: in.

The leaders who are to act and administer such laws and order must be skilled. For this must also be in the regiment, that the persons or heads be so composed, that is, wise, prudent and known; after that, that they also have good laws and rights. Neither of these can be lacking in a regiment, and where one is lacking, it does not go right. If I have pious judges and wise lords, and on the other hand unjust laws and ordinances, it is no good at all; and again, where there are good laws, and there is no one to enforce them and keep them, that there is a lack of judges and diligent authorities, there again it is lost.

57 Because Moses is sure of the first thing, that he has given the best laws, he is most anxious that he should appoint men who would be diligent to keep the laws; therefore he appoints rulers before he repeats and interprets the laws. And it is a fine, fine order that one should seek first of all for people and good persons to do it. For what does it help that a house is finely arranged, and a brewer comes in after it and says, "Oh, it is an old house? If it does not have a householder to keep it structurally sound, it will soon fall apart; but a good householder can fix it up in a year and rebuild it.

So it is up to people, also in the secular regime, who do it. It must be the law, and then also the executio juris. And that is the complaint of the whole world, that there are not enough skilled people for the regiments. In this life there will never be a lack of money, good things, cities, laws, but of people who will enforce the laws. The same will happen in the spiritual office. What is the use of having the gospel and all the books full, if one does not have Christian, good, learned and proven preachers beside them? There must truly be a bishop who is well taught, and who therefore also diligently stands and holds above the correct doctrine, because it does not remain unchallenged.

(59) Therefore, it depends on having good laws, and then pious rulers who enforce them; then a city and good police will be formed. Where there are no wise people, laws do not work. For one must first

After you have the man, you must put the sword at his side. You must first have the head of the house before you set up the house. Moses also appointed wise judges and leaders for the people before he 1) gave them the law.

V. 20. 21. Then I said to you: You have come to the mountain of the Amorites, which the LORD our GOD will give us. Behold, the land before thee, which the LORD thy God hath given thee, go up, and possess it, as the LORD thy fathers' God hath spoken unto thee. Fear not, neither be dismayed.

(60) When the children of Israel came to the borders of the land of Carwan, Moses showed them the land and told them to take it. Remind them also of God's word, or of the divine promise they had of the land, by which their faith should have been strengthened, so that they would have taken the land the more confidently. But the children of Israel fall into sorrowful unbelief, forsaking God's promise and His previous help and benefits. The devil snatches the word and promise of God from their hearts, so that they do not want to believe, but rather feel and see; for this reason he sends spies into the land, who inquire about the way and investigate the land and the people's opportunities. When they returned and made them afraid, they did not want to leave, but were afraid that they would be too weak for the Gentiles, and they angered God so that they had to go back and wander in the desert for eight and thirty years and perish there.

61 This damage was done by unbelief, because human reason and wisdom do not want to be guided and led by God's word, but go on their bridle, want to know and do everything better than God; want to calculate everything, whether it is possible or impossible; are then in the midst of fear, and yet do not hit it, but bridle the horse in the wrong place. For reason, human wisdom and advice, or trust in human powers must be lacking, if they want to take hold of God's regiment.

1) Erlanger: because ehe.

the punishments as in this place. The children of Israel do not have to be brought to the Promised Land this time. They fall into God's wrath and disgrace, who withdraws his promise; they become water, as it is said in the 95th Psalm, v. 11: He swore to them in his wrath that they should not come into his rest, soon after they fall into despair and blasphemy, that they say [v. 27]: "The Lord is angry with us" 2c., know nothing more of the miraculous deeds of God, shown to them before. Moses must also repay such unbelief of the Israelites and not enter the promised land, because he, as the commander and captain of this people, also fell into unbelief at the Haderwasser, because of their, the Israelites, grumbling, manifold temptation of God, impatience and unbelief.

62. And lastly, God is also after the Israelites with corporal punishment. Because there

When the children of Israel recognized their sin of unbelief, repented and lamented it, and were heartily sorry for it, they took up their weapons and arms, and now wanted to attack and strike the enemies, the Amorites, against God's commandment, out of unseasonable boldness, they were chased by the Amorites and shamefully beaten. This was the reward and drink of unbelief, which we may be told as a warning to beware of unbelief, and to believe and follow God's word. For faith and godliness by God's power turns all adversity, as Moses says here: "Do not be afraid, do not be dismayed. But again, unbelief leads to all misfortune.

The other and third chapters of this fifth book of Moses are to be left as they are only repetitions of what has been said in the two preceding books.

The fourth chapter.

V. 1. 2. And now, O Israel, hear the commandments and the statutes which I teach you, that ye do them, that ye may live, and come in, and possess the land which the LORD God of your fathers giveth you. Ye shall not do any thing that I command you, neither shall ye do any thing that I command you, that ye may keep the commandments of the LORD your God, which I command you.

In the fourth chapter of this book, Moses gives a beautiful, glorious preface to the Ten Commandments. As if I said to you, I will make a preface or give a rule that will serve as an admonition to you. Moses also says here, "Take care that you do not add to it or take from it. Moses has such a care, and it is well worth the care. For it is certain that when it comes to God's word or worldly law, even the best of ordinances, it is not kept by all means. Soon people come over it, who outsmart and master it. Therefore these words would be worthy to be written with golden letters on all walls. For Moses wants to say: I would like to teach you something good, but you will not stay with it; see that you do not let yourselves be turned away from it.

2. the devil is our Lord God's monkey; he always has his logging roads and footpaths beside the paved way and the highway of the divine word, by which he deceives the people. This is what is happening now. Since one hears and knows what the gospel is, what Christ is, one still puts on and puts off as one pleases, as the fanatics and the sectarians do. So does the pope in Christendom; he carries his Decreta and Decretales to the preaching chair, and wants to master everyone, yes, God Himself. This is not to be; for nothing is to be added to the holy Scriptures, nor is anything to be taken from them.

3. listen, Israel, put your ears here, listen to what I am teaching you. Do not look at another; notice 1) what I teach you. This is an excellent preface, that he may bring the people and keep on the right way. All words shall be written with large letters. This is his opinion recently, and this much he wants to say: No one teaches himself, nor another, but first hear me what I teach him.

1) "merke" is missing in the Erlanger.

4. "customs" and "rights", praecepta et judicia. I have it 1) gladly verdeutscht: praecepta, its "way", which is a common custom in the country. In Hebrew it is called chūkka, which is now called ceremonies, in German: Weise, as an example, that one does not turn off the gate in some cities before seven o'clock. It is not a right, but a ceremony, a way. On the other hand, it is unwise if it is done without order, that is, not at the right time. So Moses divides his teaching into two parts, "ways" and "judgments," saying, "I will teach you, first, "ways," how to live; second, "judgments," how to judge.

5. "Wise" I refer to how one should live in worship, or how one should conduct oneself against God. Therefore, in the other Psalm, v. 7-, it is written: Praedicans praeceptum [id est],<sup>2</sup>) narrabo ceremoniam, "I will preach of such a way" how to live, that is, to believe in Christ. Summa, Moses wants to teach his audience a way how to live against GOD. After that "judgment", how to behave against man. "Law" is the secular regiment, the land law, city law, according to which the mayors and princes are to rule in external things, as it concerns house, court 2c. There "right" belongs to, as you Saxons have the Sachsenspiegel. Therefore one speaks: House right, woman right, daughter right. What more does a man want and need for this worldly life, than that he knows the art, how he should hold himself before God and men, that he knows to execute "wisdom" and "right"?

These two things Moses teaches abundantly. Hereby he draws the people to himself, but does not keep them in his person; he directs them away from him to Christ, that they may hear him, and look upon his dear and holy mouth. So shall we also do, and follow Mosiah in this, according to this.

let the pope and the priests, as well as all kinds of spirits and teachers, speak what they want and cannot refrain from. For we are to be bound by the divine word, that is what we are to hear, and no one is to teach anything without God's word from his own head. So Moses binds them all to his mouth, and thus sets before all teachers his ways and examples. Again he condemns and contradicts all other pretensions, and says that he wants to teach alone, because he has good appearances and right. God has commanded him. Now, these two pieces are necessary, namely "wise" and "right". In the papacy they called it church pomp, and wanted to interpret it that way; but this word has been wronged.

7. "That ye should do them." This also belongs to it. For justice and wisdom are not presented to us for this reason, as if they were only secrets of wisdom, which one must speculate from the words of Moses, and then speak to the wind and speak in vain, or have glory and honor from them; as many before this time thought of them, and there are still a great many of them who make them dream of such things. But God does not want it to be so here, but that one should do it and live according to it; as in the first Corinthians [Cap. 4, 20] Paul also says: "The kingdom of God does not stand in words, but in power. Therefore this is how it should be done [Matth. 7, 21.]. We all boast of the gospel, but it is the doing that makes a Christian. So Moses says much with few words. This is also the right art to preach and to teach the people, so that they listen with benefit and get something out of it.

That you may live.

(8) Here he adds to it prophecy and promise. Promise that you will live and inherit the land if you keep the law. But forbiddance to the transgressors, as will be said below. He wants to say this much: I do not teach you only that you know it, but that you do it and live by it. If you do it, you will have land and people, happiness and prosperity; if not, you will be expelled from the land, as follows [v. 27]: If you do not obey, he will blow you up, as if you had not obeyed.

1) namely in other places, e.g. Ps. 2, 7.

2) Added by us.

the wind blows away the dust or the chaff. These words are great and have the power to drive people away and cheer them up.

That you may come in and possess the land.

009 That is, that ye may have house, and estate, and wife, and child, and all manner of enjoyment. Again, if ye shall not obey, ye shall not only be cast out of the land, and driven out of house and home, wife and child, into misery, but ye shall also be miserably stabbed and slain. This is a strong admonition that makes the listeners diligent and cheerful, so that they do not hear God's word with sleeping ears, and never again remember that it is God's word, and they should do according to it. For this is how preaching should be approached and practiced, so that people listen diligently. But now they listen to the Ten Commandments and other sermons as if they were not obliged to listen, much less to do so; as was the case in the papacy of old, and still is, since it is thought to be only the word of men or the work of priests. But Moses wants to say here: Therefore it is preached that you should do it and keep it in all your life.

V. 2. You shall do nothing to it 2c.

010 See that ye keep the commandments which I give, and make them neither less nor greater. This is a big, strong word, which should be written with big letters, and is a thunderclap, so that it fends off all red spirits and false prophets, who are whimsical and have their own heads. For this text condemns all the doctrines of men, brings down heretics to the ground, and prophesies of their heart's recklessness that they reproach everything. But let no one follow them. Yes, if ten thousand prophets came and did not bring the law and the word of Moses, then conclude for certain that they are heretics.

With this text, Moses condemned all kinds of enthusiasts. And again, the text has made many prophets martyrs. For the prophets have punished Israel for idolatry from this text of the kings, and are were all slain because of this punishment [Matt. 23:37, 1 Kings 22:24, Jer. 20:2]. For this was the way among the same people at that time: One preached this way, another that way, and then each pretended that they were not wrong, saying: Who art thou then? thinkest thou that thou hast the Holy Ghost alone with thee? From this text, I have set down many falsifiers, and Moses has put a pin in them here, over which they cannot.

This day this text is also hewing and thrusting about, and striking down all sects, all kinds of righteousnesses and pieties. Under the pope there are various ways, such as the preaching monks, Carthusians, Minorites, lay brothers, 2c., each has his own special way: one fasts to the saint, another to another, one runs to St. Jacob, another to the Grimmethal. He has forbidden all these ways here, and has given us only this one, namely: Believe in Jesus Christ and love him.

(13) They do not want to leave it at that, but [they] want us to accept the ways of the popes; if not, then one is burned over it as a heretic. But with these words we reject all our own devotion and human works, and should be slain over them as much as possible. Therefore this text is the shrine of all the godly who are unjustly slain. Abel was slain because he did not lead a way like Cain. This happened long before Moses preached these words, as it happens to us now. I will let Caesar do "right" as he pleases, but not a "way" shall he present to me in the things of God; for the Father in heaven has bound us to Christ's mouth, saying Matt. 17:5: "Him shall ye hear." So Moses also says here: "Do not add to it," that is, you should remain with the text of the divine word alone.

014 But if any man ask, What shall I do? Isaiah, Jeremiah, and other prophets also had each his spirit, and wrote many books, which are not like one another, and Christ added and took much from them? To this therefore answer, That is not to add, if I cut out Mosiah's words, and explain them; if I keep only to his mind and opinion, then may

1) Here we have erased "not". In the issues: do not follow.

I can explain it with many words. Isaiah sticks to the ten commandments and the words of Moses; even if he has other people to whom he speaks and needs other words, that is not important. Isaiah, however, cannot speak of Pharaoh in Egypt, as Moses did; but he also had the very things he had to punish, but at a different time. Therefore, you will not find anything else in the prophets that rhymes with the Ten Commandments.

15 But this is what it means when someone wants to teach something different through reason. For example, we teach of Christ that he alone was made for us by the Father for righteousness, sanctification, redemption and reconciliation, 1 Cor. 1:30, but the papists come here and add to righteousness their piety, holiness and merit, as if one had to run to St. James. This will not compare together. To "put it" means to put something else and to extract it, as the devotees of the sacraments do; they let these words, "this is my body," remain in themselves according to the letter, but nevertheless take away the understanding, and interpret it differently; as that in the Lord's Supper there is not the true body and blood of Christ, but only the sign and meaning of the same. This is to drink away the true understanding, and instead to add another understanding to the words, for they would otherwise read. Otherwise there is no harm in using a hundred words; only that one and the true understanding remain. In short, one should bring no other understanding, but that one opinion and faith remain; without this it does not hinder at all, although other words are used. So the teachings of Moses and the prophets are the same, even though they did not use the same words. For the prophets also spoke, driven by the Holy Spirit [2 Petr. 1, 21].

16 This is the preface that belongs to such a salutary sermon, when he says: "Keep the commandments of your God that I command you. He says this so often that it is almost annoying for a carnal man to read. Moses uses these words many times, but he knows very well that it is not too much if he says it a thousand or more times, because it is very necessary. And he does it is also because [it] happens in the world in such a way that always come who want to make it better. Thus the devil does not leave mastering, cleverness and overconfidence; it is his trade, which he started in paradise with Adam and Eve [Gen. 3, 4. 5.] and practiced until now, namely, to patch another mind to the word and commandment of God, and to want to make it better. Therefore, one must not be negligent, but courageous, and daily admonish against it.

That ye may keep 2c.

17 A strange appendix and warning is this. Who would have looked for it there? St. Paul, of course, also saw here, when he speaks to Tito in chapter 1, v. 10, 11: "There are many unruly and useless talkers and deceivers, especially those of the circumcision, whose mouths must be stopped; who turn whole houses, and teach that which is not fit, for shameful gain. And soon after he says, v. 13, 14: "For the sake of the cause, punish them severely, that they may be sound in the faith, and pay no attention to the Judean fables and commandments of men, which turn aside from the truth" 2c.

For this is the way of the doctrine of men, that it leads away from the faith and the commandments of God. 1) As St. Paul also says: "I exhort you to look out for those who cause division and offence, beside the doctrine which you have learned, and depart from them; for such do not serve your Lord Christ, but their own belly, and by sweet preaching and fine words they deceive the innocent heart. Which we have experienced so far under your papacy. As soon as an addition is made to God's commandment, man turns away from the ten commandments, and departs from the right word of truth and the ten commandments and the same understanding, and falls into seduction and error. In the past, people preached about faith, but they did not stick to it, but fell into works. Then came the holy Antonites and hermits, who fasted and did other things, and led the people away from Christ and faith in him to good works.

1) Erlanger: to lead away.

2c. This has come about because they have devoted themselves to monasticism alone and have even strayed from the teachings of faith to the statutes of men and life. This is a great departure from God.

19 And so it goes, if one does not pay attention to the difference between the spiritual and the physical kingdom; then "to add" means that people are turned away from the truth. Moses freely confesses this in this text: Where you add or subtract from it, you subtract. But if you want to keep it, beware of adding and subtracting, and beware of the wrong ways and byways, lest you be led on a monkey's tail. Daily experience shows that whoever wants to walk safely should stay on the road, or he will not get along. This Moses diligently admonishes, therefore one should also keep it seriously, that one does nothing to God's word, nor takes anything from it. Therefore, we should avoid the teachings of men and adhere to Christ's teachings alone.

20 Now you understand how far one should keep the commandments of men, namely, that one keeps them voluntarily, only in this life. For they do not belong in the other commandment, for the sanctification of God's name. Summa Summarum, God's commandments are not to be kept, unless one remains in what they teach. For as soon as one wants to add something else, one gets away with it. And that this is true, Moses speaks further of those who follow BaalPeor:

V. 3. 4. Your eyes have seen what the LORD has done against BaalPeor; for all who followed BaalPeor the LORD your God has destroyed from among you. But ye that follow the LORD your God, all ye shall live this day.

21 As if Moses wanted to say: Be wise in this, and take care that you neither add to nor subtract from the divine word, commandment and order. And that you may be most faithfully warned against this addition or subtraction, set before your eyes this example of how God destroyed those who forsook Him and adhered to the idol BaalPeor.

1) "eurem" is missing in the original and in the Erlanger.

(22) We have just heard how Moses exhorted the people in his preface, so that he would begin to interpret the Ten Commandments. Therefore here, in the following text, he takes special care to act on the first commandment, for from it flow as from one source, and the other commandments all follow and are directed by the first commandment. And [we] hear first of all that he says: "Do not make for yourselves an image" s2 Mos. 20, 4. 5 Mos. 5, 8]. There he wants us to make no image or idol, but to keep strictly to the word and voice of God, and to know that we are to hear it without idolatry and images. That is why he rejects idols so severely and wants us to cling to the word of God alone.

But what do our enthusiasts of the present time have to do? They only look at the outward images; and from the word, "not having images," they base themselves, and make a point of storming the images. But after the other, namely, to keep the word of God, they ask nothing at all, and leave the word of God behind.

(24) Then follows how he exhorted them that they should not make them any graven image, neither should they set up, honor, or worship any creature. This is the summa of the following text as Moses speaks:

V. 15-19 Keep your souls safe, for you did not see any likeness the day the Lord spoke to you out of the fire in Horeb, lest you corrupt yourselves and make for yourselves any likeness of man or woman, or of cattle on the earth, or of birds in the sky, or of creeping things on the land, or of fish in the water under the earth. Neither lift up thine eyes unto heaven, and behold the sun, and the moon, and the stars, all the host of heaven, and fall down, and worship them, and serve them, which the LORD thy God hath ordained for all nations under the whole heaven.

(25) This is the first, Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image. Then the other, to observe, and never to think that any creature that is made is a god, except the sun, which is one of the most excellent creatures.

or the moon, or the stars, or else the host of heaven; that is, the whole host of the heavenly bodies gathered together. For all these are God's work, God created them, they are the work of His hands. Know, then, that all these creatures are far too few that they should be your comfort, and that you should serve them; let alone that they should be your gods. For what are the sun and the moon to be counted against God, their Creator?

He does not condemn these creatures of God, but rather confirms that the sun and the moon are creatures of God, created and ordered by God for the service of the whole world, to shine for men, to serve the times and years. Therefore, it is not the fault of the godly sun and moon or the stars in the sky if something happens to them or signs appear, but it is all due to God, the heavenly one, their regent and the regent of the whole creature. Therefore you must not worship and honor them as one God, nor serve them as our Lord God. The text is true enough, and speaks of our wickedness, and not of the 1) dear creatures. And [we] have often said that if one wants to tear away that which gives cause for sins, then one would have to leave nothing at all; one cannot throw away the creatures for the sake of abuse, Propter abusum non tollitur substantia. One would have to take away the sun and stars, yes, otherwise many innumerable creatures.

(27) The devotees think they have done the right thing when they have taken away the idols, because they have been worshipped by men; but they will not do it. Take away the sun and the moon also, for they are also worshipped. So no creature should be left, if a thing should be put away, because men abuse it; but look first into the heart, and teach first how to break and tear down the idols in the heart, or to cast them out, that they be not worshipped. He is talking about worship; there is sin inside, that you do not look at them and fall away and worship them. Not that I would that such idols should be set up as we have worshipped hitherto.

I do not want to court such idols, but that one should preach on worship, and that the trust in creatures should remain. For the serving and worshipping must cease; otherwise the creatures must not be thrown away for the sake of our abuse.

28. gold is fine and good in itself, nor is it called a mammon; not because of its guilt, for what has it done? The pious guilders hath not spoken unto thee: I am thy god; yea, he would rather say unto thee, if he could speak: I am thy servant. It is the fault of the false heart, that it loves gold, goods and money so much, that it courts them and clings to them, and serves them and makes a god out of them; which it is not, nor can be, nor wants to be. So the pious sun has not preached once, it has not been heard from it that it said: Worship me and make a god out of me. So also the moon has not said; nor have there been people who have worshipped her. So the pious gold florins say not unto thee, Worship me, put thy hope and trust in me; but let it be laid, and cast, and spent, as thou wilt. And if they could speak, they would say: I am thy poor servant, where thou givest me, there will I go, there must I be. If one now puts the trust in him that he is God, he has never desired that. So all creatures say.

(29) This is to be preached diligently, that men may be led out of this thing which is called worshipping and serving, and so drive the idol out of the heart. For what are otherwise externa will soon pass away. But our enthusiasts and false spirits do not do that. Therefore, a true teacher should see to it that he first takes hold of the word, teaches and instructs the people. For it is most important not to worship the images, nor to take them for God; as Moses says here: "Otherwise, let everything else be, let the sun and moon be, money and goods be, but do not worship them and do not take them for your God.

(30) It is not of the substance or essence of creatures that the sun, moon and other creatures have essence, but of the use and abuse. We do not preach what the essence of it is.

1) Erlanger: "the".

itself, but from the abuse of an evil heart. We do not want things changed, but the wicked heart. For money is money, the sun is sun. This is to be preached, not what to change in the creatures; but how to turn the abuse of the wicked heart; for this is sought, that thou shouldst be made different, and not that the creatures should be made different. For thou shalt not put thy hope in anything else, but thou shalt trust in God alone; for if thou doest not, the matter is not helped.

31. You can break images and idols and tear down churches, but only pride comes out of it, because stones can be broken easily, but the heart is not broken because of that. The poor things, as gold, silver, wood and stones, are only broken; but the heart is not moved, nor taught to serve God alone. I would also easily storm images, if one would let the storm of the heart precede, so that the hearts would be stormed and broken. The creatures were created to serve us, but God did not make them gods for us.

(32) And Moses himself confesses here that in ancient times the sun, the moon and the stars were considered gods and worshipped by the wisest men, and the heathen were condemned because they worshipped creatures. The Egyptians first worshipped cows and horses and other earthly creatures. But after that they rejected this earthly worship and established worship of heavenly creatures, taking the sun and moon for gods, so that they could run so fast and make such a great journey in one day.

(33) Notice from the chapter that Moses so diligently warns and directs that they should not worship the sun and moon. For, as I have said, they were not rude peasants, but wise men, who believed that the sun and moon were gods. They were not like our godless, devilish sorcerers and old Breckin 1) are, who worship the elder bush, yes, the dragon and with it

Have alliance and company. Let the creatures remain as great and high as they are, even the sun and the moon.

(34) It is true that the sun is a noble creature and a glorious work of God next to man, among all creatures; gold and silver are nothing compared to the sun. For if we did not have the sun, we could see nothing, it would be night forever and all would be dark, as if we lived in a dark cellar. If the sun were not there, the other creatures would not be able to live in virtue and truth; they would despise gold and silver, women and children, and everything else, and one would be more under the earth than alive. Therefore the sun is the noblest work and creature of all, with the exception of us humans. If the sun did not shine, nothing would stand, neither house, nor castle, nor court, nor kingdom on earth.

35 Since the sun, being the noblest creature, cannot be God, nor be worshipped, when all things are lighted to stand, and rule mightily, and have their effect in the lowest bodies, how much less shall the impotent mammon, and other creatures, be worshipped? Therefore the high wise men have thought: What is money? What is field? If there is no light, if the sun does not shine, it would remain night forever. If it does not shine for two or three days, everything is sad.

The wise and sensible people, such as Pliny and others, saw this and therefore said that the sun was God and worshipped it. And truly, if the sun were still outside for three days, we would also worship it. Therefore it is preached here to the wise men to beware, and not to worship the sun, the noble and glorious creature. And yet it is worshipped by many very wise men; for Pliny was very wise, and yet he took the sun for a god.

V. 20-24. But the Lord has taken you and brought you out of the iron furnace of Egypt to be His people of inheritance, as it is in this day. Take heed therefore that you do not forget the covenant of the Lord, which He has made with you, and that you do not forget the covenant of the Lord.

4) Breckin (Bräckin)--bitch (from Bracke, dog); swear word against the witches.

Do not make images of the same likeness, as the LORD your God has commanded. For the LORD thy God is a consuming fire, and a fierce God.

37. He says, "Watch, do not forget your God." The word "forget" has all the power to make people think that he is our God. Moses does this with great diligence. This text, however, has also been applied to the monastic vows, and the most necessary things have been completely forgotten, even left on a bundle; namely, what God has vowed and sworn to us; and again, we have sworn and vowed to Him; hence many vows have come. But the word "vow" should refer especially to the first commandment, that we have vowed and sworn to God that He should be our God, and we His people. This vow means and entails that I will trust in no creature but God alone, and accept nothing else that I fear, love, trust in and honor. For he alone will be our God.

(38) Moses is a fine doctor and teacher, who knows how to speak well of things; he says, "Take heed that ye forget not the covenant. As if to say, "It will come about that God will be forgotten, that many false prophets and false teachers will arise who will say: If you want to go to heaven, do this and that. But see thou, and remember what covenant thou hast made with God, and keep it, for the Lord thy God is a consuming fire.

For God is such a God, or, as he says here, such a fire that does not celebrate, but eats and consumes, and a God who is zealous, Ex 20:5. This saying is well to remember, which concerns those who fall away from the faith; it belongs to the mammals and apostates. But it is not believed that God is a consuming fire and a zealous God. Therefore it is said to the unrighteous, hardened, hardened-minded and unbelievers, who do not keep the right faith, and consider these words to be mere fables and mock them; to them he is called a fire that consumes. This is said so much:

1) Erlanger: "ours".

He that believeth not his word, and receiveth it not, is corrupt unto the ground. Therefore believe and hold on to God; if not, you are already gone.

(40) If God wanted the world to believe this and take this word for truth, God would be a consuming fire. That is why they live so wildly and desolately in the world, and do every man contrary to God's commandment, and let God reproach and rage as he wills. For God is not considered by them to be a consuming fire; rather, the world considers Him to be stubble, a straw and a drop of cold water. That is why they go through each other like this. This one steals and robs, that one cheats and lies; that one hates, that one hates; another one is stingy 2c. There it does not seem that such a being must be consumed and perish, but it can be seen as if they have a gracious God; as the prophet Jeremiah Cap. 12, 1. also complains: Quare prosperatur via impiorum? "Why is it so well with the wicked?" And experience also testifies to it, as it is said in Proverbs, "The worse rogue, the better fortune. It goes out to them in such a way for a time.

41 The holy men and the prophets were also very angry at this, that the antitype shines in the world, and the sinners have abundance of all things, and exercise the greatest courage, and yet everything goes out to them. So St. Paul has seen the. Paul also saw the contradiction. These thoughts come to mind: If God were a consuming, devouring fire, zealous and angry, truly he would not suffer it. Now he suffers it? Yes, in the eyes of the world it seems as if God were a loud yawning mouth that only opens, or a cuckold and a good man who lets another sleep with the woman, and pretends not to see it.

42) Against these thoughts Moses said this: Beware, you have a god who is a consuming fire, that is, such a god who consumes you and cleans you up if you are wicked, zealous, devouring and turning you into ashes and dust. He gorges you, and takes such delight in it, 2) that out of his zeal and wrath he is driven to destroy the wicked.

2) That is: He has such pleasure in ungodliness that re.

consume. Once this starts, it does not stop. Such a thing cannot persuade the people, they also do not believe it rather, until the experience comes; so it is then too long waited. So the Jews could not believe that they would be cast out to Babylon, even though the prophets had prophesied this, until 1) the devouring fire came and destroyed them.

43 So when Christ also came and prophesied of the last destruction of Jerusalem, it was of no avail, they would not believe it, until after that faith came into their hand, and then they knew it by deed. If now and then a hundred thousand tongues said to our tyrants: "God is a consuming fire," they only make a mockery of it, do not listen, and also consider our Lord God only as a straw mockery, which is put in the hemp to the birds for abhorrence. But when he comes in his time and turns everything into powder and ashes, then they will realize it. It is the same for us today. If we preach and prophesy for a long time, or hear ourselves that God is fire, we do not ask about it, we do not believe it, until pestilence, death, war and other hardships and plagues come; then it begins to become true, and to be found in retreat.

(44) Wherefore Moses herewith terrifieth us, and putteth a fear in us; lest we make nor accept another god. For he cannot suffer it, or you will be consumed by it and perish. This is what he makes us believe as a good speaker, if it would help otherwise. No cobbler's servant says it, but the high prophet Moses, and says: "God is a devouring fire," that is, nothing will remain unsmelled nor unpunished. Even though it may seem or appear as if you are fortunate and progressing in your wickedness, you will finally be justified in believing that God is a consuming fire. The godly believe it, and therefore they do not experience it. Again, the wicked do not believe it, therefore they must experience it; as experience and deed testify that it is and they will soon perish and perish to the ground (Ps. 37:20). Therefore beware of this fire.

V. 25, 26: If ye therefore beget children, and children's children, and dwell in the land, and corrupt yourselves, and make you images like unto yourselves, to do evil in the sight of the LORD your God, and to provoke him to anger, I call heaven and earth to witness against you this day, that ye perish quickly from off the land.

45 Then he interprets what was said before, "When you raise up children in the land, (and) beget children's children," saying, "Now, in my time, you may keep God's commandment and be a little pious; but after our death, when we have laid the head, then you will see the idolatry of the Gentiles, that they will worship the creatures and follow such idolatry. Then it will certainly come about that the word of God will be extinguished, and you will be destroyed, and soon you will also be destroyed and scattered among the Gentiles. This is what Moses means by the devouring fire, that God will come and consume you.

V. 26, 27: Ye shall not long abide therein, but shall be driven out; and the LORD shall scatter you among the nations, and ye shall be left a little multitude among the heathen, whither the LORD shall drive you.

46 That is, a devouring, devouring fire, which the Lord brings, and punishes the land with pestilence, famine, war, and destruction; and, what is worse, when he sends false doctrine and idolatry, then ye have it even with one another. For he says [v. 28], "Among the heathen, whither the Lord shall drive thee, there shalt thou serve gods that are the work of men's hands, wood and stone, which neither see, nor hear, nor eat, nor smell." 3) So he ruins them in body and goods; that is what will happen to the ungrateful people. I mean, that may be called rubbed out, and that would like to be a fire. If the Turk comes among us once (which we will not experience, as I hope), he will also destroy the two 4) and bring false faith with us. Then we will learn how God is a consuming fire that burns all and fires on both sides. For he will not let it be good, and will also inflict such punishments on us through the Turk or others who are closer to us.

Here Moses, as a faithful preacher, warns us not to fall away from God and His word, lest we be consumed. As if to say: Summa Summarum, desist from your idolatry, you must change and mend your ways, you cannot and may not pass by, you must desist from idolatry and all ungodly intentions, for God does not desist from His zeal. I know of no harsher saying or text in the Bible than this, that God is a consuming fire.

48) Whether he pretends for a time that he is not, and sees through his fingers; but he will be in his time, 1) and at last he will punish the ungrateful horribly. But we do not want to believe it. In Welschland one has seen it, how large hunger was, and the people of the sudden death died, that there is frightening to say. As they were warned, they neither believed nor respected it. Now Germany is also admonished for her ingratitude, but they beat us a clip for it; but those who will repent and be affected, that will be them. The consuming fire of dermaleins will rise and start, make of it what you will. He who will not believe and hear, let him feel it; there is no other way to do it.

The world also would not believe in Noah's time, but it felt the flood. Sodoma and Gomorrah would not believe either, but the devouring fire came. God is a zealous God, who will not joke, nor let his contempt go unsmelled, he punishes it immediately. Let this be said to the stiff-necked, hard-hearted; to the pious, God will also be different, that is, merciful and gracious.

V. 28. There you will serve the gods that are the work of human hands.

50. This is the greatest plague, when God takes away the word. It is indeed a great misery when God deprives us of our bodily bread, but it is a much greater torment when He deprives us of the Word [Amos 8:11], although the common ruffians do not respect it and consider it much more important if they only keep the bread and do not lack it. For they think thus: If the bread is taken from us, then we die of hunger. But they are slow to consider that if the word be taken from us, we go to hell, and are eternally lost in body and soul. Truly, one is easier and more tolerable than the other, and it would be better to die of hunger than to go to hell. But here Moses prophesies and says: "If you do not trust in God, then both the word of God and the bodily bread shall be taken away from you.

51 And soon after he describes very finely such gods, saying they are gods who neither see nor hear, eat nor drink anything [Isa. 44, 9. Ps. 115, 4. ff]. Is it not so? Look at the old pagan idols, which were gold, silver, wood and stones; and the idols of the Papists in our time: the one went to St. Jacob, the other went on pilgrimages; one has given righteousness to the monk's cap, the other to the hairy ropes. Verily, the cap does not see, the vowed chastity does not eat, and other works do not go nor hear. What is it, then, that one trusts in his works, another insists on his wisdom and righteousness? all of which neither see, hear, eat nor drink.

(52) Works and all human ability are not God's, yet you trust in them. The work is not yours, but God's, who works it in you. So the mammon and the belly is also such a god [Phil. 3, 19.]; he does not do any of the things, neither eats nor drinks, neither sees nor hears, nor tastes; there he lies in the box. A florin has neither eyes nor ears. But fie on you, that a man should rejoice when he looks at gold, and should consider his God and Creator about it! What is it then with gold and goods? It has neither ears nor eyes, no senses nor feelings; nor does one trust in it. Fie and but fie of the shameful God! Surely a man is much better, who sees, hears and understands; yet shall a man be so wicked, and rely upon uncertain mammon?

1) In the original and in the Erlanger: to be.

(53) Truly, says Moses, if you lose the first commandment and do not keep God's word, you will end up worshipping gold, silver and money, even a penny so light that a fly could carry it away, for God, and trusting in it even if it neither sees nor hears. One can become so blind, foolish and foolish. This will also happen to us when we fall away from the word of God. Behold, what a diligent preacher Moses was, that he should keep the people to the first commandment, that the heart might learn to believe the word of God, and that all creatures should be put away. It is a common preaching, which the holy prophets also practiced, and more than we do, that one should cling to God and His word alone; and, although it is a common preaching, the common people do not pay attention to it.

The fifth book of Moses is not to be taken otherwise than as an interpretation of the ten commandments, in which Moses explains himself abundantly and superfluously, and makes a great space as to what he wants to be understood by the ten commandments; and especially he drives very much on the first commandment, in which all power lies. With the other lesser commandments, he does not make so much of a fuss; he who sticks to the first commandment, that is, in the faith that he rightly knows the true God, soon learns to honor his name, and in the others it may also be signified. That is why he goes about with many words, and preaches such remarkable sermons, and uses all arts, entices, stimulates, drives, urges, promises, admonishes, and seeks all kinds of words and arguments, so that he may make his listeners believe it. As you have heard enough, he also has power over how to grasp the first commandment correctly and stick to it.

55 For as you read in the Old Testament, all trouble and distress came to the Jewish people because of idolatry alone. That is why so many people have often been slain; all warfare, theurge, Lamentations and bloodshed have arisen because of the transgression of the first commandment. And all the prophets were also killed because they disputed about the first commandment; for if that is gone and lost, then all is gone and lost. Just as we Christians also say: If we do not have the main doctrine and purpose or goal, that Christ is our Savior and Lord, that we are justified by grace through faith alone in him, without all merit, then it is done.

Whoever falls out of the ship will perish and be drowned, whether for a long time or a short time, even if he has been saved from shipwreck three or four times before. Therefore he wants the first commandment to be believed and obeyed, that we let God be our God, and trust in him, and build on him alone, and not take away his divinity and appropriate it to others. But this is the greatest plague and worst torture, that we cannot leave idolatry. This word is still in our marrow and legs, which the devil spoke to Eve and Adam [Gen. 3:5]: "You will be like the gods." It is also planted in our nature and inborn in us that we trust in idols and seek help from others. The devil is in our skin, the evil seed does not want to come out, that we did not leave God his divinity.

57. but as long as the first commandment stands, the devil has no access; but when we are in the flesh, the devil has an advantage and an access, that the flesh applauds him. Therefore this commandment is to be regarded as the main thing, and Moses is so diligent about it for the sake of it, because all the wisdom and art that can be brought forward is nothing against the commandment; what can be spoken is all included in this commandment.

V. 24. I the LORD, your God.

(58) They are three words, but difficult to understand. Therefore, one must not blame Moses, for he does not form and preach them to us in vain with so many words. Although we at this time, praise God, are not lacking in our diligence, it still helps what it may, such constant chewing the cud, blowing the cud and stroking the cud

1) Erlanger: let.

I am a zealous GOD.

59. These are frightening words, that he is zealous. He corrupts, and is not to be resisted. He called God a devouring fire from which there is no salvation; here he gives him another title, and calls him zealous, as the one who does it and wants to do it, because he is a zealot.

V. 25. Now when you beget children 2c.

(60) I could not speak and do it more vehemently, for if I say: If you fall away from God and do not remain with Him, there is no more counsel. What a consuming fire and zealous God is, he declares here, calling heaven and earth, and all that is there, to witness. He does not protest with a notary before the court, but heaven, earth, and everything that stands and walks shall be his witnesses and notaries. The testimony cannot be greater than this, so that he only deeply imagines the high article: that this alone is God, to whom all good and grace should be provided; and if one falls away from this, then there will be no more counsel.

(61) So we also preach that our support and trust should be in God's grace alone, and not in our works. We also call heaven and earth as witnesses against unbelief against God, against all persecutors, blasphemers and enemies. Now we do not want to suffer any article less than this one, which is the most necessary; we do not want to go there. We do not want to have the article, no one wants to trust God's promise alone. One has invented an order, another has become a Carthusian, another a monk. All this has been a delicious thing. But to trust in God alone, and to provide oneself with good things for Him, is not to be trusted. If I were rich, and wanted to give a servant or a maid house and farm, fields and grounds and other hereditary goods out of grace, which I would not otherwise owe him, and he said: I do not want to have it out of grace and mercy, but want to pay it to you, want to earn it, so that he would have a legal ruling on it: would it not be nonsensical? So if a man had a daughter, and gave her to me by grace, and I brought her, and said, I like not that way; I will make it better; I will give her to thee.

I deserve to have them, not by grace, but by right; and I wanted to refuse this grace.

This is also the way he is expected to go. The world rightfully wants to claim heaven from our Lord God, to earn it and to buy it from him, since he lets the whole world cry out that he wants to give it to us for free, and says: "I will be your God, by grace I will give it to you, by grace and for free I will make you blessed, as St. Paul says in Eph. 2:5; I will not let it be claimed for me. So do not make other gods, do not invent such things that you yourselves do. This is also what this sermon does here and says: Do not exalt your good works, let me have mercy on you. It is a disgrace that we should be reproached for this, that we do not want to accept it for nothing, but still want to earn it, and still think of giving to God, the one who wants to give us everything abundantly. We are such fools that we want to give when we should take. The beggar comes here to the mighty king, and begs in such a way that he does not want to take the alms from him for free, but gives him some four pennies or lice for it.

The world is also mad and foolish; it wants to give to the one who has given everything and from whom it should receive everything; and when it should give something to its neighbor, it wants to give nothing, but only to take from him. This is what one feels: If one has a beautiful house, the other thinks, I would like to have it; his fields and cattle he also desires 2c. That is why the prophet Moses says here: "You will do it, the Lord is eager. He will not give it to you, on my soul; as we Germans say. These words we may also let be said to us. For if we lose Christ, it will not be well with us. We live safely, as if Christ were a fool, but God will not be mocked, Gal. 6, 7. We will experience this. He will not sit still forever, as we think.

V.27. And the LORD will scatter you among the nations, and you shall be left a small multitude.

64 This is also true of our time. For if we forsake this commandment, it shall be unto us as it was unto the Jews;

The devouring fire will come and destroy us who despise such things as they have done until now; but this fire will surely devour them also. Under the papacy we were scattered and chased, one there, the other there; not only physically, just as the Jews were scattered among the Gentiles in Egypt, Persia, Medes, until he destroyed them to the ground through the Romans. While they were there among the Gentiles, they nevertheless abandoned the true God and worshipped the gods of the Gentiles, until God finally came after them and put an end to them. Thus, God feeds around him.

The same will happen to us. We will be scattered by God through all kinds of human statutes and countless false teachings and sects. Now such things are ready to happen. There come the Anabaptists and the sacramentalists and desecrators, the rebellious spirits who abandon wife and children; item, who deny the divinity of Christ. This then is the consuming, devouring fire; for you have not heeded God's word, nor believed Him that He would gladly and heartily keep us by the first commandment. But we do not want to accept the mercy of God, offered to us in Jesus Christ; each one of us wants to do something special. That is why it will happen to us, just as it happened to the Jews. See how Moses wanted to keep his people in the faith of the first commandment. As we still diligently do, but we are mocked and laughed at for preaching so vehemently about faith, when we have heard clearly and distinctly from the mouth of the man of God, Moses, how he so surely sees it, and directs all his teaching, preaching and exhortation to faith, which is also required of all people, especially in this first commandment.

When they come to the Gentiles and are scattered, they will lose the kingdom and become servants.

(66) This is also what happened to the Jews; since they were masters before, afterward they became servants to all the world, and had to lie under the feet of others. So it also happened to us before this time, we were right servants under your Roman chair. Any knave, who was only called an official, or a lay brother, and their like, could force the kings and princes with a piece of paper. When one of them came to the pulpit, everything had to flee, to give way, and the princes and lords had to be afraid of them; one had to be obedient to them. Now, praise God, we are delivered from them again, and do not consider them worthy to be our servants, since they ruled over us that time. But how this is recognized by the greater part and God is thanked for it, everyone can see well. This disgraceful, unpleasant ingratitude will still break our necks today. For it has always been like this: If one loses Christ and goes astray from the faith, one must ultimately suffer horrible bondage as a reward. This is also what Moses is forewarning his Jews here. So it will come to pass, I say, with us also, that we shall be ruled and tribulated by their own pleasure, wicked men, who are not worthy to wipe our shoes.

Just look at the position of the Protestant princes now. If one should give a village priest his tithes and other income, also keep the people to give earned wages, or add thirty guilders to the salary, they say, we are stingy, no one can fulfill the priests. They also say gloriously: The papists have deceived us, they will seduce us. That is why they do not want to give preachers their entertainment. If they are to be fed, they should count the morsels of bread in their mouths. But it will come that they will have to give their seducers heaps, as before, and again be forced under the officials and the pope.

(68) And if I could, I myself would restore the papal power, and exalt the pope supremely over such knaves. But that time will come again, for this text will not lie: "God is a devouring fire, and a zealous God." Spiritual oppressors and world robbers shall come upon them again, and shall suck them dry with their oppression, and yet teach them nothing good. Well, they laugh at us now, as in the days of Moses, because they do not want to believe, but to learn that God is a consuming fire.

V. 28. There you will serve gods that are the work of human hands.

The people read Moses and the prophets diligently, so they knew very well that it was said to them, "This is what will happen to you; you will serve gods called the work of human hands, wood and stone. With these words he describes praemium impietatis [the wages of ungodliness], meaning: This is what you shall have as a reward; if you fall away from this faith and trust in other things than in God, who offers you his grace and mercy, then you will have a God who will be nothing but stone and wood, who will not be able to do or prove divine works, nor will he be able to help you. For the one God you will get countless gods.

(70) But this will not happen, think our scholars, that the devil should command us in this way; they say: God did not want that, I will be careful that the devil does not lead me there anymore. Awe yes, it will become sour for him, you are sure that he should not end it. Moses says here that it shall happen to you. For whoever falls away from this highest article has no other article to keep and learn. How is it possible? they say. Look behind you! If we did not have our own experience, we would not let ourselves be persuaded.

Was it not the work of the hands to worship, that we relied on the intercession of the dear saints, and the monks relied on a gray skirt? So we have kept for worship and holy things chasubles, monstrances, chalices, altars, altar cloths, vestments, and whatever else is given in churches and monasteries, so that one might partake of their good works and merits. Is this not wood and stone worshipped? Ask your conscience about it; who has not wanted to build a church of his own?

Yes, ask them: Is the altar God the Lord, or the work that you do? Truly, God's grace and mercy must be something else than a work and merit that a man does in a religious order or otherwise! You must truly say: This is (before we were born) stood in God's grace and mercy, and yet willingly forsook that mercy, and trusted in our vain works and merits of the dead saints. This is not to be suffered, for it means, "You will serve other gods, which are the work of men's hands." This is to be avoided. Well, you cannot avoid it if you do not keep the first commandment. But he who lacks the article and does not keep it, must fall into it, and falls into it, he cannot preserve himself.

Therefore Moses exhorts us with so many words to the first commandment, and terrifies us, saying, "God is a fierce God, a consuming fire," and attaches to it prophecy and promise. As if he should say: Do you want mercy? There you will find it, God will be gracious to you; but if you do not like grace, then you will have disgrace, God's wrath and eternal damnation, which you shall obtain with your sour work; as hell becomes more sour for some than heaven for others; and some earn God's wrath with great toil and heavy, sour worship and great unrest. This is ever meagerly and clearly enough spoken. The works of men are, because we trust in a thing, which is nothing, but the work of men, and not the grace of God.

(74) Behold, what do our new mobs and zealots do differently, item, even the iconoclasts, but to lead the people to works? This is not a Christian who trusts in God's mercy (they say), but who confidently storms the images. Hereby they reject the righteousness of faith. Item, the Anabaptists, what do they do, what do they teach? They say that baptism is nothing; they take away from baptism pure grace, that there is no grace and mercy of God, no forgiveness of sins in it, but only a sign that you are pious, and you must be pious before you are baptized 2c., or that baptism is a sign that you have the same piety. They take grace away from baptism, and leave me there a mere outward sign; there is not a speck of grace, but it is cut out altogether. So when the grace of Christ is gone from baptism, there remains a mere work.

75 Thus, in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, the rejecters take away the promise that is offered to us, saying, "It is bread and wine if you eat it or drink it. The grace offered to us in it is cut off and denied. For so they teach: You do a good work by confessing Christ alone; and if you only eat and drink the bread and wine in the Lord's Supper, there must be no grace.

This is how it is: If a man turns away from the first commandment, he soon sets up an idol and a work in which he trusts. Therefore Moses says: "Dear children, be careful, stay with God, follow him, otherwise idolatry is inevitable for you, you must fall into idolatry, you cannot help it; for grace is always contested by the devil, no heresy can suffer the grace of God.

77.<sup>1</sup>) Idolum is what we Germans call a heretic, an idol; the first ones called it idol; the high Germans call it heretic, that is, whoever falls away from the first commandment and faith and from the right God, and denies the right faith. And Moses shows us that it is impossible to remain without idolatry. When we depart from the first commandment, we become idols and idolaters.

(78) The scribblers of this day also all practice the first commandment, saying, We also preach grace and mercy through Christ, and do not reject the article of the first commandment; and say, I, Luther, lie to them. But behold, they confess that Christ died, hung on the cross, and saved us, which is true; but they deny that by which we receive him, that is, the means, the way, the bridge and the path, which they break down.

The Jews also believe that there is a God, but the way to get to God,

1) The postscripts seem to us to be insufficient here again. We would assume about the following: Who serves a Idolum is, as we Germans call it, a heretic, an Abgötzer fd. i. Abgöttischer^; the first fGermansf called it: Götzer, the High Germans call it Ketzer 2c. - At the end of the paragraph, instead of: "Götzen" and Götzer, it will read: Götzern and Ketzer.

2) Erlanger: the.

namely, through Christ, through Christ's humanity, they deny. The Turk also confesses God; but he denies the way, the means, the bridge by which one comes to God, that is, the grace of God. They do not want Christ, nor do they want the sacraments through which one comes to grace.

80 It is the same and goes with them as if I preached to someone, "I have a treasure, and yet I do not hold the treasure up to his nose, nor do I give him the keys to it; what good would this treasure do him? They lock up the treasure they should put in front of us and lead me on a monkey's tail; the access and the handing over, the custom and possession of the treasure is denied and taken away from me.

(81) That is why the fanatics say much about God, about the forgiveness of sins and the grace of God, even that Christ died; but how I obtain Christ, and how grace comes to me, so that I get it, so that we come together, they say: The Spirit alone must do it; they lead me on the monkey's tail; they say that the outward, oral word, baptism and sacrament, is of no use, and yet they preach grace. That is, proclaiming the treasure to me, and saying fine of it, but taking away the key and the bridge by which I should come to the treasure.

Now God has ordained that this treasure be given and presented to us through baptism, the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, and the outward word. For these are the means and instruments by which we come to God's grace. This they deny. I say this because the devil is so quick to confess these words, but he denies the means by which we come to it; that is, they do not deny the treasure, but the use and benefit of the treasure, they take away and deprive us of the manner, means, and ways by which we come to it and enjoy the treasure, and how we should and may come to grace.

They say that you must have the spirit, but they will not let me know how I can have the spirit. Well, how can I get the spirit and believe, if they do not preach the word of God to me and give me the sacraments? I must have the means, because faith comes from the ear, the ear from the heart.

But by the oral word, Rom. 10, 17. Summa Summarum: No mob can arise, it must run against the first commandment, and must reject Christ, and in this article all heretics are collected in one summa.

(84) Therefore let us keep the article, "Thou shalt not have other gods," and be diligently mindful of this purpose and scopum. For, if we let it slip out of our sight, then the gate and the door are open to all the red-blooded spirits. God has never wanted to have his worship in the world without external means. In the Old Testament, He gave the Jews a way to find Him; there was a certain place of the tabernacle or tabernacle of the congregation, the altar, the lampstands, the Levites, and He did not allow Himself to be found without external means and ways. He proposed to them every way an outward means, that they might find him; he would not let them go astray without a way and an outward means.

But, just as our enthusiasts are now running away from this way that God gave us in the New Testament, so the Jews also left the same way and sought other ways. God cannot be our God if He gives us something external to find Him in, such as the oral word and the two sacraments. If I do not meet God through external things, how can I meet Him?

Therefore all heretics have been against the first commandment, and have transgressed it in all manner of works of men, and have cut off the promise and grace of God which is put therein; yea, denying God Himself, rejecting the benefit and custom, that one may not come to grace.

V. 29-31. But when thou shalt seek the Lord thy God there, thou shalt find him, where thou shalt seek him with all thine heart, and with all thy soul. When thou shalt be troubled, and all these things shall befall thee in the last days, then shalt thou turn unto the LORD thy God, and obey his voice. For the LORD thy God is a merciful God: he will not leave thee, nor destroy thee, neither forget the covenant which he sware unto thy fathers.

I would like to see the one who is so learned, who could take this text away from the Jews, except for the apostles. It is a very powerful text for the Jews. But it contains this: "In all the troubles that will befall you, when you have fallen away from God, you will cry out and seek God, and the Lord will remember His covenant. A Jew says from this text: If we have sinned and fallen away from God, now we seek the Lord with all our heart. Therefore he will not forsake us, but will have mercy on us again, and remember his covenant which he made with us. And this text seems to be strongly against the New Testament.

88. But it is a common text that God will not forsake them that are heartily converted, and believe on Him again: though they have fallen, yet will He receive them again into grace. As you see, it also happens to us. Although we deserve punishment, yet if we turn back to God after the transgression, mercy comes to us again; as the prophet Joel Cap. 2, 12. 13. also says: "Turn to the Lord your God, for He is gracious, merciful, patient, and of great kindness, and soon repents of punishment." But that it is said above [v. 24] that God is zealous and a consuming fire is because of this, that one may not be sure nor presumptuous if God does not punish; it will certainly happen in the end. Therefore, one should not trust in the fact that God is merciful, as the text says here, and go and sin; for you will find out that he is also a consuming fire, and if you sin, he will devour you. Again, if you have fallen and cannot help yourself, God will not abandon you, but will help you again to keep His commandments.

He is a merciful God, and does not punish in such a way as to exterminate and destroy, as the devil usually does, so that there is no help or counsel left. He strikes with pestilence, famine, time and war, devastates countries and cities, destroys livestock and people; but God still preserves one or two who begin to build a city again. When, in the flood, He kept eight people in the box Noäh

[Gen. 8, 18], so he received Lot and his daughters at Sodoma [Gen. 19, 30]. But this sermon is told to those who are under punishment and want to convert and believe; for them such a comforting promise belongs. But to the others, who live godless, reckless, and without all care or consideration of future punishments, something is to be said of the devil and hell; they only get worse from such preaching. So it is a common saying that God punishes with moderation, so that he does not destroy everything, lest one despair; for the punishment belongs to those who are wicked and do not want to stop sinning.

90. but that the Jews use this text for their salvation, after God has destroyed Jerusalem, and they still hope that their kingdom shall be established again, tell them again that it is also written here: "If you seek Him with all your heart and with all your soul, God will be a merciful God to you. St. Paul deals with this saying in the epistle to the Romans Cap. 11, 31. f. tremendously. Who else could solve this riddle if St. Paul had not solved it?

91. "When you will be afraid." In the same place, he does not say that God will leave the boys unpunished, as the Jews think, but that he will take them all. This is also not his opinion that he will take them all by grace and place them in his kingdom, but, although he has punished them, he has nevertheless accepted many of them as members of the Christian church, namely, who have been restored; just as some are still being converted today.

So the papists of today could also say that God does not abandon his church, Christ truly remains with his church until the end of the world, he does not leave it; who would want to take that away from them? For Christ himself promised this in Matthew, chapter 28, v. 20: "I am with you until the end of the world." And in John chapter 14, 18: "I will not leave you orphans." That is why the pope and the bishops hurry: "We will remain and not perish, because we are the Christian church. Yes, you answer: if one converts with all his heart and soul.

For this reason Moses does not say, "Those who desire to go down to the ground in sins, like a sow in dung, and set themselves against God, he will raise up," but rather, "Those who seek the Lord with all their heart and with all their soul: Those who seek the Lord with all their heart and with all their soul. He will not be gracious to any people, whether Jews or Gentiles, unless they are converted through fear and hardship, that is, unless they believe in God with all their heart. Therefore, you cannot say that he promised mercy to any papist or other impenitent, but only to those who turn to the Lord with all their heart, whether Jew or Gentile, papist or evil Christian, pope or bishop. To all who sigh and cry out to him from the heart, and fall away from idolatry and the work of their hands and other sins, he promises mercy. Therefore, the Jews must not pride themselves that they will bring God back, for they do not call upon God's mercy, but still boast of their works, fleshly birth and arrival, that they are Abraham's seed, John 8:33.

Therefore, this saying is strong for the Jews and the Papists; God will not abandon His people and His Church. But say you who are his people and church, namely, those who seek the Lord with all their heart and soul. Let us describe the Church in this way, that it is those who trust in nothing but God's mercy alone, and recognize the first commandment; who renounce their false faith. That is, God's people and the Christian Church, who rely on nothing but God's grace and mercy. The others may boast of the church, or even call themselves angels, but they are not. The devil may disguise himself as an angel of light, 2 Cor. 11, 14, but he is not. Therefore they may well convert and leave off the false confidence of their works, for it is nothing at all. I have said this for the sake of the Jews and our papists, who always have this in their mouths, and yet do not see what is meant by righteous conversion and renunciation of ungodly intentions.

95. So far, we have heard how Moses so earnestly requested that the children of Israel

God and His commandments, or make idols and images for them, whatever they may be, for God is a consuming fire. Moses gives such a serious, great, excellent admonition before he begins the Ten Commandments, so that he may awaken them and encourage them to be serious, so that they will not think that they are hearing a fable, but that it is a real seriousness, because he calls God a consuming fire, a fire that eats, and in addition, a zealous one who does not let up. As if to say, He who does not keep the Ten Commandments must be devoured and consumed and laid waste.

The "fire" is the most powerful and fierce element among all. What cannot be conquered, swept, broken or changed, one attacks with fire, thus it is made pliable and forced. It can force silver, gold, iron and all metals. That is why God compares himself to this element. As if he wanted to say: You cannot escape from me, if I start a search, no one can resist me. If someone sins against my commandments, I will find him and know how to punish him.

97 Then he calls him "zealous" who will not cease, he must keep his word. There is both power and will, strength and might, that he can and will punish. If we believed this to be true, we would not despise his commandments; but no one believes him to be so until we know.

(98) Neither did the people of Jerusalem believe that they were doing evil against God and that they should be punished by Him, until the Romans came and destroyed the city, so that not one stone was left upon another, Luc. 19:44. Thus, a wicked man who harms his neighbor, steals and robs, does not believe until the executioner comes and hangs him on the gallows. Likewise, all other vices, dishonors and sins that go against the Ten Commandments, such as contempt of God, cursing, murder, adultery; they already have the judgment over their necks, that this zeal, wrath and fire will come upon them and destroy them. Unless they repent, no one in the world will be able to escape and do what he wants.

If he wants to avoid the punishment with true repentance, God will keep and spare the punishment, as Jeremiah is told in the 18th chapter, v. 7: When an ungodly kingdom, which I have threatened to destroy, shall turn from its ungodly ways, then I also will repent of the calamity that I thought against them, and I will build and establish that kingdom.

(99) Therefore, from his youth, one should learn and practice the Ten Commandments, so that he may know what to do and what not to do, and what good works belong to each one in his tribe. For if one lives ungodly, he will not escape punishment. But if a man escape here, that he may be spared the punishment, he shall receive his judgment elsewhere. Therefore, if he escapes the whisk in one place, he will get a rope against it elsewhere. Summa Summarum: Finally, he does not escape this fire, for God says, "I am a consuming fire." As if he wanted to say: Do not take it for granted, whoever you want, you shall not escape from my power; even if you leave the world, you shall not escape from me, Ps. 139, 7. ff.

We see this also in experience. It is quite strange that a murderer, adulterer or thief is punished. For God has ordained and appointed the authorities to punish such sins, and it often happens that such boys are punished before one looks around. Therefore, learn even more to fear God from your youth and to keep His commandments. For you cannot escape punishment. If you escape punishment in this life, you will still go to hell and die an eternal death, and thus still receive your deserved reward.

But godless hearts despise it, and do not believe that God is so near, and do not use fire at all; they do not see the lightning before the thunder, that is, they receive the punishment only after the sin is committed. But in truth it is not a joke, the Lord comes before those who do not fear God. However, he looks through his fingers and pretends that he does not want to punish them, and they also respond honestly, just as if God did not see it and did not know about it.

drum [Is. 42, 14. Ps. 50, 21.]. Well, you hear here that God does not let it go unpunished, they shall not carry it away like this, the fire shall come upon them. This I have had to repeat for the sake of this way of speaking, so that you may know what it is when the Scripture says, "A consuming fire"; item, "to be zealous". Therefore he also said above [vv. 25, 26], "If ye therefore beget children, and dwell in the land, and make unto you idols, and do evil in the sight of the Lord your God, and provoke him to anger, ye shall not dwell therein long."

For this cause (as he says here), because the fire will come upon you, and you will be destroyed badly; as soon as you make idols, the fire will strike you. And he himself interprets what the fire is; not that it always falls from heaven and consumes the idolaters, murderers, thieves and scoundrels, but so that you are sure of the punishments, which you certainly have before you. And he says, "I call heaven and earth to witness against you, that ye shall soon perish from off the land whither ye go over Jordan to possess it; ye shall not long abide therein, but shall be destroyed." As if to say, "If you are ever certain that you will soon perish, know that it will not go unpunished, for God is a fire that consumes, devours and devours; that is, He will destroy you as fire consumes a house, turning it to ashes and dust."

(103) There you see that he is most concerned about the first commandment. He is serious and only about the images and idolatry of the heart, and he especially indicates and says: "If you now bring up children," that is, if you grow and increase, and if it comes about with you that you take the land, and forget God who brought you out of Egypt, and establish idolatry, and judge yourselves according to the manner of the countries in which you dwell, then the punishment will not remain outside for long.

Among us Germans there is a saying that goes like this: Some condemn their souls for the sake of their wives and children, or for the sake of their misery; and it is all too true. Moses also indicates this here. When God gives a man a wife and a child in his house, and other food more, which should be a cause for him to trust God the more, he abuses them, and trusts and believes God less than before, when he had nothing. Now, because he has them, he falls into the belly care, how he will raise them high; works so that they may have a higher status than he himself, or each one may have as much as he has; does not think that he who has given him body and life will also give food and cover, clothing and food (Matth. 6, 31.). Immediately one falls into disbelief of God, and falls into cursed avarice [1 Tim. 6, 9. 10.].

This is very wicked in the world; for everyone wants to provide for his children, so that he is not satisfied with the poor food that God gives him, but he wants to go even higher than God gives him; therefore idolatry of avarice must follow, Eph. 5, 5. For, where care of food is concerned, then soon a scratching and scraping follows, and mammon stirs up viciously; then God is lost. I could give many examples of this from the histories, but we are up to our ears in it ourselves.

Therefore Moses says: God will bless you, he will give you children, that you raise them, and keep them in his service, honor and fear, and he will give you food and nourishment [Ps. 128, 3], only that you also keep God for your Lord God. But we do not think otherwise, for God has forgotten us, and so the children are a cause and occasion for unbelief, which God has given us, that they should provoke us to faith; then also the tiresome mammon comes, and is worshipped in all corners.

(107) So now Mose is to do everything only for the first commandment. Do the same, then you have the others all easily kept, because against the first commandment it goes all. Therefore, if one forgets God, despises Him, and does not fear Him, seeking something else to trust in, it is soon done. This is the most noble infirmity. One relies on his prince, another on a rich friend, another on his field: each one seeks a God on whom he thinks he can rely to feed himself and his own, as if there were no God in heaven who could do it, who could not do it.

There would be children and create bodies, and also provide food and entertainment.

The true idolatry is in the heart, not fearing God nor trusting Him, but setting one's sights on other things. The outward images are not the true idolatry; the outward idolatry is a gross thing. Now, as a warning, he says, "Know that the fire will consume you, and then your care and your mammon will not help you, but you will be cut off from the land where you live; I call heaven and earth to witness. He would gladly put it into their hearts; he is hard on them, so that he may make the people fear God and put it into their hearts.

109] And it is especially good that it should happen to us according to our unbelief; for what we fear befalls us, Prov. 10:24. We have the Jews as an example of this; they feared that where they left Christ alive, the Romans would come and destroy their lands, Jn. 11:48. And when they had strangled Christ, it happened to them that they and their children became beggars. 1) And those who still scratch and scrape, and fear that if they relied on God alone they would lack nourishment, want to help their children to great honors and goods, to bring them up to riches and high, and to provide for them: but their goods often wear out and disappear, so that no one knows where they go, and they ultimately prosper, so that they become beggars with their children. We see that many of them gather treasures, but when they come into the hands of the heirs, they are lost and little is improved. How is this? From this text it is clear and evident. God wants to send a fire, and kill such children, yes, also burn such badly won property, as otherwise also Solomon says: Erosio in domo impii. The word is there, the experience is before our eyes, they shall not escape the fire. The proverb must come true: Badly won, shamefully lost. Item: De male quaesitis non gaudet tertius heres.

110. again, where religious people trust god, and work according to the opportunity of their

The rich, who are well fed by God, get further than others who are rich. Truly, the rich do not reign on earth, but those whom the LORD brings forth as poor Cinderellas are the ones who rise the highest; they reign in the world. That is why David sings in the 113th Psalm, v. 7. 8: "He who lifts the wretched out of the dust, and sets him beside the princes of his people." Mary also sings it in her hymn of praise, Luc. 1, 52, "that God exalts the lowly." And St. Peter in his epistle [1 Petr. 5, 5.] says that he gives grace to the humble, as the examples of the Holy Scriptures clearly show. As, Saul, who was taken from the asses to the kingdom [1 Sam. 10:1]. And David, found behind the sheep, had to be anointed king over Israel [1 Sam. 16, 11-13.]. This is all because God says, "Let me provide for you, I will give you children and food; if you do not want to, remain a beggar. For he that will not believe my word, I am a fire, let him know it. It may seem that other people with wealth and friendship can do and help much, but it is nothing. Believe me alone, and fear me, says God, and you will have enough; otherwise it is no wonder that you will remain a beggar, perish, be consumed and killed. Whoever does not want to believe it, let him feel it.

That is, trust me and no other creature. Do not mistrust me; set your heart on nothing but me. If thou hast not superfluous, there is nothing in it. If thou hast not it with bushels, yet hast thou it with spoons. If you are not a mayor or a nobleman, it does you no harm; remain a citizen and a farmer for a while. If thou trustest in God, thou shalt have enough; but if thou seekest any other god than Mammon, I will eat thee up, and destroy thee to the ground with thy unholy idol and caste god. "He who has ears to hear, let him hear" [Matth. 11, 15].

V. 27, 28: And the Lord will scatter you among the nations 2c. And ye shall serve strange gods, which are the work of men's hands.

1) In the original: been.

This will also happen to us, and we will not have it any better. Only the life that was under the papacy will be started again and again. We will get preachers again, who wear caps, shave plates, put on hard shirts, walk on wooden shoes, and boast of their lousy, stinking works for a church service 2c. For we will not hear of the good works commanded in the ten commandments; therefore let us only be tortured and blasphemed with the good works of the pope and the monks, who are called gods that are the work of men's hands. Is it not true that we do not understand the words, but we have the experience? Imagine the eyes of the Pope, the Turks and the Jews, see what kind of god they have and whom they serve.

The Turks fast for a whole month in summer, bathe every day, do not drink wine, do not live in a binge of eating and drinking, as we Germans do. But whom do they serve with such mortification and devotion, and that they thus constantly war, risk life and limb, and shed their blood? To their Mahomet, who has seduced them, they toil and torture themselves. And this is not in honor of God, but of your devil Mahomet, who has taught them this false, imaginary idolatry, such as fasting, not drinking wine, war 2c. In these works they practice and toil, and get nothing out of it but toil and labor. Their faith is not in God, but in the presumption of their own works, by which they want to be saved. This then is not trusting in God, but it is the works of men's hands, that is, a being and life, or work, devised by men; they are called the works of men.

(114) So the Jews do works which they have invented and devised according to their own devotion; they do not eat blood or swine's flesh. Such are actually the work of men, there they serve their idols.

The papists with their monks and other very many friars and followers keep their rules, commandments and statutes, invented by men; it becomes sour for them day and night. This must be, and cannot be otherwise. For he who falls away from the first commandment falls into one being, which is conceived by men, he gets into human works. For between God's grace and glory and the works of men there is no remedy. If you do not trust in God, you fall into a work or state that you choose.

(116) So the spirits of the wicked fall from the first commandment and do not cling to God's grace; therefore they have fallen down and have an idol, that is, that they have made the sacrament bread and wine. There they blaspheme with it, and that is their idol.

Therefore, either one must serve God, or trust in an idol, or fall away from God altogether and rely on works and other things. For it is impossible for there to be a middle ground between trust and works. One must either trust in God or in good works. This is what Moses is saying here: If you will not serve God, you will serve the heathen or pagan idols and works of men, for one must serve God or become idolatrous and fall on works; there is no remedy.

This change is made here by Moses. He who only believed this would be a great and very useful thing; and yet he must either have believed, or fallen on a work and become a hypocrite. Now those who deal in works are also idolaters. Now I am not speaking of gross, external abuses: 1) but of those who want to be godly. This is why all this is repeated so widely, so that you may see how Mosi is all about the first commandment.

V. 29. But if you will seek the Lord there.

But so that they do not completely despair, he adds this comfort to them. He does not leave it alone with the terror and dread that God is a fire to the wicked, that is, who kills the disobedient who despise his commandments and do not fear him. For if he let it remain so, the hearts would despair; therefore he shreds it both. For the sake of those who are hardened, who take God's commandments and teachings to the wind and despise them; they think that they can only sin freely, so they will soon not be punished. Again

1) Mißbrauchn -- one who abuses.

Also a promise to those who are punished and are afflicted by misfortune that when the fire attacks their bodies and possessions, they will not despair. It is of great need to comfort those whose hearts are in contempt of God, but who now recognize themselves and desire mercy.

A human heart is vain iron steel, a rock and adamant when it is godless. Again, when it is frightened, broken, crushed, and fleeting, there is nothing softer, more fearful, nor more stupid. A lion and a horse are the most joyful animals when they are courageous; again, when they become timid and frightened, there is no more stupid animal among them all than they are; they cannot be held. The greater the courage, the more despondent when the heart sinks. So also the heart of man is unequally disposed. If it goes well and does not eat the fire, it is proud and clumsy; again, if the fire starts and attacks it, it becomes quite despondent, so that it is not easy to keep it up; it cannot be raised again if it sinks to the ground. Therefore it is necessary to do both: to frighten the hardened, so that they do not become proud and stubborn; again, to comfort the frightened, and to preach sweet words to them, so that they do not despair, but hold fast. Moses does the same here, saying:

V. 30. Now when all these things shall come upon thee 2c.

God gave His commandments to comfort the foolish and to terrify the stiff-necked. We have heard so far how he has spoken in many ways in order to drive the first commandment, and to provoke and entice us to keep it. With the other commandments he has not so much concern; but here he has especially set before him the children and the custom of the country. This is also a thing that hinders and detracts from the first commandment, and yet in another place they are commanded to keep their house. But here, as it pertains to the first commandment, God says: "Child, child, you shall not make for yourself an idol for the sake of your wife or children, and worship him, that is, seek comfort elsewhere than from me, nor despise me. Higher you shall

Thou shalt keep me, as thy children; they shall not turn thee away from me, that thou despise my word for their sakes. The Lord Christ also teaches and commands this [Matth. 19, 29], that one should leave house, farm, land, wife and children and everything for his own sake, because he who does not do this is not worthy of it [Matth. 10, 37]. And here he saith, But if thou do not, and serve mammon, the fire shall come and devour thee: but if thou trust in me, thou shalt have enough.

He meets us, and knows well how things are in the world. Therefore, if you have children and the customs of the land before you, and are mingled with the heathen, and have their customs and deeds in view, and they say to you, as the German proverb says, Do as the others do, and you err or do not err, it will soon be done with you that you will fall away from the first commandment.

The world is full of trouble. No one turns his heart to God. All people on earth worship mammon, and very few serve God according to the first commandment. That is why it is said: Where my neighbor goes, I go also; as he goes, so go I; I see no one who does him any harm. He that is among the wolves, saith the world, must howl with them. Item: Si fueris Romae, Romano vivito more; one must temporize, and be guided by the people. Item, one says in the papacy: I remain with the religion of my ancestors; if they have not gone to the devil, then I will not go to hell. And some pretend that they want to stay with the big bunch, like the popes, cardinals, bishops, great potentates, princes and lords; if they go to hell, they have good companions, and they want to follow them. So then the country in which we are, with its adversities, brings us to the point that we also behave according to the country's example, and forget God above it.

124] Moses says, "When you come to your land, you will strike God on the grass. When one man does this, three of them do it, and after that ten, twenty, even a hundred, until it becomes a habit. Thus one becomes accustomed to the people and the being on Earth, that one thinks it must not be different. Say then: I see that these and those do so, and draw their children thereon; item, I see that they pray on this mountain, or in that thicket or meadow, and it pleases the people well, therefore we will also do it.

Now it is a common saying that one also says, "How can I do it? if I want to be among the people, I must do what is the custom of the country, of this lord and of the world. I cannot do anything special, I must do it for my own benefit or for the sake of my children; otherwise how can I remain among the people and abstain? But it is said: Do not do as the world and people will, but as God wills. That is why he says here: Your own children, the world's customs, traditions and habits will move you and deceive you; resist them, attach and hang your heart on my commandment, and say: I will observe nothing but God's commandment. But the devil, the courtiers and the worldlings with their examples, wife and children, good friends and neighbors snatch us away and make us forget the word of God.

126. these are causes and warning ge

nug of God through Moses. But they say here: Trust in God, you have more than ten years to become righteous and fear God; in the meantime I will do as my neighbor does. But think, God is speaking here: Beware that you do not despise me, or the fire will consume you. But if you do so, and seek me earnestly, I will be your God, and will honor you again, and do you all good. And if thou fall, and remember me again with all my heart, I will not leave thee. As high as I have rejected thee and brought thee low, so high will I raise thee up again, and set thee in thy former worthiness.

(127) Moses speaks all this so that one should not forget God, nor despair. For against the presumptuous he says, God is a fire; but to the terrified he says, The LORD your God is a merciful God. Therefore one should walk on the middle road, which means to trust in God, and one will be preserved. Thus Moses is a true master and teacher in interpreting the first commandment; no one has ever done it like him before, nor will anyone ever come after him.

The fifth chapter.

V. 1. And Moses called unto all Israel, and said unto them 2c.

(1) Hitherto we have heard in the fourth chapter the beginning, or preface, which Moses set before the preaching which he would do of the ten commandments. For this is a book wherein is preached the right understanding, use and custom of the ten commandments. Now, in this fifth chapter, he tells the text of the Ten Commandments, and then he passes them through the following chapters, taking them one by one before him. Therefore, let us hear the text.

Hear, Israel, the commandments and the statutes 2c.

2 This is the text, followed by the gloss. For Moses says further that the Jews asked have asked for an interpreter of this text, because they themselves were not able to hear, when God spoke to them out of the fire and gave the ten commandments to Mosiah; then they asked for Moses as a mediator, that he should interpret it to them [Ex. 20, 19]. This is what he is telling them here, that they asked him to be their mediator, interpreter or interpreter. Therefore Moses adds here [v. 5]: "At the same time I stood between the Lord and you." First, he says:

V. 6. I am the LORD your God 2c.

3 Then our Lord God binds them, saying, "I am the Lord who brought you out of the land of Egypt," so that you may not choose another god for yourself besides me. For this alone is the true God, who is here so called. This I have often told you and admonished you; let him who desires to walk in certainty take care to keep the word of God, to cling to the same, and not make him another image, thought or dream of another God under God's name. Moses knew beforehand what would happen to this people; when they came to the land of Canaan, they would find such a great worship and religion of the spiritual state, so beautifully prepared that it would shine as beautifully as the children of Israel; these Gentiles would want to serve God as much as the children of Israel; as the worship of the wicked is commonly apparent and shining.

(4) In Ammon, Moab, Egypt, and Damascus, they worshipped as much as the Israelites; as even to this day the Pabstry glitters more beautifully than ours, the true Christians. Since the Cananites would boast that they served God, who is the creator of heaven and earth, as well as they did; besides, many false prophets would arise from the Jews, who taught a false worship, as happened afterwards with the celebration and service of Ashtaroth, Baal, and others, that so many gods grew up in Israel as there were many cities in it; as the prophets severely punished this, and they sacrificed in the meadows, mountains, and forests 2c. (Jer. 3:13), so that at last it came to pass that every fool would have his own worship; wherefore Moses here preempts idolatry, and comprehends the Jews so narrowly, and speaks to every one in particular (for so his speech goeth to the great multitude of the people, as if it were but one person): See that you do not establish your own worship, but keep that which I set before you and prescribe [Deut. 4:23].

(5) Under the papacy, and now, when the enthusiasts get into the Scriptures, they think that one doctrine is like another. This is not true. Now, if one has read the New Testament and preached some sermon, he immediately boasts of the Spirit. That is why Pelagians and Arians came in the past, and now our enthusiasts, the Sacramentans and Anabaptists, and others like them; they lead the way.

all the names of God, and their error has a good appearance, like the idolatry of the Jews in the past.

The same thing happened with the fraud in the papacy. First came the Benedictines, then the Order of Preachers, the Barefoots, the Augustinians, and from the Barefoots sect came seven other sects. All this had the name that it was a service of God; to this was added the Pabst's idolatry with invocation of the saints, pilgrimages to the Grimmethal, to the oak, to the pear tree, 1) and elsewhere to the gallows. All this had to be called a service of God. There one wanted to serve God. This name, God's service, does it; if it is smeared on a false doctrine and error, that one hears God's name and word, such a thing moves the common rabble, which then bursts. With these heron birds or decoys, the devil, the birdcatcher, sows the people on his flock of finches, and delights them with whole legs. 2)

(7) Moses knows that the people will open their eyes and follow the worship of the heathen, so he warns them seriously. In addition, the same idolaters are always happier and better off than those who are of right faith and godly life. The Christians sit in danger of body, property and honor, and are like the slaughter sheep [Ps. 44, 23], as the 73rd Psalm complains after the length that he is tormented daily, and his punishment is there every morning 2c. But the idolaters are safe, trampling kings and princes underfoot, greening and gloating like a laurel tree, as the 37th Psalm, v. 35, says. This is what the devil does, that he gives such happiness to heretics, so that the true worship of God may perish. This is what drives the common man astray, who opens his mouth and eyes and says, "There is danger and shame, and there is honor and freedom."

1) The pilgrimage sites of Maria zur Eiche (Mary to the Oak) and Unser lieben Frauen zum Birnbaum (Our Lady to the Pear Tree) were near Leipzig (Seidemann, Reformation, p. 118); Grimmethal is in Saxony-Meiningen-Hildburghausen in the Meiningen lowlands.

2) "With whole legs" may well be understood from the bones of the saints. Otherwise, a birdcatcher must first carve pipes from the legs to catch birds. Cf. the proverb: "Who wants to see titmice" 2c. at the. End of the eighth volume of our edition.

not the error among them. Then the common man goes and says: I will keep it with them, and let them have all misfortune.

(8) This is what happened to the Jews. People still say today: "The monks sang, prayed a lot, fasted, and did all this to praise and honor God. This pleases the common man well; he cannot cross over, he cannot maintain himself, but falls away.

9 But what does our Lord God say to this? I do not want worship at all, for it is idolatry: it has the way of leading people on their own trust. Every self-chosen worship has its own nature and characteristic, whether or not it adorns itself under the divine name, that man wants to be saved by his own work. Chosen worship leads man to himself; if this name could be torn from it, it would not be idolatry.

The Minorites think: Through this order I want to become blessed, and also help others to blessedness beside me. If this addition were not there, there would be no monk. Thus every fictitious service has the addition of filth and dung attached to it, so that a man trusts in it; therefore they are all contrary to the first commandment, which teaches to fear God alone, to love him and to trust in him. Everything that strives against it is idolatry. Thus are all Pharisees; because they boast of their status, they do not fear God, for they think they are not allowed to fear God. Thus, among the barefoot monks, fear and faith in God is also gone. Therefore, the Lord calls Himself here and says: "You shall honor, love, fear and worship the God who brought you out of Egypt. So he sets himself apart and gives a commandment that another God, who did not lead them out of Egypt, is not to be worshipped; if there is another, you are not to honor or fear him.

(11) Preach to the Christians, "You have a Savior, Christ, who died for you and rose again from death, delivering you from your misery. Now if you find another who has not died for you, nor done this for you, in whom you have died, you will be saved.

Do not believe him. Truly, St. Francis, Benedictus, Bernard, nor Augustine did not die for you; why will you abandon the one who died for you and shed his blood for you, and trust those who did not die for you? If then we do not seek Him alone, but put our trust in something else, we will be lost. For, as St. Paul tells the Corinthians, he alone is given to us by the Father for sanctification, righteousness and reconciliation [1 Cor. 1:30].

012 Therefore Moses saith, Mark the gods thereby, and ask them whether they brought you out of the land of Egypt? This shall be your mark; but there is none beside me. But this is very difficult to keep; for there is the appearance, which is called worship. The Rule of St. Francis glitters so beautifully that the same monks deny Christ over it and follow St. Francisco. The apparent life of the Baal monkeys, that they pricked themselves with awls and scratched themselves with little knives [1 Kings 18:28], had much more of an appearance of holiness than the teaching of the prophet Elijah.

(13) Then the raging of the devil and the world against Christians, the persecution and the cross that our doctrine brings with it, also deters from the right worship. Whoever clings to Christ, the whole world is hostile to him; he is no different than an owl among birds. And so at that time all the surrounding nations were also hostile to the Jews; they dwelt no differently among the Gentiles than as a little sheep in the midst of wolves [Matth. 10, 16]. The Gentiles were hostile to them because they served the God who had brought them out of Egypt.

14 Therefore, Moses says here, be careful to stay with the pure and sure word of God. Where you do not have the pure word of God, do not accept God or worship, Isa. 8, 20. but say: I have a certain, firm word [2 Petr. 1, 19.], namely that Christ is my Savior and Mediator [1 Tim. 2, 5.] and the Lamb of God, who bears the sin of the world [Joh. 1, 29.]. But that St. Francis' rule is true, and that he is in heaven, asking God for me, I have no certain word from God, therefore I do not want to cling to him. See a 715 that each one may be found in the worship and state that is set forth in God's word, and remain in the same worship. For, truly, no other worship is concluded with God's Word, except believing in Christ. This service is imposed on us in the New Testament, although it is also seriously commanded in the Old Testament.

(15) For the first commandment is the chief thing of all our Christianity; it is the fountain of faith, of all understanding, wisdom, knowledge, and laws; and all that is good is in the first commandment. The first commandment wants everything bound to itself, and drives out trust in creatures. The reason is this: If you fear and trust in God from the heart, you cannot fear mammon, princes, or your own righteousness, piety and the like. For these words take away everything: "I am the LORD your GOD"; I, and not another. What should I be afraid of the devil, of princes, pope, emperor? they are not all called "I" yet. With this little word he draws everything to himself, since he expressly says: I, the Lord. Faith draws everything to itself.

(16) From this commandment flow, as from a fountain and spring, all the teaching of the prophets and psalms; item, all curses, urges, even all promises. Jeremiah in the 17th, v. 5, says: "Cursed be he that trusteth in man, and that holdeth flesh for his arm." Item, that the 118th Psalm, v. 8. 9. says: "It is not good to rely on princes"; as then the same whole Psalm shows everything completely to itself; wants to say: What can harm or help you, without this God? All the prophets, and all the holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament, come from the first commandment; for he attaches it all to himself, saying: If I am your God, why do you not trust in my goodness, and fear or trust others more than me?

17 And Christ is also included here, as afterwards in chapter 18, v. 15, Moses clearly instructs and reassures them to wait for the future Savior Christ, when he says: "God will raise up another prophet for you from among your brethren, and you shall hear him"; he introduces Christ so that they may believe in him.

believe in him alone, and hope in him and rely on him completely. Such a great thing is the first commandment: "I am the Lord your God"; therein everything is understood, and all laws, teachings and regiments must be directed and guided by it.

(18) First of all, you have heard why God calls himself a Lord, who brought them out of Egypt, and binds himself to this deed; thus he will be called, saying not only, "I am your God," but also, "The Lord who brought you out of Egypt," so that he may reject all idolatry that is not called, "I"; item, which did not bring you out of Egypt, or which does not have the certain word of God for itself. If anyone does not have this for himself, it is idolatry, let it shine and shine, however glorious and bright it may be. If it does not have the certain word of God for itself, it is to be thrown away as idolatry.

The Rule of St. Benedict and St. Francis has a good appearance and beautiful form of spirituality and holiness, it also has happiness and prosperity; the devil is the patron, and does them no harm. But it does not have God's word, it does not teach to fear God and believe in him; but it [the rule] only instigates and makes idolatry, and teaches to trust in men. It is the same in all other services. But let all successum, even all glittering appearances, with all splendid ceremonies, be forsaken, if they do not have God's word with them, for it does not help.

(20) But if we accept the right God, then it will come to a head. It seems among us that we do not do good works, and that we do not want to leave; but let God rule, He will bring it through, even if it does not have the appearance. What appearance is it that a householder raises children and teaches and instructs them in the Word of God? What appearance is it that a preacher goes into the pulpit and does not wear a robe? That is why he is reviled and blasphemed. There is no happiness or profit in preaching; rather, one is still persecuted by the world for it, and must suffer all kinds of things because of it.

21. idolatry, however, has much more glorious glosses and appearances, is also considered greater holiness, above the right services.

Yes, our God must be a fool, weak and powerless; as St. Paul [1 Cor. 1, 23] says. In his worship nothing is seen but foolishness and weakness, for it does not have a glittering form, nor great happiness, like that. God presents himself as if he were sick. But the other gods are called gods of wisdom, of strength, and what they do is pure wisdom, happiness and good deeds; they also shine beautifully and are not considered foolish. So one goes there, and with that one deceives the world.

(22) Therefore this warning has been very necessary to the Jews, that God admonishes all here, saying, "Beware, I will be considered a fool, I will appear to be an unskillful god, weak and unwise; but the other gods will be considered strong, wise and praised, and it will be well with them. Therefore beware, and see that you are not offended by it; do not depart from me because of it, for their good fortune and wisdom may well draw you away from me; but look only at this, whether it is the God who brought you out of Egypt. Although they are now most faithfully rebuked here, yet afterwards there have been few of them who have remained and persevered with God, who brought them out of Egypt, and believed His word; for many of them have departed. But devout hearts, when they have seen that one has run now and then, seeking God, have said: I will remain with the God who brought us out of Egypt.

023 But if any man say, What is this to us, seeing we are not brought out of Egypt? and why should we now believe in the God that brought Israel out of Egypt? To this you answer: that these are not true Christians, who do not want to boast about this God; for it is not fitting that we should interpret it allegorically; "out of Egypt", that is, out of sin. This God also concerns us. For this part, "he who brought you out of Egypt," belongs to the Jews; but he no longer put it forward and wanted it to be valid, for they were to hear it until the prophet Christ, of whom it is written in the eighteenth chapter of this book, v. 15.

024 Then he gave the ten commandments until Christ, whom they should receive and believe in. For Christ is included in the first commandment; he is the God who brought them out of Egypt, who gave them the bread of heaven; he was also the rock from which they drank in the wilderness, the pillar of cloud and fire that went before them day and night. But there they stayed with the name "out of Egypt", and would not hear this prophet. Now we have come to hear no more Moses, as they, the Jews, did, who brought them out of Egypt, but our Lord and Savior, Christ. Also Moses does not give God's name any further than the future of the prophet Christ. He has now come, and the Scriptures have been fulfilled, and God has received another name from His dear Son Christ, who led us out of sin, death, the devil and hell, and redeemed us, bringing us to righteousness and eternal life.

(25) Thus Christ is also included in the first commandment, as God is his Father. Because he says that he will send a prophet to be heard, it follows that we must believe the words he will preach in God's name, and fear him and fall to him. Therefore it is not necessary that we believe and fear God in the name that he brought them out of Egypt, which was his name only for a time; but now he has another name, namely, that Christ, true God, died for us, of which the prophets also said many things. Jeremiah: I swear by the living God, the time will come when it will no longer be said: God, who brought us out of Egypt; but the name will be taken up and it will be said: God, who gathered us out of all lands [Jer. 32, 37]. Item [Jer. 31, 33.]: "I will write my law in their hearts" 2c.

026 All this I say, that ye be not deceived concerning the name, which brought thee out of Egypt. For at that time it was necessary to say so and to call God [so], to express [him so], and to bind him to this miracle, for the sake of the other gods in the land of Canaan, which they themselves might invent. Therefore he will keep them from idolatry.

749 They say, "Do not worship Baal or Ashtaroth or Moloch; do not ask whether they are called gods of heaven and earth, but accept the one who brought you out of Egypt. But where is this God found who brought them out of Egypt? In the tabernacle at Jerusalem. Now, God wants to have the service which he himself has done; he does not want to be called by us, but wants to be found under his word with faith, as Moses writes in this book. This is how it should remain.

(27) Thus all heretics and seducers creep along under the appearance of the divine name. For so the papists also say: they recognize Christ, and worship him, and honor God in him. But how can this be true, since the true Christ is not recognized by them, and they dream Christ as they please, and model Him differently than He has modeled Himself? Therefore they only misuse his name. For I am to remain under the name which he himself has revealed to me; so he is also found. Now this is Jesus Christ, whom God sent into the world [John 3:17], and he also came, preached, did miracles, and died for our sins.

This right worship is done through His word. 1) If God's name were not smeared on our works, no one could be deceived, and we would remain undeceived. One does not have to rely on works. If I lived to please St. Augustine and wore a black cap of my own free will, as I would otherwise do for the sake of good fellows, that would have to be let pass. But if you say: It is worship, who lives like this, he is on the right track; that is idolatry. For one accepts the order that God is served thereby; thereby Christ's suffering and death are forgotten, set aside, yes, denied.

29 "From the House of Service" 2c. He often repeats the ancient miraculous sign and the prison they had borne in Egypt, and brings it to their remembrance, that they should not forget it; wants them to Look back at the previous works and the servitude suffered. Why is this written there, that Pharaoh afflicted them? Therefore, as it is written of Pilate in the Creed, so they should remember the redemption from Egypt. In the same way we should praise the good deeds of the Lord Christ. For before we have known Christ, we are in sins, death and error. We should remember these errors and our servitude, just as the Jews should not forget Egypt. Therefore, the house of service and Egypt must be at the top of the first commandment, for the sake of the cause, as the devil, Judas, Pilate, Herod and Caiphas are in the Gospel.

(30) I cannot praise salvation, nor praise and thank God for it, unless I remember the devil, my enemies, error, fear and distress. So now he has redeemed us from the power of the pope, which was not a kingdom, but a house of service and a tyranny of poor consciences; so that we may diligently remember the good deed and the evil in which we have been. In this way, the redemption from Egypt was a sign to the Jews of plague, torture, fear and the devil's rule, as when the young children were thrown into the water, and the old were burdened with joyful services. This was a joke and a pleasure to the Egyptians, but a fear, sorrow and great concern to the Jews. Therefore, this commandment is given to them as a reminder that they should never forget the enemies they were then facing and how weak they were in faith, so that they may now call upon God for comfort and strength.

V. 7. You shall have no other gods beside me 2c.

In this fifth chapter, the text of the Ten Commandments is told from word to word, which God gave to Moses. Now Moses takes up the text in the following chapters and wants to interpret it and explain how it should be understood. Among other things, he will indicate various causes that would cause them to forsake the true God and seek false gods or become idolaters. Therefore, Moses is very diligent to keep us with the one God, who is says: "I am the Lord, your God" 2c. Now, let us also take this before us and act on it with God's help, for here lies all that is called wisdom and is on earth. Therefore, let us speak of it diligently.

1) spent = accomplished.

I have said many times, and I repeat it again and again, but not without good reason, that in spiritual matters and matters of faith no one should refrain from dealing with God through his thoughts. He should stick to the word, otherwise he will not be able to use his reason.

Reason must confess against its will that it is too high for it. Because it is too high for her [she must leave it at the word]; 1) for if she seeks it with her strength, she becomes a fool about it. She will have to let it remain unattained and with the word; therefore she must say that there is foolishness in her eyes and senses, which she also thinks about. It is the same to her as if I wanted to reach to heaven with my finger, or darken and eclipse the sun with my hand; that would be impossible and a foolish undertaking. Therefore, let us not be like God, or even outdo Him, but submit ourselves far, far to Him.

For this reason, they are great fools who seek to know God by their reason. One should cling to the word and wrap oneself in it, as a child is wrapped in its swaddling clothes, otherwise so many sects, orders, superstitions and idolatries will arise in the world, that each one will spread out his thoughts as something special, and without God's word, speculate and invent God out of his own strength and reason. It is enough trouble and work if one remains pure in the word that one exists; what will become of one who flutters about with his thoughts and reason? For if we had been able to meet it with our reason, it would not have been necessary for him to have let himself be heard from heaven, and to have let the word sound, and to have put and bound everything in the word.

God has given no other means than His divine Word, in which alone Christ is to be heard. And no one knows that

The devil is such an artificial master and spirit, who is wont to disguise himself in the divine majesty, and thus skilfully pretends to reason, so that he deceives it. And if we follow him, it happens to reason that it thinks it is all gold that glitters, and all divine wisdom; but there is nothing behind it, and no one exists with it. So take the reason captive and say: I do not want to see or hear anything, because what is the word of God, I stick to it. And the ten commandments are also taught and enforced because they are words to which we should cling and adhere.

V. 9. I am the LORD your God.

(36) What God is is easily learned from the opposite, when one considers what an idol or a false god is; from this one can recognize the right and true God, as Paul indicates to the Romans Cap. 1, 18. All the world is called one God, in whom man trusts in trouble and temptation, in whom he comforts and relies, since all good things are to be had from Him, and He is able to help.

37 Thus have the heathen done, first making Jovem their helper and god, that he should rule well; and Martem, to help in wars; wherefore they worshipped him. Then they made many idols out of reason. The Romans raised up many gods for the sake of various concerns and help that they needed; that one might help the people in war; that this power might be given to another; that this might be attributed to the one who should make grain grow; that one might help at sea in a shipwreck. As many hardships, goods and uses were on earth, as many gods were chosen, until they also made plants and garlic gods. Augustine writes much about this in the book de civitate Dei.

(38) Thus reason describes God as being that which helps a man, benefits him and is good for him. From this one senses that reason knows only so much about God as Paul says to the Romans in Chapter 1, v. 19, 20: "That it is known that God is, it is made known to them, so that God's invisible nature may be seen in the works that he does in the world that he has created. "That God is" means that God is useful and helps in times of need.

723 So we have also made gods under the papacy. Every illness or need had its own helper and god. Pregnant women, when they were in distress, called on St. Margaret, who was their goddess, as she could come to their aid and give them a physical fruit, turn the danger and pain of childbirth to the best, and help them.

40 The miser also have a special god called Mammon. Their own hearts testify to this, because they have such thoughts: There lies my money or cash; if I have not food and drink, Mammon will give it to me; he will help me and save me from hunger. Therefore they put their comfort in it.

41 But the true God is called in the Scriptures [Ps. 9, 10; Jac. 1, 17] a helper in need and a giver of all good. And here lies the power to whom these divine powers and names are legally due, and are to be given by us men.

The children of Adam decided that we should call upon God to help us in our needs and to give us good things. St. Paul also says this, as indicated above. But when the end approaches and the right strong forces begin to be found, reason wavers and wavers in minore, and says: Jupiter, Mars, Venus will do it; and there it divides. Reason thinks that he or she should do it. Hence come all kinds of divisions and schisms, as they are now in the papacy. One says: I know that God will help. But if one should name the same God, then this and the like will result. One says, St. Margaret will help the pregnant women; the other says, St. Erasmus will be the helper of the rich. There were fourteen helpers in one place. St. Christoffel has to help those who are in the last stages. So each one gives the name of God to the one who will do the most good, then faith, defiance, confidence and trust will be given to another, and not to the true God.

43 Therefore I say again that reason knows to some extent that God can and should help, but it cannot know the right God.

meet. She may speak of him, but who he is, where he is, and how he helps, she does not know. The Jews had the text before, which the Gentiles did not know: nevertheless they made altars in the field and in the forest, on mountains and heights, burned incense, built churches, called upon God there and said: Here is God, there is God. This is called groping after God, like a blind man groping after the wall. So we also went back and forth in the papacy, to St. Jacob, to Rome, to the Holy Land, to Jerusalem, and to other countless places. People were looking for God. Reason does nothing else when it does not have God's word; it knows how to say about him and testifies that there is a God, but it cannot really know, because it does not know who he is.

For the sake of this uncertainty, God's word must come to our aid, and God must give himself out in the open, and circumscribe himself in an outward word and sign, so that he may be heard, seen, grasped, grasped and recognized; otherwise it is not advisable for us. You see this also in this text: "I am the Lord, your God, who brought you out of Egypt. There he tells what God is, what His nature and attribute are, namely, that He is good, delivers from dangers, and helps from hardships and all kinds of adversities, because He rescued the Israelites from their troubles and led them out of Egypt, did them good, and gave them the land which He had promised to their fathers. [In this way, hac definitione, or with these words, he depicts works and benefits that they had seen with their eyes and experienced in their bodies and persons when he helped them out of Egypt. Therefore, Moses set forth the knowledge of God in the first commandment, that God is He who always and forever does good and helps, so that whoever needs help may run to this place, where he will receive help. For this God is gracious, merciful, and does good to those who fear him, to the third and fourth generation. This we have from experience.

The Scripture also takes the name of God and shares it with the godly, the pious and all children of God, the authorities, the princes and judges, and calls them gods [Ex 22:28, Ps 82:1]. Sol-

This is because they serve others in their state, and are the ones through whom God helps and benefits. So David and the other princes were gods, because they did good to their countries and helped their subjects when they were in need. That is why they were worshipped, and divine honor was shown to them, because of the divine work that they did for the people and helped them; just as people still bow the knee to the authorities today. For their office is to settle the cause of the poor and needy, to judge rightly and to make peace, so that they can serve the right God and feed themselves.

Thus preachers, parents and disciplinarians are gods, to be counted against their listeners, children, servants and disciples. For they do works that actually belong to God, instruct them in the best, teach and defend, help and advise, as the need requires; they give and do well or good. But this word has now become unrecognizable, it is not properly understood, and in this it is mistaken that, because God does good through authorities, lords and creatures, the people are bursting, attached to the creatures and not to the Creator; they do not go through them to the Creator. Hence it came about that the heathen made gods out of kings, and the Jews also wanted to make Moses a god. That is where all idolatry came from. For one cannot and will not notice how the work or the good deed comes from God, and not badly from the crea

Whether this is a means by which God works, helps us and gives us.

(47) It was because of this misfortune and misunderstanding that the pagans initially worshipped the sun, for it gives light and nourishment. Some have worshipped the moon and stars. Just as sorceresses still adhere to the devil to this day, have dealings and alliances with him. They also accept help from him, that is, what he brings and gives them, and in return they court and serve the wicked evil-doer, and not the creator and helper through the creature, to whom one should be devoted.

(48) Thus you see the origin of all idolatries and heresies, that because man is so blind and falls on creatures, clings and hangs on to them that they will help him, yet God lets himself be heard in this commandment that he is the one true God. But we cannot understand this unless we abide by His word. Therefore, we should walk along the highway and let ourselves be found in the divine word.

49 You have now heard, first, what God is. Secondly, that he cannot be struck, except by his word, which marks him. Now Moses will explain even better who the same God is, and who those are who fight against him, and what prevents, or how it opposes, 1) that the people do not stay with him.

1) "resists" = opposes, causes obstacle.

The sixth chapter.

V. 1-5. Now these are the commandments, that you fear the LORD, one God 2c. Hear, Israel, the LORD our God is one LORD 2c.

1. there we see that mozes begins to strike out the first commandment masterfully and diligently. So he said: "I am the Lord, your God" 2c. What does this mean? To this he answers: that you trust in God and the Lord,

And fear him, that thou do that which is good in his sight, that thou go not elsewhere, that thou transgress not his commandments and his statutes: but thou shalt take heed to him, that he will do thee all good, and it shall be well with thee. This is how we have interpreted it.

2. "Not to have other gods" means to love, fear, and trust in God. "To fear" is to remain with the one GOtt, to fear

I will not seek another God or take hold of another, but will put my trust in this one. For he that trusteth in another despiseth the former, feareth him not, and is so bold as to look for another God, and putteth his trust in him; neither trusteth he in him. And there faith is gone with the first commandment.

3. take an example from the papacy. (I would not like people to forget the abomination for the sake of ingratitude]. Whoever puts his trust, hope and comfort in St. Margaret, or another helper in need and saint, beats God into the entrenchment and despises Him to the utmost; thinks: Who knows what God is doing? He cannot help me; but the holy virgin St. Margaret will help me, because she deserves it. And that is to despise God and to rely on the creature called St. Margaret or St. Barbara, since one trusts and believes her more than God in childish and mortal need, when our trust should be in God alone, that he would help. But most of the people consider him to be a block, therefore they do not call upon him [Ps. 53, 2].

4 An idolatrous warrior calls on St. Barbara not to let him die without the Sacrament; or fast St. Marco to help them. He knows nothing about God. Doesn't that mean to despise God? It is not considered that he could come to the aid of the warriors, since he says: "I am the Lord, your God." Yes, the brave hero David confesses in the 144th Psalm, v. 1, that God trains his hands and fists for war. And you do not consider GOD to be the one who could help you; but in contrast, St. Margaret. St. Barbara and St. Marcus, they can help you?

5. Mary, the dear holy Virgin and Mother of God, has also become the most shameful idol, who should also be merciful to us and help us out in the greatest needs. We have all been so skillful that we have fallen from God, and she should be our gracious queen; Christ has been nothing; that all temples and altars have been commonly founded and built in Mary's honor. Does this not mean to despise God? Does God help, what may I do for Mary's help, or of other saints? But if I set my heart on the Virgin Mary to help me and to do good, what may I do to God? He only sits idly in the smoke hole.

(6) Yes, they say, you should honor the dear saints, because they deserve it. Where is this written? Here you hear Moses saying, "Hear, O Israel, the LORD our God is one LORD." May you what? Call upon him. There is no need for you to run to another; for he says to you, "I am your God"; he does not say, "I will be your God, I will become your God," but: I am ready; only remember and believe me, I will help you.

(7) It is the same with the monks and nuns. When they come into high idolatry, they think: We have taken three vows, poverty, chastity and obedience, and have their order, rule and statute. These works of theirs, which they do therein, are their idolatry. For they depart from God, do not fear Him, are not allowed His graces and gifts, such as the forgiveness of sins, but come trolled and want to be blessed by their order, caps and plates, and thereby obtain forgiveness of sins. And thereby they become faithless, falling away from his grace and mercy, which should justify them and forgive their sins by grace. But they are not allowed to do it; their status, cap and idolatry can do it. That is to despise God, not to fear Him, and to set up another god. For, because their order helps them, they may not trust God. So they never trusted God nor feared Him, and despair had to follow.

(8) Therefore, this is the true essence and meaning of the first commandment: "Fear God," that you seek no other, and trust in him who will give you all good things. "Fear" serves to keep us with Him, so that we do not choose another God. "Trust" brings with it all help, that you alone look into his hands in all your needs, and be sure that he will do the best for you, provide you with counsel and help, because he has promised it and does not lie, and because of that you do not depend on anyone else.

9. his words are: "I am your

God", that is, a helper in trouble, who gives all good things. He cannot speak more clearly than to say, "I will do you all good and help you out of every trouble. He who meets the right God has this, namely, to do all good, and to help you out of all tribulation and distress, and to deliver you. This is easily said, but hardly believed. But we have said that God exists through the creature; therefore kings, princes, preachers, parents and Christians are also called gods.

010 But if any man say, Do I not wrong in worshipping kings, and do honor to a prince, and reverence to priests, by bowing the knee, or taking off the hat? Why then do you say that I do wrong in calling on the saints, in worshipping Mariam? To this I answer: If you honor a prince in such a way that you see God giving you all good things through him, then it is right for you to do well. For you do not receive peace and protection here in this land from Duke John, Elector, nor do I rely on him, but God gives you peace through this man; so that you do not remain attached to the one through whom it happens to you, but come to the one who gives it to you through the prince. For peace is a work that belongs to God alone, and is not the work of a prince or other authority.

So you also receive the sacrament from the priest, and hear the preaching of the divine word; but not as from him, he cannot give it to you, but God gives it through him, he is the means and instrument through which God gives it to you. Think, then, that the prince and the priest are not your God, and that they do not give you the sacrament, the word and the worldly protection as their own, but God gives it through them. Therefore I also honor the authorities for the sake of GOD, who gives me these things through these means, Rom. 13, 1. Otherwise they may have a good year, [which] the princes fear and put their trust in them; for they must go to failure and be accursed. It is a true word that one is wont to say: Princes' grace is like April weather; it does not last long. Therefore the 146th Psalm, v. 3. says: "Do not rely on princes"; and Jer. 17, 5.: "Cursed be he who relies on princes." Psalm 146, 3: "Princes are men, they cannot help. The Holy Scripture testifies to this everywhere, that whoever relies on men will go down.

(12) Now it is another thing to receive benefit through a man, and to trust or rely on a man. From princes, preachers, and parents I shall receive it as from creatures, though God the Lord gives it to me through them; but to fear them and trust in them, as if there were no other God, is not to be done. I shall not fear them nor trust them; for fear and trust all belong up to God. Then shall I say, What is right, that will I keep; God grant, be it lord, master, father, or mother.

(13) But there are too many of them who knowingly act against God's commandment, fear the princes, and do for their sake things that they can never answer for, and that otherwise would leave them well off. They do not fear God, but the prince. Therefore, when they have a gracious prince, they are proud, and no one can agree with them. Yes, to our Lord GOD himself they do not sing of the hauberk. A ruler and an authority must do good by virtue of their office and command, and help their subjects; therefore one should not trust in them, nor fear them, nor do anything against God for their sake; but one should receive good from them as from God, and honor God through them. Therefore, do not rely on men.

(14) Now that some say, What shall we do with the dead saints? Should they not be honored as parents and princes are honored? Answer: You do not see that the saints, such as Mary, St. Margaret and St. Barbara, help you, as you know that your prince and father help you; therefore you must not worship the dead saints. The prince protects you, handles you justly, as the authorities are ordered; God wants to let you see his divinity through them, and gives you peace of the country through them, so that they represent you. This you do not have from the dead saints, who have no command, order, nor even an established status; therefore you should not call on the saints, nor fear them, nor trust in them. Moreover, the greatest thing is that God has not told you to do so. Because you not to fear them, nor to trust them, whom God Himself has ordained for your benefit and prosperity, and that through them He is your God, much less will He have you prefer the saints and hope in them.

(15) Through your parents he gives you life and limb, feeds you and provides for you; yet you should not trust them. You may use them according to God's order, but do not respect them above God; for they are only to be a means by which He creates you in this world and sustains you for a time. But the dead saints are not in this state, nor do they do anything to you; they are taken out of the world; we can enjoy nothing of them, as otherwise of the living according to God's appointment.

Therefore, when I say that the Holy One has the office in heaven, I am making it up out of my own head, without God's word, and the devil is deceiving me with his seduction and false pretenses. And yet this is where the greatest trust is directed, that we have chosen for ourselves special and own gods, whom we feared much more than our Lord God Himself. So we feared St. Valentine, Anthony and Sebastian. Because it was invented by us, we like it. So they said: Yes, St. Margaret has helped me. How, if the devil had done it? because he can also help you. But you can see that, and here you have God's certain commandment, that he has thus ordered these estates, that your pastor, prince and parents preside over you, and they are ordained by God to help you through them; therefore he also gives that they should be honored.

(17) Therefore, it is pure superstition and idolatry if I seek help and counsel elsewhere than from God. I shall not have recourse to them, since God has not ordained help for me, nor shall I honor them. For after this follows contempt and distrust of God, that God is so hard to believe, and the devil is so easy to believe; for what God shows up for a time, the devil soon gives. But we will speak of this at another time.

(18) For this time let us keep in mind that God is the one who does all that is good, and helps out of trouble; not always by Himself, but by all His means, as well.

through his angels, princes, rulers, parents, preachers, Christians, 2c. but above all through Christ. Now it is right that I should know the means by which good things come to me from God; but I should not build upon them, nor exalt them above God, nor do wrong for the sake of kings, princes, and lords, nor for the sake of their disfavor and wrath leave justice; but in God the Creator alone should I put my trust.

19 For this reason David was worshipped, that is, honored, because he had his hands full of good deeds; through his hands went the government, protection and protection of this great nation of Israel. Therefore David was called God; not that he was an essential God, but that he did God's work, and God helped through him out of troubles, did good and redeemed the people. and redeemed the people from their enemies. Therefore, he was not to be relied upon any further, for only if he remained God's servant and instrument, holding fast to His word and command.

We have heard in the fifth chapter the text of the ten commandments, and in the beginning of the sixth chapter it will follow how Moses begins to explain it, namely: "Hear, Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord" 2c. There we hear that the interpretation of the first commandment is this: "You shall love God, your Lord, with all your heart, with all your soul, with all your might." But what this is, we have often heard preached in the Gospel, since it has always been held up to us that this commandment is not so easy and small as it seems, but it is a summa and conclusion of all wisdom and understanding.

(21) For "to love with all the heart" is in the highest affections, and is not an evil, cold work, based only on outward conduct or transgression, as the Jews and Papists understand it; as, not bowing the knee to images and idols, or lifting up the hands against them. If they have not done so, they think they have the right God, and have not committed idolatry. Item, if they fast, wear long clothes, pray their times, keep themselves outwardly in all kinds of gestures after their manner, then they think: We are holy people, and have lived well; as nowadays there are still many of them to be found who

Let outward things seem holy. But here Moses says: "If you want to keep the first commandment and know what is there, do not have other gods? Listen: "You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart", that is, that nothing is dearer to you than God, his word and will; in sum, that we love nothing above him in heaven or earth.

(22) We have heard two Sundays in a row that God cannot be grasped except through the Word, without which He cannot be seen or felt [John 14:23]. If one puts oneself rightly to the word that one loves it, and means it from the heart, then God is also loved. Now, one cannot see, feel or experience this love in us, so that we fear and love God, because if one sees how we place ourselves at the word of God, or how we obediently hold ourselves against the sermon. If you prefer this word, boughs and order to everything from earth, then the matter is bad; then it is a sign that one loves God, and so you will honor your parents, love your neighbor also, not kill, commit adultery, steal 2c. Therefore, if the word is dear to you above your body, life, and what else you have, the matter is just; then you will not harm your neighbor in any of his things, but will keep all the other commandments and works. Therefore, if the ten commandments are dear to me, I will live by them; I will not lie or deceive, but rather leave life, limb and all above. [2 Macc. 7, 30. 7, 2. ff.]

But where do you find them? If they were to be counted, they would be very few. The devil, the world and our flesh teach us much differently. For the sake of a loose penny, we may well throw all God's commandments, His word and neighbor into the redoubt. For does it mean to love and keep God's commandment and word, if you speak evil of your neighbor, defile his wife, or violate him in the marketplace, or anywhere else you can? You may well love the devil; yes, you love a penny more than your God. But you should bite your finger rather than do anything against God and his word.

(24) Thus it should be, if you have love for the word of God: Before you have your

If you betray your neighbor for a penny, or speak a word against him, you will give up your body, your honor, your possessions and everything, and put them first. For a godly man puts the word of God before all things, as the noblest treasure. But if you began to count such, you would not find one of them who loves God with all his heart. For the wicked, for the sake of a word and (as they say) a dove's foot, are wont to put God and their neighbor in the background, to blaspheme. Thus, the miserly take Mammon for their God.

25 Now this is the first commandment: "Thou shalt have no other gods," that is, thou shalt love God thy Lord, hear his divine word and let it be acceptable to thee; what his word means and means, let it be told thee, and keep thyself according to it. Yea, this word of his shall be unto thee the most precious jewel of the earth. Thou shalt no longer have thy body, life, honor, goods, and all that thou hast. But we run over the commandments of God, like a pig over the sanctuary, for the sake of our own lusts and manifold desires, as if no law had ever been given by God. Continue in Moses:

V. 6, 7, 8: And the words which I command thee this day thou shalt take to heart, and shalt hone them unto thy children, and shalt speak them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, or when thou standest out; and thou shalt bind them for a sign upon thine hand, and they shall be a memorial unto thee before thine eyes; and thou shalt write them upon the posts of thine house, and upon the door.

(26) Behold, how vehemently he urges the first commandment, that in our hearts and inward affections there may burn and reign one faith and one love toward God and toward our neighbor. And says: "You shall sharpen these commandments." This is a master with preaching and interpreting the law. He knows that the most power and strength lies in the first commandment, that is why he acts it so diligently. Let these commandments, and especially the first, be commanded to thee with all faithfulness, that thou write them not only on paper, or put them in a book, but that thou write them in the corner of the book.

1) In the original and in the Erlanger: denen.

Do not let them lie there, or let them resound in your ears alone, or be painted before your eyes, but grasp them and write them in your heart, so that you remember them day and night, speak and act gladly about them, work, stand or walk wherever you want. Summa: These words shall be your highest, dearest treasure, for where your treasure is, there your heart is also [Matth. 6, 21.]. You shall at all times let them be most dear to you.

27 But why did Moses speak thus? Because he knows that there are so many people on earth who, when they hear and learn the Ten Commandments and enter into life, already know them by heart and know them all too well beforehand. Therefore, when they hear them recited and told, it is as if they were hearing a fable or a fairy tale, or a new newspaper from the Turk or the king of France; they do not pay attention to it, nor do they think that the Ten Commandments are of any concern to them, much less do they think that they should take them to heart, do them, and keep them. They think it is enough if they hear it once in a while, and they know how to talk about it, as if someone heard something else strange, and they can repeat it. And so the majority of the world is of such a mind that they either seek glory in it and wash their hands of it, or do something for the sake of appearances alone, which they do not care about. This is very annoying, when people soon become wise and tired of the word of God, as if it were only a matter of hearing it from time to time and then leaving it alone; although many of them also despise listening and let it stand. They, as soon as they hear it and it is said, think of another, and when the other comes, they look for another, and so on and on; forgetting the first and most necessary thing.

(28) I have often said, and I still say, whoever knows the Ten Commandments, and especially the first commandment, I will gladly sit at his feet and let him be my doctor. I consider myself more learned than the enthusiasts are, for they cannot do the Ten Commandments. But I can, praise God! I know, however, that the ten commandments are not

I still have to remain a student in this, even though I have often read the Bible. But the prudent and the wise, if they only know a sermon, they think they know it all, and they are doing their hopefulness with intemperate washing; but they know the devil on their head.

029 It is a hostile people that are so soon taught. For they do not think otherwise than that they hear the ten commandments as common things, and can wash, chatter, and prate of them as of anything else. But, dear fellow, it is not a matter of chattering, but of bringing them into life and into action, and publicly proving to everyone that you are thus minded, before you would act against some commandment of God, you would rather let everything on earth pass over it. Now be a master and prove yourself honestly.

Therefore, we conclude that no man on earth keeps and fulfills the commandments of God. Yes, even such spirits and washers do not attack it with a letter or the smallest work. Therefore this is their way: In one day they learn the law and the gospel, so that they can do a lot of washing, but in the meeting, in the deed and the proof there is no one at home. They are only feathers and hairs.

(31) Against these evil spirits and vile talkers Moses set these words, saying, Thou shalt take them to heart. That is, do not become wise to me too soon; do not think that you have eaten it all up, devoured it, and have long since gotten rid of it, or that it is learned as soon as it is heard. No; I will not be content if you take it on the tongue and in the ears, and then let it rush and float over. You shall take it and put it into your heart; therein it shall be and remain your comfort, defiance and support. Strive for it, come to it.

After these things sharpen and sharpen them unto thy children. First of all, remember for yourself that you learn them well, not only in the book, in your ears, and on your tongue, but that you put them into your heart, so that it pleases you from the heart to live by them. After that, when you have these commandments in your heart, continue that you also teach them to your children. And says actually of sharpening and sharpening; does not say, thou shalt teach them alone and recite to them; but with this word "sharpening" he shows what kind of fellows we are. It does not want to be done with bad instruction and admonition, but to be driven, practiced, urged, and persevered in. For our heart is dull, obdurate, and rusty, that it will not cleave to it; it very soon falls from words, therefore it must always be acted upon. Otherwise it disgusts this food, soon gets tired of it; yes, it always wants to be master before it has become a disciple. That is why it is always necessary for those who are commanded to us preachers to stop, so that they may learn it all the better.

(33) I myself know some who think that we should not have preachers or pastors, and that we should tolerate the priests because of custom and old tradition; the salary and expenses that they incur annually could well be used in other and better ways. As if they were (as he says) a necessarium malum. Especially the nobility and some of the clever ones say: "We have books from which we can read it just as well as if we heard it in church from the priest. You read the devil on your head, who then possessed you. If our Lord God had known that the ministry of preaching was not necessary, he would have been so wise and prudent that he would not have had Moses preach it to you, and would have had no need for your ungodly, devilish, foolish thoughts and speeches, so that he would have ordered the Levitical priesthood later on, and would have sent out prophets all the time, as he himself says [Matth. 23, 34]. He would have remained at home as a preacher and pastor during this time. So he would not have been allowed to bind the parents that they were so serious about it and did not let them hang. He knows very well where we are lacking.

This follows by nature: If you get to the point where you think you know the gospel, the ten commandments and the words of God, you are lost, and the devil has won the game. Therefore, when we get tired of this teaching, and it tastes to us like the dregs of a fast, our heart wants something new; it is tired and fed up with the former [2 Tim. 4:3]. Then one commonly says

So I say: Oh, I heard that a long time ago, tell me something else. Thus one always wants to have a different teaching, and people's noses stink of innovation. So when the heart is tired of God's word and no longer considers it its best treasure, then the door is open behind and in front, so that the devil has free access and can introduce all kinds of error [Luc. 11, 26].

(35) So it happened with the enthusiasts, as before in all church histories; herewith they were moved around by the devil, felled and prevailed over, thus he got room. The gospel and the faith of Christ were not a great treasure to them, they had to have something new; they were disgusted with great art, Christ was too little for them; they could do it all; it was an annoying doctrine to them. If a sick person no longer likes food, but is afraid and disgusted by it, he is not far from death, he will soon die. So also, if the heavenly food of the divine word is unpleasant and no longer tastes good, he will not keep it up long.

Let no one think, as long as he lives, that he will unlearn the first commandment. Because God Himself thinks highly of it and does not want anything more glorious or better to be preached, and Moses is not ashamed that he always plays one song on one string, that is, one thing, so it is not shameful for us to always teach and hear one thing. I should be more ashamed and disgusted that I always preach and teach the same thing than you, who should hear it from me. But the Holy Spirit and God are not weary of teaching the same thing, and so we are a hostile people, despising everything. May God protect us from the same filth, so that we do not also fall into the trap of making ourselves believe that we can do it. Truly, the text is set here contrary to such rich, disgusting spirits, so that no one may think that he has learned it all.

V. 7 And speak of it when you sit in your house, or when you walk by the way, when you lie down, or when you rise up.

(37) Behold, how Moses diligently doeth this: Whether thou be at home, or in the field, thou shalt speak of the word; therefore shalt thou not be weary of it. When thou risest up, and when thou goest to sleep, thou shalt do it; thou shalt paint it in thine hands, and write it over thy door, that thou mayest have it always before thine eyes, and do it always, and that it may always be a memorial unto thee. What is this? What does he mean? Moses not only wanted to imprint this commandment on our hearts, but also on our whole life.

The Jews took a way from this text, from Matth. 23, 5. that they made a parchment skin around the head, on which the ten commandments were written, and wrote them also around the clothes; just as we now preach God's word, read, sing, paint, print and write. This was not a wicked way and custom with the Jews, for they wanted to have God's word before their eyes, and painted it in all places, even in the gardens, and certainly took such a way from this text. But they were boys and peelers, as one is wont to say in the proverb: A paternoster wear at the neck, a rogue in the heart 2c. This is not evil, but it is only a pretense, because they pretend to be godly, and in reality they do not even stand up to it; therefore it is hypocrisy, and Christ is also hostile to them, and punishes them severely for it.

Thou shalt preach and speak of this commandment in the house: that is, whatsoever thou doest in the house, or in the field, or in whatsoever place thou mayest be, thou shalt always remember it, that thou do no evil. When I am in the marketplace, remember God's commandment that I do no harm to my neighbor, for God has commanded me not to steal; where the commandment pleases you, and you love God with your heart, you do not steal. If you have this commandment, "Thou shalt not steal," in the marketplace, or in the field, where one has goods, and [fields] 2) to his neighbor, be obedient to him; if you love GOD and His word, you will protect yourself from all deceit, usury, avarice and deceitfulness.

1) In the original and in the Erlanger: this.
2) Added by us to give meaning.

and not do anything against it. That is, to act so that one's life is guided by it.

40 Therefore, when thou traffickest in the house, being a craftsman, a brewer, a cobbler, a tailor, a baker, 2c., remember, I will deal thus with my neighbor, that I offend no man, nor exaggerate, translate, deceive, presume. For God commanded in the seventh commandment: I shall not steal, nor cheat, nor defraud anyone 2c. If I love God's word and commandment, I will not wrong anyone. But where are such? Christians should always say, "I will live my life according to this, so that I do not sin against my God or offend my neighbor. And these keep and fulfill this law, who thus bring it into life.

41) Let the Pharisees and hypocrites go, who wrote the law on their hats and skirts, and never remembered God's commandment, and deceived their neighbor. For this writing on the hats is of no use, even if you rub it in with separating water, 3) for such a one is and remains a rogue. But a devout Christian shall say thus: I will direct my life, work and business with God's help, so that I do not sin against my God, and do wrong to no one; that you remember to love, fear and trust God, and to do harm to no one, but to do good to everyone; then continue, you are on the right path.

(42) Those who carry out and continue the commandments in their lives write the mark on their hands. All this is to be done, that thou remember it always in all thy words, works, and undertakings, that thou fear God, trust in him, and do harm to no man, kill not, commit not adultery, steal not, 2c. but be useful to everyone. Lift this up, and lay hold on your life; do it for a year, and tell me again for a year what you can of the first and the other commandments all, and you shall know it. Remember not to seek your own, not to betray your neighbor, not to overreach anyone, then you will see what loving God means, and you will realize that you are not yet

3) Original: einbeißest.

If you have learned the ABC, you will also recognize yourself as a gross sinner. Then there would not be so much theft and evil deeds. If you loved God, you would not worship mammon. Your whole life testifies against you that you do not love God, but rather hate Him.

V. 9. And thou shalt write them over thy house posts.

(43) That is, Thou shalt remember, whether thou goest out or cometh in, whether thou dealest with thy neighbor at home or without, that thou shalt so live that thou shalt not do evil against thy God. Therefore, God wants these commandments written before the eyes of all.

44 This is a necessary admonition that Moses gives to the first commandment. For he has seen that people, out of pride, make themselves believe that if they have only heard God's word, they can and do know it all perfectly well, yet they live in anger and do little according to it. Therefore he will direct them from the hearing into the heart and life, how they should live with the heart and in their walk. Then people will also see how they harm their neighbor with words and deeds, always seeking their own, and each thinking only of his own cause: God give, let his neighbor stay where he will. For the world prefers mammon to God.

45. But these are the right high things, when God the Lord not only sets before us His commandments, which we despise, but when He also attacks us, sends us plagues and calamities, throws us into the cross and persecution, hangs poverty and sickness on our necks, so that you think God is your enemy. Then see if you can love God in such affliction and sorrow, and how patient you are in it; if you also suffer such things without grumbling, as Job, who still praises and gives thanks in his cross, and says [Job 1:21, 2:10]: "If we have received good things from the hand of the Lord, why will we not accept evil? Praise be to the name of the Lord." There you will find the right knots. If you have not done evil to your neighbor, and if you have kept the ten commandments of God a little, you will still find that the will of God is not pleasing to you.

who should be your highest comfort and treasure. Item, when you are reviled and violated, see if you can love your worst enemy.

(46) But we will leave this for now, and remain only with the common way, that these commandments should not be regarded badly, as loving God with the tongue alone, but that they should be grasped in the heart and in the whole life, that you always remember what you speak, do, intend and begin, in all your affairs and life, that you do not transgress the ten commandments, angering God and your neighbor, so that the word of God may be your best treasure, and dearest to you of all.

V. 10-i2. When therefore the LORD thy God shall bring thee into the land which he sware unto thy fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, to give thee; great and goodly cities, which thou hast not built; and halls full of good things, which thou hast not cut down; and wells hewn up, which thou hast not hewn up; and vineyards, and mountains of oil; 2c. take heed lest thou forget the LORD, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt.

(47) After Moses has explained the first commandment, namely, "to love God with all our heart," he continues, and wants us to stay with the same word and not to seek another sermon, for we can do this quite well. Now he also wants to tell us about the obstacles and the aversions against this commandment, or the sins, so that one acts against the first commandment and transgresses, and wants to clear these out of the way, so that we remain with the first commandment, and avoid and flee such things.

The first obstacle and trouble is Mammon, called riches and abundance, about which Moses laments and prophesies that he will tear you away from your God and from his love, so that you will fall on beautiful houses, oil and grain, fields and vineyards, and other temporal goods, which will then become your god, and you will forget the Lord your God, when you are showered with such physical goods. 32, 13-15], as otherwise the god of all the world is the cursed mammon. Now God wants to defend all of them here in the text and bind them: All that is told now shall not be so dear to you.

than God; for you shall love him above all things, and before that you shall leave your house, your court, your castles, your fields, and everything, that you may keep only the commandments of God.

49) But these words are soon spoken, "You shall love God," 1) yet they have a difficult appearance; they do not ring and ring in our hearts; God's word is not valid in our hearts. What is the point of the five words? some think; for their sake I cannot leave house, field, meadows and other my goods; I take a hundred guilders for these words: Love GOD, your Lord. I do not care much about the words, my house and mammon are much more dear to me. Therefore mammon or avarice is the first thing that hinders you from loving God. So that you forget him and despise him, the beautiful houses and vineyards will do that. This is mammon. Baruch the prophet also says [Cap. 3, 17] that people rely on gold. And David knows well the plague and sickness of men, because he says in the 62nd Psalm, v. 11: "If riches come to you, do not set your heart on them." Therefore St. Paul also says [Col. 3, 5] that avarice is idolatry and a root of all evil [1 Tim. 6, 10]. Therefore be warned from this text. For the first devil and the first temptation is mammon or riches, which cause one not to love God and to be drawn away from God's word.

50 Is this not the way things are in the world? Doesn't experience testify to it? When children grow up and become adults, they make a distinction between goods and parents. Who are the ones who prefer to have their parents rather than the goods? How do they remember the pain, sorrow, and toil that their parents have suffered for having brought them up, even for having put honor, body, and goods upon them? Now that they have been brought up, they would like their parents, father and mother, to be dead, so that they alone could have the goods. For the property is much dearer to one than the parents. Yes, one finds pious people who fight with their parents for the goods. They thank their parents so that they would like to see them dead, so that they would get the patrimony.

and bring them to themselves. Then the quarrel, anger and hatred against the parents arise. Otherwise one who loves and fears God would say: Before I would quarrel with you, dear father, before I would let all good things go. Now those who fear God do this.

(51) Thus we also see how often brothers become mortal enemies among themselves for the sake of good. Who breaks the love between the brothers there? Squire Mammon. But where brotherly love would be here, you speak: Before I am angry with you, I would rather that all good things swam in the Elbe.

So one citizen and farmer also acts with the other. Who then can make children despise their parents? Who causes such dissension between brothers who are of one heart, of one flesh and blood? The god Mammon, he arranges it all. So Mammon tramples God's commandments so that they are not respected, neither by children, sisters, brothers nor neighbors, and natural parents, brothers, and all good friends must be put in second place; as you can see in the divisions, where one immediately thinks: If only I had the house, the meadows, my father, mother, brother and sister would be where they wanted. Do you see here how a mighty lord and god the wretched Mammon is, that he also destroys all God's love and commandments, and teaches to consider them as nothing?

Moses faithfully warns us of this, saying: "Mammon will challenge you and ride you; open your eyes and stay with the one God, and remember: "Fie on you, you wretched thing, that for your sake I should have enmity, hatred, strife and envy against my parents, brothers and neighbors; if I never have goods, I have God, who can give them to me. According to the teachings of St. Paul, I should use worldly goods as if I did not have them, 1 Cor. 7:30, 31: "Those who buy do not keep them, and those who need this world do not need them. So let God be dearer to you than all the goods on earth. If he has given you a house, gardens and vineyards, which you have not planted, trust in him; he who has given you these things can give you more.

54. verily, what thou obtainest from thy

1) "To love" put by us (according to the Bible) instead of: "to love" to make five words, as follows immediately.

Parents, you did not acquire or earn this, but God gave it to you through the parents. We must confess this. But if you ask Mammon: Which is nobler and better, God and parents, or goods? he says: Goods are better than God and parents. Therefore Moses admonishes us here that we should prefer God and His commandment to all the goods on earth. For even if everything is taken from you, he is still your God. He can give you more. Even if he would not give you more, he will not let you die of hunger, for he says: "I am your God. It will be certain that the LORD your God has promised you; but hold fast to his word, and know that goods will follow.

55 Therefore I say, The first offense against this commandment is mammon, who wants to be another god, and is also another god. It was so with the Jews, and also still with us, that we look more to the good than to God and his commandment. This is what mammon does. For if you loved God and His commandments, you would not set yourself against God and His word, even against your neighbor, for the sake of good. But now you are attached to mammon, despising and hating God. This is a sure sign that one does not love God, because one acts so deliberately against God and one's neighbor.

56. But it will not be given to us, says Moses [v. 15], "for your God is a fierce God among you. Therefore see to it that not even his wrath be angry, and destroy you from the earth. Then you see that [it] is not a joke, you must not take it to the wind, nor make a mockery of it. For if I do not keep it today, nor tomorrow, I will no longer have a God in him, but a devouring, devouring fire, which will devour everything, as said above [Cap. 4:24]; that is, he will cut you off from the land and destroy you, destroy your life and limb, and then your soul, so that he will condemn you forever with your wealth and goods.

(57) As experience teaches us with usurers and miserly men, who drain and exploit the people to the limit with their stealing and robbery, God has given us the right to do so.

and despise his word, his servants and all warning; so he despises them again, that their wealth, money and goods do not come to the other or third heir. For male quaesit, male perdit, says the whale. But since they as Christians let God be dearer to them than mammon and goods, they would have enough of all things, and wealth and abundance would be in their houses, also in their descendants, as the 37th Psalm, v. 25, says: "I have been young, and have grown old, and have never seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed going after bread." Item [Proverbs 10:22]: Benedictio Domini divites facit. Summa Summarum: This is the first devil and hindrance that makes us forget God and His commandments. But here we are warned to learn to hold His commandments more dear than all the good that is on earth. May God protect us from mammon, amen!

Thus far the first obstacle against the first commandment has been the mammon, which is a true idol and the worst enemy of God. Moses sternly warned his followers against this idol, that they should be careful not to let mammon ride on their backs and listen to them, nor to serve him, and to love temporal goods more than God. Therefore he said that they should take the Ten Commandments into their hearts and always practice them as a doctrine that cannot be practiced, imagined and acted upon enough. For the devil, the world and our flesh are always stirring up and creating opposition, storming and raging against this commandment. Therefore, since these three do not tire of fighting and opposing this commandment, neither should we tire or grow weary of practicing and enforcing this commandment.

59) So this teaching is always necessary among the people, that Moses says: "You shall" not only "sharpen these words", but "when you sit in the house, be on the way" 2c. That is, it is not necessary for you to write it on the walls with letters, to paint it over the doors and posts for eternal remembrance; as the Jews had such a way, but in all business, handling, food and work we should see to it that we do not offend or harm anyone, but act in such a way that God is more able with us, and more able with us.

Mammon is right with us. For if we go out or come in, if we buy or sell, whatever our nature may be, let a man beware lest mammon deceive him, lest he cleave to it more than to God. Let each man look to his own hand, eyes and deeds, what he does, how his nature and trade stand, so that mammon does not deceive him into evil and wickedness.

(60) The shameful mammon is the greatest god on earth, and it is a dangerous thing to deal in goods [Matt. 19:23]. Those who have riches and goods generally trust in them [Luc. 12, 19. 16, 19.]; those who do not have them seek them day and night, and would gladly gain something. He who has wealth has pleasure and joy in it; on the other hand, everyone is afraid of poverty. Everyone must have an advertisement, business, work, and trade, and wait for it; and there it is dangerous, where something is acquired and driven together. For it readily happens that one either has hope and defiance of the good, or doubts of want. This life hovers between scarcity and possessions, between good and poverty; therefore it leans toward one of two ends, that is, toward trust or despair. This is the source of all kinds of mischief, so that people eat and grind, scratch and scrape among themselves, and so that one person betrays and deceives the other wherever he can, according to the common saying: "He who is able puts the other in sackcloth.

Great and fine cities that you have not built, houses full of good things, vineyards and olive groves 2c.

(61) Then he expounds it with more words and a little more extensively; and here we see the assiduous diligence of Moses in expounding this first commandment. First of all he said, and put these words: "I am the LORD thy God, thou shalt not have other gods." To this he adds a prophecy: "I am a zealous God, visiting the sin of the fathers upon the children, even to the third and fourth generation. Item, puts also to it a promise, as: "To those who love me and keep my commandments, to them I do good to the thousandth part" [5 Mos. 5, 8-10.].

62. lastly, he says: do you want the opinion

I will tell you, when you come into the land and take possession of beautiful houses, gardens, vineyards, mountains of oil, water with fish, and all that I will give you in abundance without your labor and merit, then look at it, it will become the first devil that will blind your eyes, so that you will put the fear of God out of your heart, despise God, and forget the first commandment. For thou shalt cleave unto the goodly houses, and vineyards, and lands, and other goods, which I shall give thee, 2c., and shalt make a god of them, and put thy trust in them, and shalt not inquire so much of me, but shalt forget me.

Thus, idolatry is already established when a man trusts more in mammon than in God, and fears lest he lose him. Moses did not say this in vain, and so diligently warned and admonished, for he knew that Mammon was such a god. And here we hear strong evidence that our nature, reason and will are inclined against the first and all other following commandments. We are such fellows: When things go well for us, we forget God and cannot thank Him, and do not recognize His benefits that He has helped us to achieve, nor can we look back to the time when we did not have them.

(64) But when there is danger, affliction, and distress, or when there is a lack, there is no confidence, faith, and hope in us; prayer lies low, and despair comes upon us. This has been seen not only by the prophets and church teachers, but also by the pagans. And many wise people have complained about good fortune and bad fortune, about good days and bad days, that one does not know how to handle this. So there is also a German saying: There must be strong legs that can carry good days. Item: Man can suffer everything, but not good days. It is also said that when a donkey is too comfortable, he goes dancing on the ice and breaks a leg.

The poet Ovidius speaks finely: Luxuriant animi, rebus plerunque secundis, nec facile est, aequa commoda mente pati. Thus a man can carry everything, however great and heavy it is, except for good times, which are impossible for him to carry. Virgilius also noticed this and added these verses: Nescia mens hominum fati sortisque futurae, et servare modum rebus sublata secundis. A man, when he is well off, cannot sustain himself by his own efforts, misses himself, and exalts himself of wealth and happiness, and goes away.

Read the histories, both of Christians and pagans, and you will find it well. About this, there is also the experience that good makes courage, courage makes overconfidence, overconfidence never does good. That is, not being able to endure good days. It is also seen in the household, and everyone in his position grasps it with his hands, if he did not want to see it in the holy scriptures. If a servant has too pious a master, a child a kind father, a maid a kind wife, they cannot bear it; the kinder it is done to them by their lordship, the less they respect it. So also do the citizens; they are always the more wanton, the more lenient the council and the authorities are.

The lighter the masters they have, the worse they are. If someone is to bring them to something with kindness and goodness, he must have good luck; that is why it is like this: If you beg a farmer, his belly swells up. So it is with every man. If he has good days, it is not good for him to perish until he causes misfortune, and God plucks out his great feathers; for the feeding stings him, it is too good for him. There are many sayings about this, all of which belong here, and are based on this opinion, that when a man is happy and feels good, he is never well to deal with, for he becomes stubborn, obstinate and strange; the devil cannot get along with him.

68] This is what God is complaining about through Moses, and he is about to speak in a human way, saying, "I am not well pleased to make you rich and full, because when I bring you into the land, you will turn back and tempt me. 1) As otherwise in the

1) lücken --- to be impudent and wanton; to jump, to leap, to strike behind.

As it is written in Genesis [Deut. 32:15], "Israel has become fat and fatty," so he begins to lick me and strikes me with his heel. In sum, we must be pressed with the cross and suffering so that we will not be proud.

Therefore nothing is better for the world than a sharp, hard, strong regiment, as is still the case with the Turks and some noble squires are swift, grasping rulers, who take the peasants' coats and skirts. Such rude tyrants belong in the world, not pious authorities, so that they may dampen their hopes. For the world cannot be ruled with kindness and gentleness, for there are always too many bad boys.

Therefore, you see what God is complaining about, namely, that when he makes people prosper through his fatherly kindness, they forget him and all his good deeds. Now Germany lacks nothing, because it is so well off, everyone does what he wants; Germany has this plague, it is too well off, and the authorities are too lenient. That is why there is a loud will to courage in all classes; almost everyone lives according to his own liking. It is lacking that the frogs do not have storks as kings; truly, the donkey goes dancing on the ice. But they will continue to be stubborn until the Lord comes and says: "You have despised me long enough; I will teach you morality, so that you may know that I am still God. For experience always agrees with the Holy Scriptures.

71 Therefore Moses says: Behold, it will not be given to you; if it does not happen, punish Moses with lies. The pious Moses is not lacking in his diligence, always repeats the previous warnings and says: Be careful, your God is a zealous God, so that you do not provoke His wrath against you, and He lets you see a little something that you would never have thought of. This is what he always rubs into their nostrils, that they should fear God, and not let themselves be turned away from the Lord, nor forget him, for he is an angry God, and punishes to the third and fourth generation. But the dear Jews did not ask anything about it, God may be zealous in the first commandment, or be angry, as he wants.

This plague is also between our skin and flesh. When we have only good days,

We do not ask for God, priests, princes, father and mother, and even the devil. But when the hour comes for wrath to come upon you, it will be said, "Exterminated from the earth! Then you will lament that your wife is violated before your eyes, your children are killed, your parents are slain, and your skin is beaten out and your neck is cut. There you want to have help, rescue and protection. But then it will have waited too long.

Therefore, the Lord wants you to understand here: If thou shalt be stubborn against me, I will also be unwilling to help, when death, the devil, war, pestilence and all misfortunes come in heaps, and I will also let thee flounder and be stuck, yes, the last 1) play with thee.

74 It is said to you here beforehand, so that you may be guided by it, that even if you cry out to God, he will not hear you. For here the text is clear that God wants to punish your willfulness, which has been driven against him and against your dominion, so that you yourself will say that he has paid and struck you right. In sum, good days cannot be otherwise than forgetting God, and presumption follows, which passes over, and the fear of God perishes.

(75) Oh, that each one of us would now think in his own state: I am well, praise God; I will fear God, give thanks to Him from my heart and serve Him, and in addition I will faithfully fulfill my own, and do what is required of me in my state, I will be humble and devoted; I know that the Lord will show me mercy. But if I am disobedient and unthankful, the Lord has promised me that he will destroy me from the earth. If this were thought of, there would not be so many lamentations and plagues from the drudgery and so much unfaithfulness of the people. But now everyone thinks that our Lord God has died, that his evil and wickedness will not be punished. Therefore, each one should be ready to be obedient to our Lord God and to do good before His wrath is kindled.

In the Turkish regiment, the servants are treated like this: If a maid does not want to be obedient, she is sold for three pennies; then someone buys her and beats her like you beat a cow or donkey, and chases her with a whip if she does not want to do what she is supposed to do. A strict regiment is also kept everywhere else, and it looks better than with us Christians. The Turk has more guilders than our princes have pennies; nevertheless, he is diligent in his affairs. Each of the Turkish servants has his allotted amount of food, drink and work; if he does not spend it as he should, he is soon there with rods and whips; if that does not help, he strikes with his sword, the knife follows soon after and cuts off his head.

(77) But with us, if a laborer or a servant misses a day or two, or is otherwise disobedient and unfaithful to his master, he has no conscience about it, but thinks he is doing right; therefore now almost no one is obedient to father and mother or authorities. But when the devil comes among you, you will be destroyed from the earth. Therefore, such a Turkish regiment must follow, which will smash us to ruins. Such a regime belongs in the world, that one should rule differently to the people, just as the Turk does; when he lifts up a finger, it goes as he wills in his whole empire. And where such rulers are not, God is forgotten, and all kinds of estates are despised as authorities, their commandments, parents, lords and wives, and other ordained persons.

78 For the wanton people make themselves believe that we must be tolerated and have, that we cannot be dispensed with. That is, we have lived without the fear of God, we have forgotten God, we have not feared God; we forget God, and we do not fear him for good days, and for the service of mammon, for he is our God. But if it were so, that every man should have but a morsel of bread and a drink of water, and yet his measured work, as to load up ten cartloads of dung, and to lead it out, and if he did not do this, after him with the distemper, then they would become more pious, and God not so.

despise. But since this is not so (as we may not get there in blissful times), it is also impossible for them to become better. Therefore it follows:

V. 15 Lest the wrath of the LORD thy God be kindled against thee.

79. What has God done to the stiff-necked Jews? In the time of King Ahab, for four and a half years, He did not let a drop of rain fall [1 Kings 17:7]. Then the wrath also came upon them, and the whole earth withered away. It is terrible and horrible to say that there was a great famine [1 Kings 18:2], that there was no food for the people, no fodder for the cattle, so that all the cattle were slaughtered. And how did it go in the final destruction of Jerusalem, did God not pay them honestly? that after other punishments they finally bought dove droppings and donkeys' heads, one almost for three guilders, which they otherwise would not have been allowed to eat. The children died of hunger in their parents' arms; others saw their children slain; some slaughtered their children; after that the cities were plundered. So God avenged their ingratitude and punished their contempt. As if to say: You have forgotten me, well, I will now forget you again. And when the need was there, they cried out; but he heard them not, neither helped they.

So it will also happen to us ungrateful Germans that we will cry out in misfortune and hardship and receive the word: My wrath is fierce, and we will have no hearing nor help. For our days are too good; we know not (with leave) where our backs are. Upon my soul, it is not to be joked about; it is not possible that [it] remain unpunished; the punishment cannot fail. A great plague must come upon Germany; I fear it will all come at once, pestilence, war, famine. No one fears God, everything is wanton; servants, farmers, craftsmen, do everything they want. No one punishes, everyone lives according to his will, cheats and deceives the other. It is impossible that [it] should remain like this for a long time, because the good days deceive us.

Would to God that there were among us some few understood this, who prayed earnestly that the punishment would be postponed, and if it did not remain, that the wrath would not come in our or our children's time. For when war comes and the Turk comes, faith, preaching, the knowledge of Christ, the sacrament, baptism and the Lord's Supper are all gone, as can be seen under the Turk, and we become like beasts, so that they drive us and hunt us down like cows. Then you will have to do what you do not want to do now. And those who do not want to live according to God's commandment now will only have the Turks sent upon their necks. If the Turkish empire did not harm the gospel, I would wish it upon us, that it would be our master, and afflict us well, who are now safe spirits. But it is impossible, he destroys the Gospel and the Church of God.

(82) Therefore it is better that we should suffer the adversity, the people's willfulness, and the peasants' reproach, with the gospel, than that we should have the Turk for our master without the gospel, and lose the gospel. But if we were under the Turk, each one would have his measured food, certain purpose and time to eat, and a definite work, and not a drink of wine, but water, and his piece of bread, and not a morsel over it. You would not have to go to beer, as it would be good to prevent people's slovenliness and gluttony and drunkenness. As now in Turkey the captive Christians are forbidden to drink, and now they suffer hunger and have to work like donkeys. If you would not do it, the Lord would come with a rope, bind you and scourge you. Then you would know that I had not lied; if I were lying, rebuke me. You would then gladly give thanks for the peace, and God the Lord would take you out of the alehouse in the name of the devil, and you would have to work as if your skin was smoking. Then you would remember me. If I lie, Moses also lies; but he will not lie, therefore it will also become true with you.

First of all, do what God has commanded you. Do not be a servant of mammon, do not forget God. Then do not steal, do not rob.

Do not, serve, work faithfully, do your office, what you are commanded, with diligence and faithfulness. Be obedient to your overlords, and you will have a gracious God, and you will be blessed, become rich, and prosper. But if you do not work faithfully and honestly and treat your neighbor sincerely, you shall be destroyed; wrath, anger and persecution shall befall you.

84 Dear one, do not let the good days deceive you. But this is in vain, and is said to the deaf. As it is said that it is impossible to endure good days. Therefore it must be inculcated with the word of God, to raise us up a little, and to exhort and urge us to fear God, and not to forget Him, if it would help a little, as otherwise, without the sermon, truly, no one would respect Him. For when nature is too comfortable and lives without God's word, it goes dancing on the ice and runs into the lark's field, where it stings the food. In danger, however, it cannot preserve itself; there is nothing but trembling, trembling, fear and despair.

For this reason, the preaching of the divine word is prepared to exhort a man to the fear of God, and to remain with God when he is well, and again, not to despair when he is ill, but to persevere steadfastly in the faith. So also here the divine word admonishes us, saying: Be careful, beware when you have good days; for, do you know what it means? When you fatten the swine, you want to slaughter them; death is nearer to the sows than when they go astray; as Jeremiah the prophet also says [Jer. 12:3].

So, if God gives you good days, gives you grist and mire, and you fatten yourself with God's goods, it is truly for your brat. One will come and slaughter you, and make sausages of you, and eat you up, and consume the sea, the lard and the fat, that is, take away your accumulated goods and treasure.

87. this is a piece that Moses wants to say: rather, when there is good time, and there is no pestilence or other accident present, and you sits in alehouses, drinks, sings and listens, and does not ask much about what [the] grain is worth, where one takes food and drink. As the servants think: The master and the wife must manage well; they are without worries, and the day laborers work four days a week. To the same it is said: Because it is so good, beware of the safety and forgetfulness of God, do not become bold and proud; for it is time that you remember God's commandment and do not forget God.

(88) Truly you should thank God that you are sitting there with good peace as a squire, and God the Lord is keeping you this peace for so long; you are driving your sheep out and in from the sheepfold without any care, so that the murderers do not slay you. But yes, that you only once remember: Dear God, help me to do what you want me to do, that I love you and serve my neighbor, I will cheat no one, give my eggs and cheese right 2) purchase. No one wants to think about this, and thank God for such gifts, to be obedient to the authorities, and to serve the neighbor; but one says: I want to be free, to sup my beer, to sell what is mine with advantage, deceit, and overthrow; because it is mine. And so you need the noble peace and the gifts of God, that you desecrate and blaspheme God. Therefore he will come and tear you out of the earth in his wrath and destroy you. Do you understand me? I am speaking in German. You have a blessed time, I also wish you happiness in your good days, that you may use them well. But watch out, come war, since you now give two pennies for a jug of beer, then you would gladly give a penny.

You will not then sit idle in the marketplace, as you do now, when you live in all riches and abundance, and use these benefits, not to thank God, but rather to spite and shame Him, and to harm your neighbor; you do not think of temporal peace as you thank God for it. So in a household the servant cares nothing for food and drink, does not care for food, clothing and wages, considers it all nothing; for he knows and relies on it,

2) "right", which is missing in the original, is taken by us from the old edition.

The Lord must provide well. He does not think how good his days are, lets someone else take care of him, is disobedient to his lordship; thinks that he is there only to eat and drink; thus abuses his good days, and stings him too much with food, and makes himself shitty enough.

(90) But the great men and mighty men do this much more surely. Doesn't that mean forgetting God when he does good to you, and you don't know how to make yourself bad enough to annoy God and harm your neighbor, you don't think about temporal peace? How, if theurung, war and strife came, and took away this treasure of peaceful, sufficient life? Then servants and maids will become so cheap that twenty, thirty, forty maids and servants would gladly serve more diligently for a piece of bread than they do now and for money. In other places, where there is a theurung, one takes a piece of bread and serves for two days; now she serves barely half a year so diligently for great pay and wages.

91 Therefore Moses saith, Beware lest thou forget the LORD, which brought thee up out of Egypt. But we do not see it now, it is out of our sight; but it will come to our fist one day; we struggle for it, and it will come. We pervert everything, and trust too much in the good days, since we should be afraid in the good days, and not be too sure; again, consider the time of trouble, that then one should trust in God and not despair. For God will not lie; if you misuse your good days, He will destroy you. This is one thing, that we should fear, and not forget evil in the blessed time; that you should think what it would be like if war or terror came, and if you should serve one who would hardly give you a piece of bread, and strike you to the ground for it. Again, that you also hope in God in the time of tribulation. That is, as the wise man Solomon [Proverbs 30:9] says: When things go well for us, we exalt ourselves; when things go badly, we despair; this he took from the first commandment. This is a part of our naughtiness: When it is well with nature, it cannot abstain.

she forgets about God; and lets go hands and feet when things are bad.

Therefore God's commandment and word must come to encourage, awaken and warn us, for your own good, lest you come to harm, and lest, when it is well with you, you trust in your present gifts and goods and do evil against God and your neighbor; otherwise, if it were not for the preaching, it would come to pass that one ass would put the other in sackcloth. So Solomon admonishes us in the same way that Moses did, that we not be deceived by security, lest the donkey go dancing on the ice. Therefore, the donkey's food must be placed higher, so that he can honestly 1) bear the skin, and so that his ribs may be counted; sacks must be placed on him.

93) In the book of Proverbs of Sirach [Cap. 33:25] it is said, "To the ass belong three things, food, sackcloth, and staves; so also to a servant belong food, work, labor, and staves"; that is, to every one that hath business, that hath office or service, whether he be mayor, or judge, or servant, or maid, or whatsoever his profession be, he shall have three things. First of all, he shall be given food and drink, and then a sack to carry out his work and supply him with food and drink, so that he may not only eat and drink, but also work. And if he refuses to have only the food and not the sack, then a good stick must be used, and the skin must be threshed so that the stripes are counted, and the tickle and the lick will be gone from him.

(94) Each one wants only food, but you must also carry the sack. The donkey does not like to carry the sack, nor does the servant like to have the work; but we all want to have the food and the wages, we all strive for good days. There is no lack of food, yes, we have too much; we would also have sacks, but there is no stick, there is no earnestness, anger and emphasis, as there should be. The stick should also follow later, so that one strikes. The Turk or some other horrible tyrant belongs to us; although our princes are also sticks enough.

1) honest--barely.

V. 16. 17. You shall not tempt the LORD your God, as you tempted him 1) in Massa; but you shall keep the commandments of the LORD your God, and his testimonies, and his statutes which he commanded.

This is the other piece. For, as I have said, when one is too well off, he does not fear God, he forgets him, and becomes arrogant and presumptuous. No one cares for the other, thinks that he is not allowed to serve anyone, so he robs and steals in the world. Again, when things go bad, flesh and blood can suffer nothing less than evil days. Mammon has two arms, with which he rules the world; with the right arm he rules, when things are going well, everyone does what he wants; then one fears Mammon, and God is forgotten. When things go badly, when evil days are present, he rules with his left arm; then man tempts God the Lord.

Now the temptation of God is many. But here he speaks of the real temptation of God, namely, when Israel tempted God in the wilderness with the bread of heaven; when they had neither food nor drink, they went to Moses, and once they had a fight with him, grumbling against God and Moses because of their hunger [Ex 16:2, 17:2]. They almost wanted to say, "The devil told you to bring us out of Egypt, and do you think that God is here? Otherwise we would ever have to eat. For this reason they would not believe, nor suffer any lack; they would not wait and trust, but immediately grumbled if there was no food; they set a goal, measure, person, time, manner for God: so you shall give it to me, through this, at the time 2c. They wanted to have our Lord God bound to give it to them according to their will and set goal and time, and could not wait one day for God 2) and say: I need this and that, but I leave it up to you; how or when you give it to me, I will gladly accept it.

97. that is, god is trying, if we want to have a thing from god, as we want to give it to him.

Or we fall away from him, that we also cannot expect One day, or give him what we need, or trust him, and stand firmly on him when things go badly. That's where idolatries and pilgrimages come from in the papacy, so that we celebrate the saints: that's how people ran to the oak tree when they were in trouble, so that the saints would help them. Each one has sought ways that he might suffer nothing, and trust God and expect help from Him. That is to try God, when I lack something, that he should give it to me soon, when I want it, and what I desire from him, and not wait or hope for his help.

Thus did the Jews, tempting and tormenting God in the wilderness, grumbling against God. What they only wanted, he had to do on a strict deadline, as to give water, quails and bread from heaven 2c.; aimed it at him with measure and time, when he should give it to them, but he did not accept it. So at all times mammon rules in two ways: First, when things go well, Mammon is master, and makes us forget God, makes us safe. Again, when things are going badly, he will come again and make you try God in your misfortune, or throw him away and accept another. Thus Mammon wants to rule in abundance and in scarcity. Do you not see this before your eyes? They would like to have it in their fist. If they have it, God is forgotten. If it goes well, it is no good; if it goes badly, much less. If it goes well or badly, he is not to be advised.

99. How can you help him? Mammon fights and stings. The first commandment is in such dire straits that it cannot be kept, for better or worse. How can one make people pious? How can one govern the world? Let there be a measure and a way. For if it goes well, God is forgotten; in danger God is tempted. If the LORD said, I will give a man good days, and he shall serve me. Yes, behind him, as the peasants carry the spits. If I give it to them, they do not thank me; but if I am angry with them, they run away from me, and attach themselves to other gods, or despair.

100. this is how it goes: if I laugh, they will proud; if I am angry, they despair. Thus nature cannot rule the world, and the commandments of God cannot be kept nor understood; for our nature cannot refrain from becoming proud when things go well for it; thus again, when things go badly, it cannot stand and wait. So you see how God's commandment resists on both 1) sides, and yet is equally despised. That would be a middle way or middle road, if it were to be found that God would not let it go too badly nor well, that not only good would go, but also not evil; for whichever goes, God is forgotten, despised or tempted. But this cannot happen, therefore one must be careful.

All idolatry under and in front of the papacy, with the endowment, the going astray 2c., comes from Mammon, that we want to have good days, and help ourselves; the same refuses that one does not trust God, but despises God's commandment, which says: "I am your God. But if we are not helped quickly tomorrow, or in this hour, and just in the way we want, we run to another God.

Do you see now the sum of the first commandment, what it wants? namely, if you are well, do not despise me, but fear me, says God; and if you are unwell, do not despair, but believe in me and trust me; if you are unwell, think also of me. We should all confess and say: O LORD, I am not worthy to sit here in peace with my wife and child and mine, and to have this piece of bread; and realize that it comes from GOD. Therefore, because it is from God, we should serve Him and give thanks for it, also, as the text reads, "love Him with all our heart," fear and trust, and thus believe in the cross and be patient, and wait for God's mercy and gracious help; for He wants to help us. So, if there is pestilence, even though it is evil, but because He has sent it to us, God will also come and will help His Word's followers. Therefore, no one should run elsewhere in any matter.

Let this commandment be written on the fingers and kept before the eyes in all works, so that when things go well, I may not become proud, nor again fall down and perish in adversity; for these are hindrances that turn us away from God. We are to remember this and bring it to life; and because the flesh, the world and the devil vex and afflict us with it, and are so strong, and draw us away from God, therefore it must always be acted upon, and keep us to the Word, and not let us depart from God. 2)

104 Thus we have the interpretation of the first commandment, which Moses explains very well, so that it can be understood, and shows all the obstacles, idolatry and wicked cunning, which the devil sets against it, so that he leads us away from the right faith. On the other hand, you have heard how he sharpens and sharpens it with promises and urges, so that he scares those who do not want to think of him as God; and again, he promises mercy to those who trust in him, because he wants to help the faithful.

The first annoyance was the tiresome mammon or temporal good. Of it he has set these words: Beware, when thou comest into the good and full land, lest the abundance deceive thee, and thou set not thy defiance and pride upon temporal goods, lest they win thine heart, and then remember him that brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage, and gave thee this land, and helped thee to these goods; forgetting therefore him by whom thou art brought.

(106) Therefore mammon is the first and foremost idol that leads away from the first commandment. For the human heart is arrogant by nature [Jer. 17:9] when it knows that it is able to do something by which it is restrained.

2) Note of the first edition: During this time, Doctor Martin Luther did not preach in Wittenberg, because he was in Marburg in Hesse at the Colloquium with the Sacramentarians, came back from there around Simonis Judä [Oct. 28] and continued to read. - The Marburg discussion was on October 1-4, 1529. On October 12, Luther was in Jena from the return trip; on October 17, he already wrote a letter to Myconius from Wittenberg (Walch, old edition, vol. XXI, 1186.). Therefore, we have placed the resumption of the sermons in the middle of October in the first note to this writing.

Good makes courage, and this courage makes an idol. Therefore, if you gain goods, do not set your heart on them. "If riches come to you, do not set your heart on them" [Ps. 62:11]. But do to him thus: Do not let wealth give you courage, otherwise God will not be feared, and man will become secure and bold. Therefore he speaks here: Remember him who brought you out of misery, that good deceive you not, as if it were of your own; but remember always, as if you were still in misery. Never forget the misery and distress from which you have been delivered. So keep your heart as if you did not yet have it, and as if you were still in poverty.

(107) So now we are also led out of many ropes of conscience and great misery and the tyranny of the papacy; it has been our hell and dungeon. Now we are free, no law drives us anymore, neither to celebrate nor to fast. We should be careful that we do not take courage from this freedom, that we pride ourselves as if we were no longer allowed to believe in God; rather, we should think back all the more often and be grateful to Him that He has delivered us from this prison. That is why we must always preach against the pope; for we should always remember the misery and house of service in which we have been so miserably afflicted and martyred, and not forget the benefits of God; otherwise we will become ungrateful, hard and stubborn, so that we will pay no attention to promises or predictions.

V. 15. For the LORD your God is a zealous God.

(108) Behold, how Moses drives the words of the first commandment, and how he so earnestly exhorts, keeping them always before our eyes and ears; for he is always anxious and fearful lest they become secure and too proud, and forget God in happiness. Just as we must take care that we do not rise up to freedom and forget that which led us out of the ropes and misery, but should remember: He who redeemed us from prison can also throw us back into it, and, what is more, destroy us from the earth as if we were dust. Therefore he holds God up to us as a zealot and as a consuming fire who knows how to take revenge.

[Is. 1, 19. 20.]. Therefore we should fear him and rather believe than feel.

V. 16. 17. You shall not tempt God your Lord, as you tempted Him in Massa.

Trust in God, he says, as the first commandment requires, that one believe in God and trust in Him, and not in the goods; do not make an idol of yourself, that you would pride yourself with what you have in the 1) box or in your hands. So also tell him: If it would go bad for you, as if war, theurung 2c. existed, and you lacked crops of the earth, hold fast, and do not tempt God. For, as has often been said, this is our way, so we are of a mind that we despair in adversity; and pride ourselves when things go well for us. In abundance, man's heart cannot restrain itself nor refrain from pride; our courage grows. And again, when it is in distress, that we are in trouble, it soon wants to despair and despair, and sets and paints for God a goal, a way and a measure, how he should help it, and does not want to expect a time, a person or an hour that pleases him, nor does it want to completely put it at home. This is what God means to try.

(110) Thus the heart of man is a slippery thing: when it is well, it falls into presumption; and again, when it is ill, into despair. Therefore it must be so mixed, and God must throw in one care after another into the goods, and fold them into us, and dampen the courage with a fear, that we may abide in the first commandment. When things are going well, or in prosperity, he is after us with worry, so that you must always think, "Now you are well, but God can turn it around. So, too, in adversity we must temper it with comfort, so that we cling to God's promise and do not tempt God, who wants to be our God. Thus a man remains on the right road, so that he does not despair in adversity, but always stands still and praises God, whether he is well or ill, whether we win or lose.

111 But Mammon is such a great and mighty god in the world that if he were to

1) Original: den.

When he is present, he makes the people proud; when he is not present, he makes the people despondent. That is why Moses fights so fiercely against him. Now this is the interpretation of the first commandment, therefore to love God in that, and not to have other gods. That is, fear God in abundance; if you are well, do not be proud; if you are unwell, trust in Him in adversity. Do not run to another place, and do not seek other gods, but believe that he can help you out of trouble, and punish you in riches, so that the heart may keep the middle road inside, and stand the same. This is what the first commandment demands.

V. 20. If your son will ask you today or tomorrow, saying, "What are these testimonies, commandments and statutes?

This is a prosopopeia. 1) He commands the parents to be God-fearing, to learn to fear God, and to serve Him in happy times, and to believe in unhappy times, and to keep a pure faith; and this not only for themselves, but also for their children. The parents shall be the schoolmasters of the children, and the children shall also teach it to others; they shall tell the descendants, so that it always remains in fresh memory how God led them out of Egypt. They are to be vain schoolmasters; this is what God wants, for He says that they are to say to their children [v. 21], "We were servants in Egypt. "2c. Hereby he gives them the command that they teach the children God's forbearance, and to be afraid of the forbearance; when it is well with them, that they despise not God, and in time of temptation learn to trust in God, and take hold of his promise, and not despair. For He tempts them and will not forsake them. That is right the ten commandments preached. Moses is a true master and interpreter of the Ten Commandments.

V.25. And it shall be our righteousness in the sight of the Lord, if we keep and do all these commandments, as he hath commanded us.

Behold, how highly he exalts and praises the first commandment, for he says, "Whoever keeps this will be counted righteous before God. He writes righteousness to the fulfillment of this commandment. We teach that no man on earth is justified by works, as the whole world is accustomed to preach against the teaching of the gospel; therefore, only faith in the word and promise of God is necessary [Rom. 3, 24-28. Gal. 2, 16]. Therefore, in the Catechismo, we have stated that the service of God should be in the fear and love of God. Every commandment is set forth in fear and love, that we should fear and love God. This is the first commandment, from which all the other commandments flow. For the works of the other table, that we commit no adultery, kill no one, steal no one, do not make us righteous, nor can they be done by us without faith; for where the first commandment is not, there are none of the other commandments, and what is done by men appears only before the world.

(114) But the first one (for it goes through all the commandments), which teaches how to become righteous, godly and holy. How then? Well, if you keep the first commandment by faith and hearty trust in Christ. Therefore, this commandment alone requires faith. This faith justifies you, as it is written about Abraham in Genesis 15:6. So the first commandment requires the main thing, faith; whoever keeps it is blessed. But no one keeps it, unless it be given him by the Holy Spirit to belong to the gospel. Therefore no one is saved, but Christ must be here beforehand, that one believes in him; by faith one is justified [Rom. 10:4]. Therefore Moses says, "He who is righteous has it because he keeps it and does it. But he that trusteth in God with his heart, and believeth when it is evil, and feareth God with his heart when it is well, keepeth it.

(115) He who fears and trusts in God will not strike anyone dead, will not wrong anyone, but commands God to do what is unjust to him, and suffers it patiently for God's sake, and returns vengeance to God, and he will do well. Thus the fifth commandment is kept, for it flows from the first; for a believer does not avenge himself because he relies on God and trusts Him to do right. Thus the first commandment is the marrow and core of all other commandments. Therefore he says: He who fears the Lord and serves him,

1) prosopopeia (personal poetry) is here that what God teaches is put into the mouths of the persons.

He will do good, he will keep and do these commandments. "Keeping" goes to the first commandment, that one trust God and fear Him. This keeping is also followed by "doing," that is, the other commandments will follow; that is, he who fears God does good; thus, he who trusts God has patience, he will help him.

Therefore he is righteous if he keeps and does these things, that is, believes and proves faith by works [Gal. 5:6, Jac. 2:14, 17, 22, 24]. Moses only shows how to live and keep the commandments; but it takes another man for us to keep them, and to trust in adversity. For a man, as a man, must despair in adversity, and rise up in happiness. So then I say that Moses teaches us what to do and what to keep, but only the gospel teaches where to get and how to take it, namely, that we should believe in Christ; then God will give us grace to be able to restrain our courage when we are well, and to believe in God in the cross and in temptation.

The seventh chapter.

V. 1-4. When the LORD thy God shall bring thee into the land whither thou goest to possess it, and shalt cut off many nations from before thee, the Hittites, the Girgothites, the Amorites, the Canaanites, the Perizzites, the Hivites, and the Jebusites, seven nations greater and stronger than thou; and when the LORD thy God giveth them before thee to smite them, 1) then thou shalt banish them, that thou make no league with them, nor show them favor. And you shall not make friends with them; your daughters you shall not give to their sons, and their daughters you shall not take from your sons. For they will make your sons disgust me by serving other gods, and the wrath of the LORD will be kindled against you and will soon destroy you.

(1) Now another trouble comes on, and drives Moses again, that they are afraid of the evil, and calls such trouble a woman and a wicked company; which brings many into great misery and distress; for as the companions are, so must he howl with them. If this is so in outward, civil things, much more will it happen when one joins those who transgress the first commandment of God and rage against it, and seek other gods and make friends. For if they join them, they also turn away from God. Therefore, over mammon is the worldly favor; it is also a great wall-breaker and devil, when you go to court the rich and wise; everyone wants to get high.

(2) Wherefore Moses doth strongly charge his people to beware of them that have strange gods, and to have no fellowship, favor, or friendship with them, neither to take their daughters, nor to give their sons in marriage unto them. Cause, for it is dangerous thing for the world's favor; much therefore dare wife, child, body, life, and soul. Because it is such a wicked thing, he sets before them this other evil, and exhorts them to beware of it.

003 How think ye that it was done? The Israelites saw many pious and wise men among the heathen, and many young and beautiful virgins and women, all of whom should be killed and destroyed; and they thought in mercy, Well, we will not harm them, but join ourselves to them; and they married them, saying, Therefore God will not be displeased, neither will he punish us so severely, nor destroy and cut us off from the earth. This is how it happened: they brought the idol into the house, and so the idolatry remained, as can be seen in the book of Joshua and the Judges.

(4) We should also take this upon ourselves, for it is dangerous even in our time. For Behold, how many there are who deny the gospel for the sake of princes and ungodly bishops and tyrants, only that they may retain grace and favor with men. And now they take many wives, not for the sake of a godly life, but only for the sake of wealth, power and friendship; and no one asks whether the woman or the man is a Christian, if they only have a lot of money. Some people have to abandon God's word for the sake of a rich wife. So the whole world has this idol.

5 After that, it is even worse and more dangerous that one joins the sects and cults, which are very humble and patch in with the people. That is, to hold fellowship with the Cananites, that is, with those who falsify the word of God and let it go. It is a dangerous and annoying thing, and a real idolatry in the world, to seek friendship, worldly favor, wealth, power and wisdom; for one is deceived by deviating from God's word. Thus many fall from the word in our time, for the sake of temporal honor and favor, as the Jews of old clung to the great princes and kings among the Gentiles.

(6) So they also still cling and hang on to the great 1) Hanses, and so they go. Therefore Moses speaks here: Do not look at any splendor or humility, power, honor, wealth, favor, wisdom or friendship, but look at me alone. I will give you all these things and help you more than all the kings, mighty men and wise men on earth. But again, if thou forsake me, and turn to them, and hold with them, and pretend, I will also cause thee more calamities and plagues than they. If there is trouble, remember my word; for my word is more than all this, the wealth, favor and power of the world.

(7) So he wanted to keep his heart pure in the word of God and faith. Flesh and blood cannot do this, but the Holy Spirit must give the courage for one to become so bold that he trusts God more and keeps his word more than he does on his own.

Good or riches, wisdom, kings, and the spirits of the rotten with their false teachings. Otherwise, reason closes its eyes and leaves God's word, goes away, and soon becomes idolatrous. But a God-fearing man, whose heart is strengthened by the Holy Spirit, holds the Word more dear than all these treasures. What good is it if you have all the treasures on earth, and if all the princes and the whole world are your friends, and God is against you and your enemy [Matth. 16, 26]? And again, what can you lack if you have God with you [Rom. 8, 31. 38.]? If you trust in God's word, He can punish you so that no one can redeem you.

(8) These are the two vexations which Moses relates in the interpretation of the first commandment; namely, that first of all mammon offends us; then there is either too much or too little, and that in abundance we forget God, or in want we tempt God. Secondly, evil company, violence, and the favor of the world, and also the spirits of the wicked, which we should avoid and flee, for they lead us away from the first commandment and God's word.

This is the story of Martin Luther from the pulpit, concerning his journey to Marburg and the conversation he had there with the Sacramentarians.

(9) Perhaps you would like to know what we did at Marburg; so that you will not be left in doubt, and so that you can shut the mouths of the blasphemers, I will tell you the same thing recently.

(10) We have suffered no danger on the way, and God has heard your prayer, for which you should thank Him; for we have fared better than we had hoped. Thus our adversaries have been very kind and humble to us, more than we thought. For I myself thought that we would find all hard stones there; but God gave them grace to humble themselves, and if God wills, their hopeful writing against us will now come to an end.

11. de peccato originis we disagree 2c. Otherwise they have conceded and entered a piece six or seven willingly- as, of of infant baptism, of justification, of the use and custom of the Lord's Supper, and agree with us in these matters of God's word, and have willingly renounced their former doctrine; and admit that one receives faith and consolation in the sacrament. But that there is truly and bodily Christ's body and blood, they cannot yet believe. And they have said so much that if it had been with them, they would have given in, and their speeches have been thus: If one had the beer back in the cask, one would not have tapped it. But because they had a measured order from their own, they could not go back.

(12) But they desired brotherhood of us, which we refused them for this time, and could not grant. For if we accepted them as brothers and sisters, we would have to agree to their teaching. However, they did not like this rejection and pretended to show love towards them until God would bring them back, because we should also love our enemies [Matth. 5, 44]. Now, whoever wants to interpret it in an evil way, let him do so; whoever is also able to do more, let him do so. They persist in their opinion that God wants to enlighten them, even though they have mended and adorned themselves, and they have not denied that the true body and blood of Christ is not there, which is as if they were with us.

1.). They confess that those who go to the Lord's Supper truly partake of the body and blood of Christ, but spiritually, that they have Christ in their hearts. They do not want to partake of the body; we have put this on their conscience. For we have God's word and the text for us, which they do not have. Therefore, the matter stands in a good hope. I do not say that there is a brotherly unity, but a kind, friendly unity, that they may kindly seek from us what they lack, and we may serve them again. Wherefore ye shall diligently ask, it shall also become brotherly.

End of the Narration or Report from the Colloquio at Marburg.

14. in the interpretation of the first commandment Moses tells the first trouble, when,- the

Mammon, as the same is a very great hindrance that one does not respect, understand, learn, do or keep the first commandment. For by mammon the world falls away, and also rises again. When mammon is present, it is secure and proud; when it is not present, it despairs and tempts God.

The other trouble is evil company, friendship and violence on earth. These are also an idol, for one defies and trusts in them more than in God, since we should trust God with all things. That is why Moses declared the first commandment, that we should watch and trust in God more than in mammon, violence, all goods and friendship on earth. For goods cannot help in the last moments. When pestilence reigns and death creeps up, a little pestilence can take away all our good company; what we have relied on is in vain. Why then does the heart turn to money and goods, or defy men? For this reason Moses decreed that they should not make friends with the idolatrous nations that were around them, nor should they make alliances with them. And now he sets up the cause:

V. 4 For they will make your sons disgust me by serving other gods. The wrath of the LORD will be angry with you and will soon destroy you.

(16) He is always with the words of the first commandment, and includes them, which are, "I am a fervent God, visiting the sin of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation. This is how he says here: "No mammon, friend, violence helps against God's wrath; when it festers, he pulls it up out of the earth root and stem. So he always repeats the words of the first commandment, always weaves them in, and keeps them by the hand.

V. 5 But so shall you do to the heathen: Their altars you shall break, 2c. their pillars you shall break, their groves you shall cut down, and their idols you shall burn with fire.

017 They shall not make friends with these heathen; and this is the cause: for they shall surely make you idolaters;

As was done. Because they did not keep the commandment and did not follow Mosiah, they thought, "These are good, pious, fine people, and they are also wise; how can we alone be wise? Therefore they have freed their daughters, and have also accepted their gods and served them. This society with the pagans has also brought about a change in religion among them, against which the prophets have cried out and preached so much, and have had great work with it.

(18) Therefore he commanded that it should be rooted up, broken, and washed away, as it is written, that nothing should remain to give them occasion and cause to fall into idolatry; so the idolatry should be destroyed. For as long as idolatry remains, there will always be trouble and a beautiful image before the eyes, for there is no trouble more dangerous or harmful than superstition or false worship. No good or treasure on earth glitters so beautifully as false worship; it is the highest adornment. Money and beautiful young people do not glitter and shine as much as false worship.

(19) And where one does not diligently keep the word of God and the first commandment, no one can help himself. You have often heard the reason. For every man is so minded that he would rather keep the doctrines and laws of men, however hard and great they are, than the commandment of God. How much fasting and torment have we suffered under the papacy? so much money has been given to foundations, monasteries, altars, masses, vigils. This has not been a sore arrival or a burden for us. For it was not called idolatry, but it had a name and appearance that it was a service of God. Nothing is more difficult for reason than to trust in God; and again, nothing is easier than to choose superstition and superstition.

(20) Secondly, that each one by nature prefers to trust and build on what he himself does, rather than on our works; we are inclined to build on these; so we have said, Thus we have lived, doing this and that, which God sees 2c. If we hang these two things on it, as, first, that it has a holy form and beautiful color, or glistens beautifully; after that, that man is inclined for himself that

If he likes to do something he relies on, we will soon fall and fall into idolatry.

Therefore it is very difficult that we do not get angry with God's word and stay with it or do not fall away from it [Matth. 11, 6. Luc. 2, 34]. For this is the highest heresy in the world. And now, what other appearance and reason do our enthusiasts, the papists, Anabaptists and iconoclasts have for their doctrine than works and false confidence? For works or piety and false confidence are always mixed in, so that they think that holiness and the Christian faith are in iconoclasm; or, if otherwise this or that work is done; confidence in our work always creeps in with it.

No one understands this affliction; so deeply is it ingrained in us, and so it clings to us, unless death or the road comes. Because man lives and is healthy, he does not understand it, it does not enter his mind; only in the hour of death, when misery and distress come to his heart and make him despair, it teaches him to say: Oh, Lord God, help me! and to keep the first commandment. Therefore God is the God of those who are in the greatest distress and misery; otherwise they do not call upon Him, because they are in distress or in death [Ps. 32:7]. Like the thief on the cross, who said to the other thief, "We have well deserved our punishments," (Luc. 23:41) and was to blame for the torment in which we were caught, and fell into the first commandment, clinging to it, trusting in it, since he had nothing in himself of good works; he had only sin. Therefore he relies on nothing but God's mercy, and says [v. 42.], "Remember me, O Lord, when thou comest into thy kingdom." For this one has said, "You shall not have other gods. I am the LORD thy GOOD"; let me be thy GOOD. Therefore, whoever is not in need or danger cannot learn to trust in God.

23Therefore those pagans were fine, excellent people, and much more pious than we under the papacy; although we also erected many altars there, founded many churches and worship services at great expense, and ordered the worship of the people.

also had many ceremonies, and also poltergeists, and asked them, and did what they wanted. The old fathers were much holier, because they sacrificed their children, as sons and daughters, like other cattle, and burned them on the altars as a delicious, fine sacrifice; therefore, they were much finer people than under the papacy.

(24) Why were they not godly, because they did it in the name of God alone, who created heaven and earth? And it should have been a service to God, that they should do it in honor of God, and God should reward them, because they wanted to sacrifice the children to the true, living God. Why then does God reject them, saying that it is against the first commandment? Where the first commandment does not rule, there can be no worship, and there can be no trust in God; but there soon creeps up a false trust in the work that you yourself do; if the trust is there, then it is false. For so the Gentiles thought: If I sacrifice and burn my son, I will surely obtain favor with God and be saved. So such a heart and trust is attached to the work, when I sacrifice and slay my children to praise and honor God; that is, I rely on this work. Such a thing is contrary to the first commandment.

(25) Now it is my work that I do, and I also rely on it. For he who is so minded must not count himself worthy of our Lord God, but will work until he obtains grace by works. If one obtains it by works, he makes himself God, so that he has no need of God's grace, and our salvation then does not come by grace. But God's commandment says that God will not be merciful to you because you want to buy it from God; for he is not obligated to you, you will not bring him there. Also in these words you hear that he commands the Jews to remove such idols, and it is threatened that they will be destroyed. For this reason the Gentiles are condemned and utterly destroyed.

26 So, under the papacy, if before his death, he has endowed a mass in his will, none has been a

He had no other opinion than that he wanted to become blessed and earn God's grace with this work; unless God had otherwise miraculously helped him out of idolatry. Now it is not as important as the previous pagans'. The same pagans dared something greater, bought it with a greater earnestness than with their own blood, yes, with their bodily children, than with their flesh and blood. Our forefathers wanted to buy it only with money, about three, four florins 2c.

(27) Both these things are contrary to the first commandment, when a man sets up a different kind of worship, and does good works, in which people trust; and such worship is not called, "I am the Lord thy God," but it is such worship that a man remembers his good work, and trusts in it. Such trust is poison and pestilence, even damnation itself; for the heart trusts not in God, but in this or that work.

028 Now therefore the sum of the first commandment is, Trust in me only, and fear me: whatsoever is contrary thereto, let it be condemned. Therefore, he who slaughters or burns his child, son or daughter, trusts not before God, because he has sacrificed the child; he trusts the work more than God. Truly, such work has seemingly failed before reason, and had a glorious appearance of great holiness and worship. The works have been too high, and a great splendor has been made; reason has not been able to resist them; no one has been able to jump over them; as the Jews have also been very angry about it. Dear, what did we do, since in our time the works of the monks shone so beautifully in the papacy, and were considered so great, that we could not resist them? We were annoyed by them and could not jump over them.

For this reason Moses so diligently impressed upon them the first commandment, that they should trust in God's grace alone and not seek comfort elsewhere. The heart should rely solely on God's. The heart should stand and rely on God's grace and mercy alone, and not rely on any work. But if there is a service, work, law and merit elsewhere, do not trust in it. Therefore I say,

| that this challenge of the Jews has not been a small annoyance, because they have seen that the Gentiles have been doing such a powerful worship; as you see in the papacy with the monks and priests a glittering worship. (30) Because the trouble is so great, and the heathen, the Jews, and the Papists, and all the teachers of works of God, are rushing and shooting against the first commandment, 1) therefore Moses saith, Beware lest thou make friends with them, nor have fellowship with them, lest they deceive thee: but so shalt thou do with them, thou shalt destroy their altars. You shall have nothing to do with them, lest you be deceived by them; then you shall destroy it all, tear it up, that they may worship. The altars were as our churches and chapels are now. After that they had pillars on which they stood and erected images. Especially they were common in the woods, as in our time to the oak, and in other lonely places more, where Satan has had his fool's play. That's why there are also groves of small woods, like our Speckhölzlein, where funny meadows have been laid out; like, the Poltersberg is a real grove, where one comes there to the Kirchmeß, drinks and eats, and all Büberei drives. After that, everyone had a little chapel at home, his own place, where he wanted to worship God and wait for his own services. The Jews are to eradicate all of this, so that there is no opportunity or occasion left for idolatry; also, all places and cities of idolatry are to be avoided, and only the right God is to be served. V. 6 For you are a holy nation, which God has chosen from all nations. Here the iconoclasts have a text for themselves, and the question is: whether we should remove all images and push them out of the world, because Moses calls us a holy people. Item: whether this law of Moses compels us to do so? Listen, the first commandment teaches you that you must trust in no thing on earth but God alone; that is the point. Therefore, what images are erected or used for this purpose? | The first commandment throws them down first, as if one thinks that God helps for the sake of the image, as if to the oak. There was a small picture of Mary painted on a paper, on which the trust is directed, Mary helps in the picture, and have called in the picture Mariam, and not God. That is called an idolatrous image. The same image of Mary was also in Grimmenthal; item, at Regensburg. But the other images, in which alone one sees past history and things, as in a mirror, these are mirror images, which we do not reject, for they are not images of superstition; otherwise we would not be allowed to have an image on the coin, and a virgin would not be allowed to have a mirror in which one sees the form and face of the one who looks into it. The images of coins are not worshipped, no trust is placed in them, but they are images of memory. 33 Therefore see it diligently, and discern it. To overthrow images is not to throw away all kinds of images, but these, as the text implies, which are worshipped as idols. They are called idols, since the heart is attached to them as the pear is attached to the tree, which were many among the pagans and are still in the papacy today, which are not only looked at, but are looked at with trust, since such an image is taken for a god, and heretics have worshipped such images, since the trust is attached, as those to the oak and pear tree, St. Mary's; item, St. Nicolas', St. Wolfgang's in Bavaria, St. Leonard's; item, the image of the holy cross. These may be torn down, but by proper authorities; for such images are not only looked upon, but a devotion, trust and worship is made of them. 34 But that I have a painted picture on the wall, which I look at badly without superstition, is not forbidden to me, nor shall it be taken away. For why would I not look at a painted cloth, I look at a sow, cow or dog? The little children must have wooden horses, dogs, docks and the like; and I must also have a picture, otherwise I would not have to have a mirror. Whoever does not want to have them |

1) Erlanger: close.

I can't do without it, because nothing is said about it in Scripture.

35 But when an image is set up or presented, and confidence is placed in it, tear it in two. Let the first commandment be a gloss, and give right understanding to images. If an image is set up for fear, and faith is put in it, tear it down; but if it is not an idol or altar, so that one bows the knee to it, nor makes a worship of it, it is not an idol, but an image that you keep, and is right and good. This is the difference between images and idols.

V. 6-8. For you are a holy people to God your Lord. God your Lord has chosen you as a people of possession from among all the nations that are on the earth. The Lord did not accept you and choose you to be more than all the nations, for you are the least of all the nations, but because he loved you.

This is another idolatry. As if Moses should say: Because you are such a holy, high and strong people, you should make an idolatry out of it, as if God should look at you for your power and strength and choose you as his people. But God alone wants to be respected, and does not want you to look to mammon, friendship, power, company, nor to quantity and strength, nor to trust in them; for trust strikes God to the ground here, and pulls down the idol.

I wanted this text to be remembered, especially by us Germans, who also insist and defy our power and authority when we are to go against the Turk. That is why he tears away the idol here. For this happens by nature, that when someone is powerful, he is a throbber, a poker and a snorer; there is no humility, no trust in God and his mercy, but only on his power and might he insists and defies, as if there were not also many people and many fists on the other side of the water and on the other side of the mountain. When such people do something, they do it not by trusting in God, but for the sake of their strength and quantity, as if there were not many people and many fists on the other side of the water and on the other side of the mountain.

would be no GOt. They do not ask anything about God, but only about their power. So powerful I am, so much people I have.

038 But if thou lookest not upon thy multitude and thy strength, base not thyself thereon [1 Sam. 17:47]. Not that it is evil to have many people, to have a mighty principality, to have armor, sword, guns, money and goods. It is all good to have friendship, power and helpers, for these are God's creatures; but that you make an idol for yourself out of them, and put your trust in them, and trust God no more than mammon, your wealth, the multitude and great power, that shall not be. All this is good, but beware that you do not trust in it. These things shall not be the ground of our confidence, because I put my trust in them. So he overthrows everything in which a man and his heart trust, and which is contrary to the first commandment.

I am not so old, but I have seen many of them who relied on their power and were proud of it, who are now lying in the mud. The reason is that they wanted to overthrow the first commandment and thought: We have so many cities, castles, so many thousand villages, 2c., boasted of their warriors, guns, alliance and company higher than God's; therefore we cannot lack, we will have happiness and victory. Yes, indeed! For what does God sit in heaven? They have gone over it to failure, or have come home, have brought the horror in the neck with them, and have lain down, yet have not become wise.

40 Now, because one wars with the Turk, he also hunts us down in the first commandment; still some will say, We have done it, and ascribe to their strength and power what God alone has accomplished by such means. Therefore, when these things are present, flesh and blood is proud of them. On the other hand, I have seen some who were so bold and proud, when the crowd was attached to them, that they had strength, chance and support, and obtained a little fortune and victory; but when they fell away from them again, they became such treacherous, shameful and pusillanimous, stupid evil-doers, that it is a shame that they even had wood hewn in two and split. So you can see who their god was is, namely, their authority, attachment, principality, guns and swords, and not God, in whom they should have hoped. Then one must sing them the little song that is appropriate for such rascals [Pf. 60, 13]: Vana salus hominis, "Menschen Hülfe ist kein nütze"; item: Superbia praecedit casum, et exaltatio ruinam, "wer soll zu Grunde gehen, der wird zuvor stolz"; ante ruinam exaltatur cor, hoffährtiger und stolzer Muth kommt vor dem Fall, Sprüchw. 16, 18. Item [Ps. 116, 11]: Omnis homo mendax, es ist eitel void Ding um menschliche Hülfe.

41 Thus Scripture takes it from the first commandment; for the summa of that commandment is to trust in God alone, and to give leave to all other creatures. For whoever relies on anything other than God's mercy cannot stand, he must fall, God grant that he has for help and friends the Turkish emperor, or the whole world with all its might and power, yet he cannot carry it out, he will be lacking; he will be proud before the victory, but it will not last. With this Moses wants to keep the hearts pure in the united trust in God, that no one knows or knows anything but God, and sticks to Him alone. He who looks at something else does not lead it out.

(42) But this does not stir our hearts until the greatest need and temptation comes. If one does not then hold up the first commandment to him and consider it, then flesh and blood despairs, where God does not help. But it does not help the world, it does not go to their hearts until they are brought down; so they must confess that it is so, when they are forsaken by all strength and all good friends, and have no one to help them. Again, he who remembers the word, "I am the Lord," may stand, he may rise again.

43 Therefore Moses says: God loves you, not because yours is much. Yea, beware, he hath not regarded your multitude, because yours is so few. How do you like that? Therefore do not build on it. So when you fight against the Turk, say: I do not build on cannons, and that I have a great army, or many baptized men and people of war; for you, dear God, have soon beaten them. I have indeed the armor of war with one another, but I do not rely on it, but in your name and trust I will fight, for you are our God; and you say that you alone are to be trusted, and therefore I will use guns, armor and other things only in your name 2c. [Ps. 20, 6. Ps. 10, 14.] So one should go up.

044 What then is the cause that he loveth you? Therefore it is not because of your power, but because he is so gracious, and has thus offered himself against you, and because he keeps the covenant which he spake unto your fathers, to inherit you out of pure mercy and grace, saying:

V. 9. Know then that the LORD your God is a faithful God, who keeps the covenant and mercy to those who love him and keep his commandments.

45 Therefore, whatever happens to you is done out of love and favor; that is, look behind you, remember my previous help, and therefore trust in me alone, 2c. because I have taken care of you. See nothing else, but that I love you out of pure goodness and mercy, and thank me for being so gracious, and offer myself against you, that I will be your God; for this I do out of pure grace and favor.

Thus God overthrows all idolatry and wipes it out of our hearts. And this is a fine commentary on the first commandment. First, he overthrows the false trust and confidence and superstition that is in our hearts and wants us to trust in him with all our hearts, for he says that he is our God. By this he wants to eradicate mammon, friendship, violence and crowd. For if you accept these three, you have a false and strange God, and you cannot stand, but you must perish. And he will tell more of them, which do the same hurt with the former; as there is our own righteousness, which also subtracts us from the first commandment.

So far Moses has dealt with the three enemies, that is, idols, who fight against the first commandment, as, mammon or riches; violence, their own power or multitude; 1)

1) In the original and in the Erlanger: "less power"; few - quantity.

Power and friendship of the heathen. These three things, or idols, cause a great number of the world to fall away from the first commandment, and people trust in them more than in God. Favor and love, riches, friendship, their own powers and authority are the idols of the world, as experience shows. Against this he said: "If you have a house, a farm, and other things, so that you have abundance, riches, and food, and have enough of everything, see to it that you do not go to God. Item: Do not make friends with the heathen, and do not worship their gods; beware of evil company, and remember that God did not accept you for your strength and multitude, 2c. but out of mild kindness and mercy.

(48) By all of which Moses would keep the people in the word of God and in the first commandment, so that they would cling to God in all things and not trust in any other creature, but, according to the first commandment, put their heartfelt trust in God alone, in His word and promise, and let all other creatures go. But he that trusteth and buildeth upon mammon shall fall with him: he also that trusteth in friendship, or in power, or in multitude, or in his own strength and might, shall fall with them, and his neck, or rather his soul, shall fall: for there is none of these idols that 1) can help man out of trouble.

(49) I said that Moses had many words to say, and he wanted to persuade the people to trust in God's words, and to put their hope and confidence in God's promise, and he practiced the first commandment very diligently. For we see and experience for ourselves how things are in the world, how strange faith is; it may be preached, but it produces little fruit or benefit. He who has money and goods is brave; he who has great friends is defiant; he who has power and strength is bold. And again, he who has not, but is weak, poor, and miserable, is stupid and despondent, fainthearted and sorrowful. One lets preach, sing and say what one wants, and so remains as it is; but one must say it for the sake of the small group. The others believe but they want to experience it and will also experience it with their great damage; as, at the time of the misfortune and repugnance, also if distance leg comes behind them. There these three will not help, they must nevertheless leave behind them mammon, money, property, friendship, power and violence. But you who love the word, learn it in the fear of God, and let it be said to you [v. 7]: "The Lord has not accepted you and chosen you to be more than all the nations, for you are the least of all the nations."

50 As if to say, If he had considered this, he would have chosen a greater nation, but you were the least of all the nations; [v. 8] "but that he loved you, and that he kept his oath which he swore to your fathers" 2c. Such a God you have, who does not ask how strong, how great, how rich, how mighty anyone is, but that His word and grace be regarded, and nothing else. He does not want to celebrate, but to be celebrated. He does not ask for things. Nothing counts with him but his grace and mercy, which he promises you [Ps. 130:7]. He respects not thy money or friendship: he will not look upon it. No good, strength, power or fortune shall count with you, but over all and only his grace, as he finely emphasizes here with a glorious text that reads thus:

V. 9. 10. Know that the LORD your God is a God, a faithful God, who keeps covenant and mercy for those who love him and keep his commandments to a thousand members, and repays those who hate him before his face to destroy them, and does not delay to repay those before his face who hate him.

51 These are the words that are written in the first commandment. Grace and mercy he keeps, he does not deny. Truly you have a God who will repay. He repeats this promise again, so that he may put it into his heart: "There is a faithful God. And it is extremely necessary that he puts this word, faithful, with it. As if to say, "Believe that he promises grace and mercy, help and comfort, for it is faithfully spoken,

1) Original: the.

And shall also be faithfully kept. Therefore remember and keep his word, hold fast to it, and his grace and mercy will come faithfully [Ps. 111:8].

52 And again, he will not lack the unbelievers and the disobedient, but will punish them severely, as he reproaches them with his zeal and anger. In sum, he wanted to impress the first commandment deeply on his Jews, and on all other people; that is why he so often repeats the words of the same commandment. As if he should say: Only turn to him, then you have a faithful God; as the 86th Psalm, v. 15, also depicts him: Tu, Domino Deus, miserator et misericors, patiens, et multae misericordiae, et verax. He has promised mercy, help, good deeds and consolation everywhere, and just in the Psalm; he also faithfully keeps this promise. Again, he will not fail to punish the wicked who do not believe him but hate him and transgress his commandments. Let no one doubt that both will come to pass unfaithfully, as he has said: Good to the faithful, severe punishment to the disobedient.

Moses is very serious about this, and all the prophets have taken much warning from this text, that in the first commandment God promises, promises, and faithfully keeps grace, mercy, counsel, comfort, and all good things to the faithful, and that He intends to punish and punish the wicked without delay. But the world does not believe it; if it sits in abundance, in goods, and has its mammon, its friendship and power, then it is a mockery to it, then it does not respect it, but says: Let Moses preach as long as he wants. But hear thou, verily, the time will come when it will not be thought of.

As long as there is mammon, friendship, happiness, 2c. among others, one goes there, and Moses cries himself to death over these words: "I am a zealous God", "a consuming fire"; item, I am not joking. But it is all a vain and dead letter to the unbelievers; one does not feel it, so one does not believe it. The words are colder than ice to us, do not ring in our ears until experience and adversity come to hand, and misfortune strikes; then one will be the first to know.

quite aware. As now with the Turk, who a few days ago 1) besieged Vienna 2c. However, even though God cries out: "I am a zealous God", I want it, and I can't stand it, it doesn't help. Oh, no preaching is valid with the rabble. But fools must be listened to with pistons. He who will not listen to words must be advised by spears and rifles.

(55) Thus Moses warned his own and us, saying, Remember that ye keep the commandments, the statutes, and the judgments of our Lord God; but if ye despise them, and make a jest of them, he will make a mockery of you again, as he did of them. Although they hoped and thought that the trouble and danger would be over a thousand years away, it was there in an hour. The same happened to the rebellious peasants; they were not afraid of any misfortune, but in one hour they were all slain. The Austrians also did not take care of the Turk, but thought he was a thousand miles away from them; but in two days they had him over their necks, and misfortune fell upon them, that many of them were slain and carried away captive; the punishment came to them even in time. Moses therefore diligently exhorts us not to trust in these three things, but to be most careful and cautious against them; for calamity cometh unawares.

I could tell you many examples, but I have seen two recently: how the peasants were beaten and destroyed in the uprising and how the Turks have now tyrannized cruelly. There were other examples before: Saul, Sodoma and Gomorrah, the flood of the whole world; for before they looked back, the punishment came. The world does not want to believe this, but thinks that God is not in such a hurry with the punishment, until it experiences it and lies there in the ashes, or is drowned and stabbed to death. Therefore, he who cannot be advised cannot be helped. The world wants to be run with pistons.

(57) And here you see how Moses so faithfully and earnestly warns that one should fear God, for he adds these words: He will repay without delay. As if

1) The Turks besieged Vienna on September 13, 1529; this is preached towards the end of October.

He will say: His wrath will come suddenly [Ps. 2, 12], and punish the unbelievers, who now confidently scrape and throb, that should they become senseless, the wrath of God will soon strike behind them. What they will then gain from it, they may grease their shoes with. This text belongs to the wicked and is their lesson; but they do not turn to it, they are hardened and blinded, so that they do not perceive the first part that is said to them, the wicked.

58. the other piece: "He is a faithful God, who keeps the covenant and mercy." This write both diligently, says Moses, namely, that God is angry and cruel toward those who do not believe in Him, to whom belongs wrath and plague. Again, he also shows mercy and grace to the believer. This should be serious and true on both sides, and it applies to us who have to endure a storm with the world, or pour out the bath with it. In such dangerous and anxious times, let this be our comfort, that God is a faithful and true God in adversity, who has promised grace and mercy, help and counsel to all believers, and will certainly keep this promise.

59 This is so necessary to be eliminated when war, flood, pestilence and other accidents come, as the previous one. The previous one, how God will surely punish the wicked. For when hardship and affliction come, we see our weakness, and there is great trembling and fear; then we realize how poor and meager we are. Soon we run to and fro, and would like help; we want to donate this and that; we hope for mammon; we call on all our good friends and acquaintances. But with this there is no continuance anywhere, here all idolatry perishes. We become so soft, stupid and despondent that no one can raise us up or comfort us; just as the wicked, on the other hand, are so stubborn, stubborn, immovable and hard that no one can soften them up, nor bring them to terror and fear, until they lie on the ground; just as again no one can make the soft, weak and frightened hard and strong enough.

60 Therefore, it must be done: that which

Stubborn, lumps, stones, sticks, and troughs, who fear neither God nor the devil, are to be frightened with serious dread. Again, stupid, frightened and despondent people are to be raised up and strengthened with these sweet words of comfort, saying to them: You have a faithful God, who has promised you grace and mercy, and swears to you that he will be your God. For thus he speaks in the prophet Ezekiel [Cap. 18, 23. 32. 33, 11.]: "As truly as I am God and live, I do not want the death of the sinner, but that he may repent and live."

61 Therefore he does not jest with this promise; such a promise is not a light and easy word to him, but a true earnestness, and it shall be kept to the faithful; he would set heaven and earth before it, yes, heaven and earth would rather perish than that his word should not be fulfilled [Luc. 21, 33]. Put your trust in this, then, and be sure that God is a faithful God, who does not lie, joke or scold, but keeps the covenant and has mercy. "He shows mercy (toward those who keep His commandments) to the thousandth degree." You will certainly experience this.

(62) And so we do: when we are in poverty, we look nowhere, but only where there is money, or not money. When there is shame and disgrace, our eyes are soon turned to where there is honor or none. In times of death, pestilence and war, we see where there is health and where there is peace or no peace. All our thoughts are directed to this. We cannot lift up our hearts to consider these words here. For this reason Moses says: "If you want to trust in God and not have foreign gods, but keep the first commandment, and you are in trouble, distress, or in danger of life and limb, then remember that you should not look where human help and advice, where money and goods, where friends or enemies, life or death remain, but look here at God's word, listen to what God has promised you. For even though there is hardship, death, war, sickness and trouble, you should not be deprived of these words that are spoken here: "I am the Lord, I will keep my covenant faithfully.

From this text many psalms are made, all of which refer to this saying of Moses, since David also boasts that God is faithful, just and a retributor [Ps. 31:24], item, a helper in trouble; as, in the 145th Psalm, v. 18: "The Lord is near to all those who call upon Him, who call upon Him in truth." Item [Ps. 34, 20.], "The righteous must suffer much, but the LORD helpeth him out of all." Item, the 44th Psalm says, v. 23: "We are esteemed as sheep for the slaughter"; as St. Paul also accuses the Romans [Cap. 8, 36], and then speaks [v. 37]: "But in all this we overcome far, for the sake of Him who loved us." The Psalms are always lamenting our distresses and miseries, but the promise is always included: God helps and saves, so that the Psalms are a correct interpretation of the first commandment. For the covenant is firm, that God is faithful [2 Tim. 2, 19], he will keep what he has promised. Again, the Psalms also tell how God will judge the unrighteous and put them to shame. As, in the 91st Psalm, v. 8, it is said: "You will see how it will be repaid to the wicked." God knows well this art, that what the wicked scrape together and gather, that another shall eat it up; yea, for body and goods, people and country shall they come, for they sin against the first commandment. Moses has faithfully warned us about this.

This is the main part of Christian doctrine, that we learn to trust in God, not to despise Him, and to pride ourselves when the three things are present, namely, good, friendship, and power, that we put our trust in creatures, being sure and bold of money and goods, as if we could not trust in our Lord God. Again, that one may not despair even if these three are not there.

65 Therefore, do not do as some of the villains among the burghers and peasants do. When they have money and goods, they are brave and proud, and become mammonists and idolaters, deny God, pride themselves against their God, and trample the first commandment underfoot; they say, "If I only had enough money, what would I complain about? God wants to get behind them before they know it, and oppress them, and God does not want to be there.

They shall lose body and goods, souls and everything. On the other hand, the pious who are afraid of God shall not despair in their affliction. For I and my kind do not have many good days, therefore it is said to us: Let there be no trouble, let God be faithful, and keep His mercy and covenant. As the promise says: "I will show mercy" 2c. If we could only believe the words and be sure that it is God's word, how would our heart and conscience become so proud of it; how would I be so courageous against all creatures; then I could say: Because I have a gracious God who promises me mercy, who is richer than I? For to whom He promises something, He may keep it.

If you believe that God is so favorable to you that he will not abandon you in poverty, disgrace and death, and that all creatures are favorable and favorable to you for his sake, I would like to see who would do me harm! For I could look upon mammon, all friendship, tyrants, the Turk, or the king of France, as a louse or a fly. No one is richer than he; no one is more pious, no one knows more than he; for all this is nothing compared to the grace and mercy I have in God. Egg the devil! who would be stronger than me? This strength of the grace and mercy of God should be raised so that even the devil and the Turk are not respected.

But one hears these words alone and considers them as if they had been spoken by some priest, chaplain or preacher; one does not believe it, one does not consider it to be the word of God Almighty. But he who believes it has it all [Marc. 9, 23], and has it in his fist. But it should also frighten us very much that God says next to it: "If you do not trust me, know that I am angry, and these words or these threats will drive you so that heaven and earth will become too narrow for you, and you will always have to think that the sky will fall, and the sea will drown you, and the earth will sink with you. But if one says this at the same time that God is angry, one asks nothing about it. If any prince was angry, or if it was said that the Turk was angry there would be great fear; but God does not count for anything in this kind, who says: He is angry with us 2c. So we see in experience and in this daily life how poor people we are, who do not fear the word of God, nor do we trust in it. Because we do not believe the word, we must learn by experience, as this time through the Turk, that he pours out his wrath on us, so that we may see how God is not joking.

(68) Moses wanted to bake, brew and cook the words so that they would come to us. For if we believed it, we would remember as often as we heard these words: O heaven is full of violins! These words would be our sweetest consolation, above all mammon and friendship and the violence of the world, for we would know that heaven and earth were ours. Again, if we did not trust in God, and then heard God say: I will repay and punish without delay, we would be terrified and say: O! if God is angry, He is more to be feared than a hundred Turks. 1) These words should be much more frightening to me than if a hundred Turks or emperors came. Is it not shameful and sinful that one should fear these three things, mammon, friendship and tyrants, more than God? and that one should rejoice more in the creature and a penny, and fear the Turk and evil time more than God? Shall a rustling leaf be stronger than God with all His threatenings; and a red fellow, a florin, delight thee more than all God's promises?

(69) Verily, we should curse ourselves, spit upon ourselves and condemn ourselves, that we should have such perverse hearts within us, which neither trust nor fear God. We should be sorry that we live, because we disobey our Lord God, and fear a rustling leaf more than Him, and love a red florin more. Such badness is in our hearts. This is what Moses wanted to impress upon the people (as I also wanted to do), and he says: God is truly lacking in grace and mercy.

He will have enough goods to give to those who fear him. On the other hand, he will not joke, and he will provide enough plagues and misfortunes to send to you if you disobey him and live according to your will.

V. 12. 13. And if ye hear these statutes, and keep them, and do them; then the LORD thy God will also keep the covenant and mercy which he sware unto thy fathers, and will love thee, and bless thee, and multiply thee, and bless the fruit of thy womb, and the fruit of thy land, and thy corn, and thy must, and thy oil, and the fruit of thy cows, and the fruit of thy sheep of the field 2c.

Now he will explain to himself what is "the grace and mercy of God"; item, what is "the wrath of God. For he said that God is a faithful God, who keeps grace and mercy, and does good to you. But what does God do when He shows mercy and grace? To this Moses answers: "He will love you, and bless you, and multiply you" 2c. This will be the blessing, the grace or mercy, that he will give you a wife and child; and all this he will also protect you from Satan, pestilence, weather, and from all misfortune and evil, so that your family will last to the thousandth generation. He will take all things into his keeping.

71] "He shall bless the fruit of thy womb," that is, thy children, that they may be healthy, and that thou mayest have good courage, fine children without infirmity. After that also the fruit of the land shall be blessed, as, thy corn, thy must, and thy oil 2c., and follows, "Blessed shalt thou be among all nations." There you see what is meant by grace and mercy, that he wants to say: If you trust in God, do not worry how you will be fed, how your house and farm, wife and child will be preserved, let me take care of that; only trust in me and leave the worry to me. As the 55th Psalm, v. 23, says: "Cast your concern upon the Lord, and he will do it well." Item, St. Peter in his epistle says [1 Petr. 5, 7.], "Cast all your care upon him, for he careth for you." David and St. Peter took these sayings from this text.

1) "Turks" here stands for the Turkish Empire or the Turkish Emperor.

(72) And God will say here through Moses: I have so many angels and so much power that I can bless you and protect you from the devil and from all misfortune, and also help you out of all tribulation and distress. But we would like to have such a God who would not let us suffer at all. Know, then, that it is no matter if the world hates and persecutes you; he wants to love you. If the world wants to make you less, he wants to make you more. He wants to be as strong (when he is not otherwise stronger) as your enemy may be, and wants to save you.

v. 14. You will be blessed above all nations.

73 Thou shalt be a blessed and prosperous people. For the other nations trust not in me: and because thou trustest in me, thou shalt have plenty, and there shall be no evil among thee, and thou shalt enjoy mine abundantly.

74. If this is so, how is it that God nevertheless often sends so many plagues and pestilences to His saints, and lets John the Baptist die the most shameful death [Matth. 14, 10.]? Item, to Job he sends much suffering [Job 1, 12. ff.]? To this I answer, All this does no harm; if he makes them suffer, they are not forsaken; he does not leave them in perdition; he puts them to death, and brings them to life again; he puts them to shame, and raises them up again to honor. On the other hand, if the wicked live here in honor, and then die, all their joy, honor and glory are gone [Job 21:17 ff], for they have nothing left but this life, and yet they should not use this life so much that they should be as joyful as a Christian is. The Christians' defiance and consolation is that they should be left alone in this life. Christians should live in want and need as well as the wicked in the greatest abundance, for they can use their poverty and little goods with a better conscience. Even if a Christian does not have as much as a rich man, there is nothing wrong with that, because we do not need abundance (Proverbs 15:16). But if you trust in God, you will have enough and will not die of hunger.

75 And let it be, that the wicked have more than thou; let it not be to him.

as well as to you. Therefore it is said, What thou hast need of, I will give thee all. But if you do not fear God, he will let you seek and gather money, houses, honor and goods, and let them become mighty; but in the end everything will go back to the way it came. Your children will die and be suddenly wiped out; someone else will consume your possessions, your house, your fields, your meadows and your wife, and you will be left with shame, damage and an evil conscience. Therefore it would be better for you to trust me; then you would be blessed in this world, and there in the other and eternal life.

V. 14-16: You will be blessed above all nations. There shall be none barren among thee, nor among thy cattle. The LORD will put away from thee all sickness, and will not put upon thee any evil plague of the Egyptians, which thou hast experienced, and will put it upon all thy haters. Thou shalt eat up all the nations which the LORD thy God shall give thee.

Moses wants everyone to learn to keep the first commandment of God, for there shall be no man who sets his heart, confidence or trust in anything but God and His word alone. And the little word "heart" is put here for this reason, so that one may fear God and be frightened or terrified by His word. The heart should cling to God with faith and fear alone; therefore he also promised to be your God, to show grace and mercy to all those who love him and keep his commandments. With this he wants to provoke and entice our hearts to believe in him.

He is not only merciful, but also zealous, and a consuming fire against the despisers of his divine commandments (Sir. 16, 12. 13.), so that pure fear may be in the heart and remain against God, and that we may be subject to him with all fear and trust, and prefer nothing else. Now Moses, as reported above [Cap. 6, § 48 ff.], also included these among the idols, namely Mammon, who also captivates the hearts of men so that they forsake the first commandment and ask nothing of it, that God says: "I will be your God".

and show you grace and mercy. After that he spoke of another idol [Cap. 7, § 36 ff.], which is called: relying on strength, power, might and dominion. The third idol [Cap. 7, § 15 ff.] he called: great friendship. These three idols are in the world, and men are more proud of them than that they should rely on God.

Now this is Mosi's gloss, which he makes about the first commandment, that the first commandment is transgressed, when man sets his heart on mammon, on power and violence, or on friendship, and does not cling to the promises of the divine word, that God wants to nourish, protect and preserve us. This sin now disregards the world, does not punish it, or cannot punish it. It judges only murder, adultery, fornication and theft, but the unholy superstition remains unpunished before the world. And because sin is not punished like others, it does not seem to be a great sin; it remains small in reputation and is disregarded, but the sins that are punished seriously and severely, these are also more respected and much more avoided.

79 But we hear the counterplay here, that it is a much worse sin to build and defy mammon than theft; it also tears deeper. Murder and theft do not eat and drink. The culprit, as the murderer and death-slayer, is punished alone, his friends and family go out free and unharmed; but for the sake of idolatry, God often wipes out a whole family, a city, country and people, a kingdom and empire. Therefore, a Christian considers these the highest sins, which are considered the least in the world. The world considers it honest joy that it relies on money and goods, and that a prince defies his sovereignty. This is not considered a sin, but the same idolatry is placed on top. And this is nothing else than putting the devil in God's place, wanting to take away God's divinity, authority and majesty, and blaspheming him.

80 Therefore Moses uses many words here, so that he may teach us the first commandment, for otherwise such a commandment would not be given.

go into the heart, and it is also a dangerous commandment. For he that hath money is proud; and he that hath many good friends leaveth thereunto. But he that is poor is fainthearted, and there is no comfort to lift him up. Thus the world is full of idolatry. Therefore, God must do what is necessary, and send the Turk or pestilence, the time and other punishments, so that people may learn to fear him. Just as He punished Lucifer and his angels for this sin, and cast him down from heaven, because he sinned against the first commandment, and rebelled against God and His majesty, and wanted to be more than he deserved.

Therefore, we should look to our Lord God for all good things, and not turn our hearts elsewhere with confidence and trust. Nor should we pride ourselves against God, as if we had a better remedy and had nowhere to turn to God; for these are the thoughts of all who despise God. Nor should one despair or despair where things are bad and sorrowful, for the reason that 1) God Himself calls you to trust boldly in His promise. Therefore, it is a matter of concern to you that you should raise up another for God, or seek any other help; for he will give you enough [John 10:11], and take away all harm from you, that is, he will be your merciful God. If any harm befalls you, he will turn it around and give you restitution and everything you need.

There are indeed glorious promises in this text, which belong to those who keep God's commandment. For what they do not have, God will give them; and what He has given them, He will protect and preserve for them. And from this text, as I also mentioned above [63], many excellent psalms are made, which David, like a little bee, sucked the noble juice from it. The prophets, no doubt, also took from it so many beautiful sermons, and fed and watered their listeners from these lovely springs.

V. 17-19. But will you say in your heart, "This people is more than I am, like

1) In the original: from causes.

Can I drive them out? then do not be afraid of them. Remember what the LORD your God did to Pharaoh and all the Egyptians, by great temptation, which you saw with your eyes, and by signs and wonders, by a mighty hand and an outstretched arm, that the LORD your God might bring you out. So shall the LORD thy God do unto all the nations of whom thou art afraid. 1)

This is an objection, because some small-minded, despondent man would fall into this challenge, or his heart would be tempted and made stupid by the devil, that he would say: This people is much more than that we small, fewer! and weak people should be able to resist him, stay ahead of them, or beat them and wear them out; it will be impossible that we should thus be greatly strengthened by God, for ours is little, theirs is a great multitude and multitude; and would thereby fall into another grave sin against the first commandment, which is called diffidentia, that one despairs of God's help, lets hands and feet slip, mistrusts God, and despairs of His help.

(84) The mistrust that comes from being weak and not seeing or feeling our outward strength, might and power, we fear that God will not be able to help us unless we are finished. In this hospital, the children of Israel lay ill here, and before that they also sinned greatly by sending scouts to the Promised Land, and by exploring the land's opportunities, fortresses, strong men and giants [Numbers 13:19 ff. 14:1 ff]. This frightened them so much that they did not want to leave; they thought that they were too weak for the giants, that they would not be able to overcome them, that God would not be able to save them from the hand and power of these heathens.

This objection and plea of flesh and blood, or temptation of the devil, is hereby met by Moses, and teaches how God's promises are fulfilled, not by our powers, but by His divine power. He wants to knock down the presumption and the trust in our own powers and human strength and power, to control and resist our mistrust and despair. For if the

If the children of Israel had looked to themselves and their power or wealth, they would have been as nothing against the Gentiles, such as the Cananites, Jebusites, Perizzites, Philistines, Ammonites, and other mighty, powerful countries and peoples, all of whom the children of Israel were to destroy, and would have had to let God's commandment fall to the ground, and not rub against these Gentiles, but leave them satisfied.

But Moses pointed them to God's presence, who had faithfully promised to be with them and help them against all these nations and their great power. For this reason, God makes a comforting promise to the children of Israel. And so that they would believe this all the more, Moses referred the children of Israel to the previous miracles of God, how he had promised them help and how he would certainly give it to them. Therefore, he sets before them the clear example of divine help, grace and mercy, and reminds them of how he threw King Pharaoh and all the war powers of the Egyptians into the Red Sea, and freed the children of Israel from their coercion and tyranny [Exodus 14:7 ff], which alone was a divine work, and otherwise it would have been impossible for them to be free from Pharaoh and the Egyptians for the rest of their lives. With this example of the previous divine help they should comfort themselves; because the God, who would have helped them, could help them again.

So David also prepared himself and strengthened himself: When the Philistine Goliath set upon him, and he had torn apart a bear and a lion by the help of God before, he also remembered the benefit and help of God, comforted himself with it and said: "The God who helped me before from the bear and the lion, the cruel beasts, will also save me from this uncircumcised Philistine [1 Sam. 17, 37]. St. Paul also admonished the Corinthians that God, who brings the dead to life, had restored him to health in Asia through the intercession of the Christians, and that God would still deliver him [2 Cor. 1, 9-11].

88. for one should not forget the previous miracles and the help of God, because they are

1) Original and Erlanger: to those who fear you.

Memorials, reminders and reminders of how God has helped us and can and will help all those who seek help from Him and expect help in faith. Therefore David also says in the Psalter [Ps. 119, 52]: Memor ero mirabilium tuorum, that is: "I remember your deeds of old" 2c. And with this we should also strengthen our faith, that we look to God's word and promise, and to the previous deeds of God and examples of His help.

(89) In particular, however, we are to set God's word and deeds before our eyes in this trial, even when this adversity comes to our hands. For it is common for our nature and reason to hold contrariness against each other in temptations [Ps. 42:6, 43:2]. This is the art of reason, which wants to measure and weigh everything, so that it considers the opportunity of the land, or the type of land, or the quantity of the people. So the Jews put the numbered pennies on the lines, and they calculated how many were the Canaanites, and how few were their number, the Israelites. So they calculated: There is much people and great power, but here little people and little wealth. This the devil is able to do, that he may make a noise before our eyes, and we may measure and reckon our iniquities and the strength of the adversaries; and because we are in the scales and in the measuring, we forget that God says here, "I am the LORD thy God."

90 Thus we do: When we are in need, we look only to the danger of the body, to food, drink, sickness, poverty, or whatever else weighs us down. Then we reckon that the water is too great, and our strength too small, and measure all this against our strength. When I look at my lack of strength and become aware of the countervailing force and the strength in the need before me, I am already lost and godless, and no longer ask anything about God. So it goes: When the devil takes me away from the word, I am stuck, and the devil has won the game, and makes me either despair, or otherwise run away and seek help; for I cannot stand there. Because I do not believe the word of God, the devil has me very soon.

and led onto his ice or slippery slope, so that I fall to the ground and lie down. So it remains that our inability and weakness against the power and force of our enemies is kept in the pursuit.

Women do the same thing in childbirth: when they are in childbirth, they have already calculated that mother and child will remain; because the mother is weak, there are also great inabilities of the body. They look at the strong evil alone, and then despair, or vow the child to some saint, have recourse to an idol; as, to St. Margaret, who should help in such distresses. Many have also made a vow: if the son remains alive in birth, he shall become a spiritual person, and the maiden shall become a nun. No one there has with heartfelt trust commanded this child's need to our Lord God, or thought of the first commandment, that he would have a gracious God, and that he would do mercy in a thousand ways to those who fear him. Then I should say: I entrust myself completely to you, with all my own, in your mercy, because you have said that you will be my God, and that you will show me grace and mercy, and I will rely on that.

For this reason, it is only the devil's art that he makes our weakness and need so great before our eyes that we forget God's word and command and ultimately have to despair. That is what he has brought us to.

But again we should learn the art of saying: Dear God, you have not only commanded me, when I am in trouble, to call upon you and seek help from you, but you have also promised me that you will be my gracious God, my dear Father, helper and protector, and will stand by me in times of need, proving your power and authority over me. This is what you want me to believe and trust in you completely; for your commandment stands there, and demands faith from me that I should even command myself to you. And I could do you no greater harm than if I did not believe your promises, in which you promised me that you would be my God and help me. Believe

I will not leave you, without a doubt, and I will remain in your grace, and all that I ask and need from you will be yes. For this word and promise, which he gives here, God does not withdraw; it does not repent him. And if it should come to pass that God does not keep his word and promises, and I remain stuck in adversity, then it is certainly the fault of my unbelief that I have not trusted in God, but in childhood adversity St. Margaret was supposed to help me, in the days of toothache St. Apollonia, in wars the knight St. George, in shipwrecks St. Niclas, and so on; I have thus placed my faith, trust and confidence in the saints, and have been shamefully deceived.

94 Let us therefore beware of unbelief and despair; let us also put out of sight the peril and distress, but on the other hand let us model to ourselves God's word and promise, and also the examples of divine help. For if we look only at the danger and hardship, the devil has measured out the hardship with such a long yardstick that one cannot bear it, but must despair over it. So he also held distress and fear before the prophets' noses and made them smell it, so that they might be distressed, complain greatly about it, and weep. But the greater the distress, the more thou shalt take hold of this promise in this text, and thrust it back in the devil's face, for God says [v. 21], "Be not afraid of them, for the LORD thy God is among thee, the great and terrible God."

95 Moses set before them a fine example of their own deliverance from the house of Egypt, when they had passed through the Red Sea with dry feet, when nothing but certain death was before their eyes [Ex 14:21]. For so it was with them: Behind them was the enemy, Pharaoh with a great army and power; in front was the sea, over which there was no bridge built, nor any ford to cross, they would all have been drowned in it; on both sides were high mountains, over which it was impossible to pass; heaven and earth were closed up there; there was no other account but certain death. Therefore they also saw

There their strength, which was so great that they even despaired, and thought that now they were lost. They cried out and said, "Were there not graves in Egypt, that we might have died in them?" and could not overcome the danger of the mountains, the sea and the armor of Pharaoh; it was death in their eyes.

96) But when Moses had adhered to the first commandment, which is, "I am the LORD your God," and prayed diligently, he also struck the sea at the commandment of God, and the sea parted from one another, and a magnificent, great, wide highway was formed through it, as wide as almost from Wittenberg to Magdeburg, almost twelve or thirteen miles long. Therefore Moses wants to say here: You have indeed experienced that what your God promises, he wants to do, and he can do it well; therefore he lets these words resound: "I am the Lord, your God. So do not doubt that he can give you health, food, clothing, house, farm, children, and all other necessities; he does not lack power and ability, he can do it well [Luc. 1, 37.]; also the will is there, because he has promised it to you. Why will you not believe and trust in him in all your trouble, that he can and will do for you and give you what you lack? For this reason we should also trust in him, in the face of his highest disgrace, punishment and chastisement.

(97) We should also remember this miracle and special example of redemption from Egypt daily, for many psalms recall and often report this divine work; all the prophets also refer to it, and Isaiah in particular often remembers this redemption. For when an emergency occurred, they remembered how God brought their forefathers out of Egypt, and therefore concluded that he would also help them again. For this reason, Moses wants to teach them to beware, so that they do not raise anything themselves in challenges and hardships, no matter how great the danger; also, do not think primarily about how many enemies you have, and how few are yours; but place the divine word, the promise and beautiful examples before all, which will show you how God 1) can and will help.

1) "Gott" taken by us from the old edition of Walch, instead of: "I" in the original.

Look into this helpful mirror, and let the emergency mirror go, or it may bring you harm. It is a comforting mirror that God, in His word, hangs before your eyes and says: "I am your God," I will help you; only hope in Me. And if his word is not enough for you to keep, since he promises you that he will do it and help everyone, look at the examples and proven deeds of God, since he has made it true and done it in others, on which we have to comfort ourselves and rely.

We Germans should do the same nowadays. We have as enemies the Turk, the Pope, the Emperor, and other tyrants who are all against us; so we have nothing but vain great danger before our eyes. If we now count the numbers, the Turk, the emperor and other enemies are too powerful for us, and we are against them as if one were set against thousands. This mirror is then vain, in vain and lost, which the devil presents to us. We must still turn our eyes away from this mirror and think as if there were no Turk, pope or other tyrant, and draw out the other mirror of life, namely the divine word and promise, and let us be greater and stronger than a thousand Turks and popes; yes, let us be stronger than the whole world is.

For what is the world against God? Is it not, as the prophet Isaiah says [Cap. 40, 15], like a drop of water that sticks to the bucket when the water is poured out? This droplet is far from being a stream; the air has soon licked up such a droplet of water. If we could only grasp this word and promise of God (if we are otherwise true Christians), we would find God's help against us. There would be nothing more certain than that we would defeat the Turk in a short time; we should not be sorry for this if we wanted to subdue the Turk. For God has promised us that He will be our God and in our midst 2c. Whom would this heartfelt comfort, these golden words not make merry and joyful, courageous and defiant, against all enemies, yes, against the devil and the gates of hell itself (Matthew 16:18)?

David in the 18th Psalm also looked at these words, when he says, v. 30: "With you I can crush the warriors, and with my God I can leap over the walls. For where the great and terrifying GOD is, why should there not also be happiness and victory against all enemies? Should not one be able to hunt down and defeat a thousand? Therefore he also speaks in the 46th Psalm, v. 4-6: "Even though the sea rages and rages, and the mountains collapse from its tempest, yet the city of God shall remain with its fountains, where the holy dwellings of the Most High are. God is within her, therefore she will remain well, God will help her early" 2c. Therefore also St. John speaks in his first epistle on the 4th 1) chapter, v. 4: "He who dwells in us is greater than he who dwells in the world." And St. Paul to Romans in the 8th chapter, v. 31: "If God is with us, who can be against us?" With this we should always comfort ourselves. For there is no doubt that with this comfort and faith in these words we Christians have resisted the Turks, the Pope, the Emperor and all persecutors so far, and we would probably want to remain safe from them if we believed God. But we pass by these words and promises, and we are not such people who build on them. Therefore, even if a misfortune befalls us and we get stuck in it, and no help comes to us, it is no wonder; we are not wronged by it; why are we ungodly and unbelieving?

102) The prophet Elisha also had this defiance [2 Kings 6:14 ff]; when he was besieged by the Syrians in the city of Dothan, and his servant went out and saw the enemies before the city, the servant ran in and cried, O we are all lost! and was about to despair. But Elisha the prophet did as if he saw and knew of no enemy, and so answered his servant, "There are more of them with us than with them. Then God asked him to open his eyes to the servant. When this happened, he saw all fiery chariots and horses on the mountains. All the mountains were full of angels, who stood on Elisha's side to drive away the enemies from the city, so that the prophet Elisha would not be harmed, and they would leave the turnips unsown for him (according to the common saying).

103) This is also shown in the battle of chivalry, 2 Kings 19:34, 35, which God did on Sennaerib before Jerusalem. Since he wanted to devour Jerusalem and make it a heap of stones, he knew how to keep the city from him, and he lost a hundred and five 1) and eighty thousand men in one night, who were found slain in the morning in the camp. If we still had faith, the great squires and soldiers would lie on the ground; but because we are either timid or pride ourselves on our strength, it is no wonder that sometimes a wheel goes over our leg and we get stuck in adversity. But if we persevere in this faith, help and salvation would soon be found.

(104) And even if we were to suffer hardship and tribulation in such faith, since we consider God to be our Lord, and were thus beaten and killed, we could not be better off, nor could we die better; the skin would be sold at a high enough price. For if God did not save me here in time, He would still "redeem me from eternal death. God wants to save His own who believe; and even though they sometimes have to pay for the evil neighbor (for one neighbor owes another fire damage, and otherwise one often has to pay for what he did not buy or steal), we believers nevertheless have this advantage, that even though we are slain and perish with the ungodly world, it nevertheless goes to the devil in the abyss of hell, but we go to eternal life, since we want to remain with God forever.

Therefore, we should not be afraid of danger and accidents, but look to God's word and His help for proof, and rely on it; for these are living and powerful words and deeds, and they sufficiently testify to how God wants to help from all causes, even in the midst of death; only that one may be comforted by them and rely on them without doubt. Therefore, in times of need, do not go against God's word; also do not judge.

a god in whom you trust more than in God; remember what the Lord, your God, did to Pharaoh in Egypt. If you do not have enough of this mighty work and irresistible help, then look at his certain promise, what he promises you of his almighty grace. For in these two things, as in words and examples, you will find comfort and help; but only that you base your heart on God and dare to go there.

For this reason Moses gives him so much space and time, and uses so many exquisite words, that he may bring these things before us, and teach us, that at all times, when adversity befalls us, we should put danger and distress out of our sight, and cleave to God's word alone, trusting more in God's promise than fearing all misfortune and calamity, and fearing and seeking no other God. For in this thou shalt have such a God as will put his hands under thee. He will also command his angels over you, to keep you in your ways, as the 91st Psalm, v. 11, gives us such a promise, and otherwise the whole Psalter is nothing but an interpretation and example of the first commandment.

(107) Let us therefore make every effort to learn the first commandment well, so that our hearts may know how to do all things, and then the other thing will follow from Himself, namely, that it may go well with us and that we may experience the power of these promises.

V.20. For this purpose the LORD your God will send a hornet among them, until what is left is destroyed and hides from you. Do not be afraid of them.

(108) With this he will convince them of this, and speak to their hearts, saying: Fear God alone, and no one else; for the LORD your God is with you. Therefore, they are still interpretations of the first commandment, that God will say: I am your God, it shall be well with those who love me. Therefore, if you trust in God, He will soon exterminate your enemies, even if He sends hornets among them to sting them to death. In sum, he will help you out of all troubles, only be undaunted.

1) In the original: four.

V. 22-24: He, the LORD your God, will cut off these people from before you one by one. You cannot destroy them in haste, lest the beasts of the field multiply against you. The LORD thy God shall give them before thee, and shall smite them with a great slaughter, until he destroy them: and he shall deliver their kings into thine hand, and thou shalt destroy their name under heaven 2c.

He still insists on the declaration of the first commandment, and gives them great comfort that God will equip them strongly enough to face their enemies and overcome them, for he is their God. If they believe in him, he will force the enemies under their power [Ps. 47:4], only that they hold on to him and let him be their God.

In this way, we too would be made right knights and be able to despise all enemies. But in the name of the devil, we trust in the temporal more than in God, and set our hearts more on human advice, on creatures and present help, than on the living God, who gives us such certain promises here. Therefore, we do not accept such a promise other than as if it had not been spoken by God, but by a juggler, a lottery boy, or a loose holiphile 1). The heart is so wicked that it is eager for mammon, for treasure, or money and temporal goods; and when it has these, it prides itself and insists on them, wants to be on top and nowhere else. But if it does not have such things, and poverty oppresses it, it wants to despair, becomes so fearful that it would let wood cut itself in two and fail, 2) forgets God altogether.

The Gergesenes are an example of what one should do in the world for the sake of God and one's neighbor [Matt. 8:31 ff.], who are very unhappy that the devils, driven out of the possessed man, have entered into their swine, push Christ out of their borders, and would rather have their swine than the Lord Christ. But let all who despise the word of God and put their trust in the creatures keep themselves and give themselves away.

Whoever allows such comfort to be torn from his heart and does not want to be moved by these words is not worthy to be ruled by God, but may have the devil as his ruler. He who does not want to be God's, may remain the devil's.

(112) Truly, there are great fears and idols who fight and dispute against the first commandment, which Moses spoke about before, and worked diligently on it, so that he would bring it into the hearts of his Jews, and so that everyone would place his faith and trust in God's grace. The devil has made the world so clever and so wise that it thinks it knows everything, and yet in truth it knows nothing. So I also always work on this article, so that we first learn to know Christ well and have faith in God. For if this article falls, then all is lost; but if it remains and is preserved, then all is preserved. I am a doctor of the Holy Scriptures, but I am still learning about them, and yet I do not know everything. But the world knows it all. Moses saw that it was very important and very difficult to learn that God is our Lord and to trust in Him, because it is impossible to learn it all. It is spoken with short and few words, but it comprehends much in itself.

(113) And Moses commanded the Jews before that they should not be afraid of the multitude of the Gentiles, whom they should kill and destroy, but remember what God had done before with them, and set before them his word, and the former works or miracles, that they might be confident, and walk freshly, for God would not lie to them, or cause his manifold promises to fall away.

V. 25. thou shalt burn the images of their gods with fire, and shalt not covet the silver or gold that is in them, nor take it to thyself, lest thou be ensnared in it; for such is an abomination to the LORD thy God. 2c.

Here, it means not only to remove the images, but also not to melt them, nor to take them and pull them into his treasure. Item, burn them completely. Whether they are kept or not, I leave that in its place and dignity. But this text has given much occasion to the enthusiasts and iconoclasts, who have considered it a perfection and righteousness in the sight of God to burn images, or to make a racket with the images and tear them down, and have wanted to be holy people and good Christians through such works. But if this were true, the Turk would be the most holy, and would have great righteousness before God; for he tears down many images, castles and cities. Therefore, one should not boast about it, or pass this iconoclasm off as an art.

I have now written much about this in the book against D. Carlstadt, vom Bilderstürmen, 1) therein I have strongly opposed the same work. And this is my opinion: A Christian should begin from the full righteousness of faith, that he relies on the word of God, and learns to keep the first commandment from the heart, that he loves God, trusts, and fears Him above all things. Whoever does this will easily despise all silver and gold idols. For outward iconoclasm is but a camouflage by which one seeks to gain temporal honor, and to boast as if he had done well.

But you have not yet trusted God, you are not yet godly and a Christian, even though you have torn down monasteries, churches and altars, for anyone could do that. But it is primarily up to God and us humans to learn to keep the first commandment, which is given to the whole world; not only to the Jews, but also to us Gentiles, that we trust in God and recognize Him as our God, who helps us in all needs and troubles, and that we fear Him in all happiness and misfortune. Faith shall shine forth against God in the cross and tribulation. But we are to use the fear of God when it is good for us. So whoever considers the first commandment well would easily forget the images; but careless hearts go out like the iconoclasts did.

1) This refers to the section "von dem Bilderstürmen" in Luther's writing "wider die himmlischen Propheten," Walch, St. Louis edition, vol. XX, 138 ff.

First, learn to trust in our Lord God in all troubles and dangers, both spiritual and bodily, in trials of body and soul, so that you do not fall away from God and look elsewhere for help, or despair as Cain, Saul and Judas did. Again, when you are well, do not become proud or insolent, forgetting God as if you had body, life, prosperity and everything of your own.

In sum, a Christian man should be free to have and not to have images. For in the 22nd chapter of Matthew the Evangelist, v. 20, we read that the Lord Christ attacked the coin of the Jews, and was not afraid to take it in his hands, whether they tempted him thereby; asking, What coin of the penny or coin of the silver, or image and superscription? touches the emperor's image; does not reject these images, but rather confirms them; otherwise no Christian should touch the coin of gold and silver. Therefore it is not a sin to have images. But to have such images, to make idols of them, and to put one's trust in something other than God and the first commandment, such images are to be destroyed.

(119) As we have taken away many images of the saints, and if we had many silver images, we would want to use them for Christian purposes. In the New Testament, God does not ask much about images, but demands the heart. For those who are well instructed in the word of faith can easily forget all idolatry and images, even if they were in the midst of the images. But where one puts God's word and commandment out of sight, one gets all kinds of images and idols. And even if there were no images, one still attaches oneself to mammon, wealth, abundance, to the great multitude, also to good company or covenants, 2) as Moses has seriously forbidden all such things until now.

120) The Jews had a special commandment from this and other texts to burn the images and to beware of images, so that God would control them, that they might have not offended against the same. Just as we still prevent our children from attacking lights or knives; not for the sake of the light or the knives, but for the sake of the child, so that it does not attack the light or the knives.

burn them, or cut them with a knife. So the Jews should avoid the images, so that they would use God's laws rightly in spirit, and not fall into idolatry and sin against the first commandment.

The eighth chapter.

V. 1. All the commandments which I command thee this day shall ye keep, and do them; that ye may live, and be multiplied, and possess the land which the LORD sware unto your fathers 2c.

I. This chapter is a new sermon on the first commandment. For Moses, as we know, preached many sermons on this first commandment. But in this chapter he wants to admonish and urge us to remember the first commandment daily and diligently, so that we do not forget God. He therefore commands and binds us to the constant contemplation and diligent practice of the first commandment, so that we may find it in deeds and works, as we live by it, and be multiplied.

(2) Moreover, he wants to strengthen their faith through the imagination of God's previous benefits, so that they will trust in him and not fall away from him in temptations. Therefore, he says, they should look back and consider that he had been their God, since he had led, guided, fed and sustained them for forty years in the wilderness, in which places there was nothing to eat or drink, since there were no bakers, brewers, cobblers or tailors; nor did they have food, drink, clothing and all necessities from God. By this glorious work they were to learn and know that he would be their God once again, and if they trusted in him they would have abundance and sufficiency.

Such examples of the divine care and love for his people he puts before everyone's eyes here, so that one would be caused and urged by the experience to believe in God. So the promise is still present today, in which the Lord has shown Himself enough.

He also does such works every day, which should powerfully provoke us to believe in him; but it is lacking in you that you do not believe. You have the word, and see before your eyes the work in the whole creature, which should be able to make you believe, and drive you to believe that he also wants to do good to you.

4 In this chapter he sets forth a sin that goes against the first commandment, which is called turning away one's heart from God in poverty, hunger, sorrow, adversity and affliction, and not relying on Him. Just as, on the other hand, in wealth, abundance and blissful times, one forgets God. And all this was directed by Moses, so that he would gladly control our unbelief and despair, so that we would learn the comfort that is written in the 33rd Psalm, v. 19, that the Lord feeds his own in the wilderness and does not let them die of hunger, just as he sustained the Israelites in the desert.

For this reason, you too should learn how to view and overcome such hunger, lack and temptation in the future, namely, that it is only a humiliation and temptation from God. It is not that he wants to leave the challenged or suffering Christians, but he wants to know whether they also believe in him or not. That is why Moses says in the text [v. 2, 3]: "The Lord your God led you forty years in the wilderness, humbled you, and tempted you, that he might know what was in your heart, whether you would keep his commandments or not. He humbled thee, and caused thee to hunger, but came in due season, and fed thee with manna."

(6) When the Israelites were in Egypt, having enough food and drink, and when they went out of Egypt, carrying with them their cloths full of dough, they behaved themselves sincerely and holy, and nian could not tell whether they loved, believed and trusted in God with all their hearts, while the sack was still full. But when the sack was emptied, and there was no more flour, dough and bread, they soon realized that they had served God only because of their bellies. For then they thought what they had done, and that they had not done right in leaving Egypt: that they had left the onions and fleshpots, and now had neither food nor bread in the wilderness. They grumbled against Moses because of this, as we heard in the 16th chapter<sup>1</sup> of the 2nd book of Moses [v.2.3].

(7) So it is with an unbelieving heart that no longer trusts in God, except because bodily goods are available; but if these are taken away, it turns away from God and blasphemes Him. Moses says: "The fact that the Lord made you hungry should be a humiliation for you to call upon God for food, nourishment and the necessities of life, and to be sure of this from Him. God wants to be your schoolmaster, and teach you to understand the first commandment, that your heart should look to Him and trust in Him when nothing is available, and let it seem as if He wants to leave us altogether.

For God has the way: Before He helps His own, He first causes them to suffer and be afflicted; then, in His own time, He helps them out all the more wonderfully. Here, in the wilderness, He can feed and water the children of Israel for forty years, so that it may be seen that God is able to provide more counsel and do more in all things than all the world; He is also able to do more than all gold, silver, money, goods, food, drink and clothing.

009 For this must be unto me a goodly tailor and cobbler, that can make garments and shoes for forty years: and let this GOOD be a master of a feast, or a father of a house, having such a floor of corn or socle, that out of the air, or stony Earth can immediately bring forth grain and bread, even water from the rocks. Ps. 65, 10. ff. Ps. 145, 15. 16. Ps. 147, 9. ff. If I should seek bread by reason, I would seek it of the baker, and corn of the castles; so God bringeth it out of the still air. Since there is no craft nor stock, there must be bread and all sufficiency. This is a masterpiece that must be remembered. God could still prove it every moment. Is. 50, 2. 3.

(10) Therefore, we see that all believers who trust in God and love His word must have enough; although there would be no bodily means of food and drink, God knows how to send help; as He fed Eliam in the wilderness by the ravens, and afterwards had him fed by the widow in Sarepta [1 Kings. 17, 4. 15.], and that time the Jews were fed by a new food, as the manna, which they never thought of, nor did their clothes get old or torn.

(11) We should hold this consolation up to our god, the belly, so that we learn the first commandment, trust God and His words and promise in time of need. But the whole world wants to understand the first commandment of God very well; but if they were to recite it, they would not know anything about it, since they wanted to be doctors and masters beforehand. Now I have long been a preacher, a doctor and an old fighter; but if I am to recite the first commandment, I have honestly grasped and grasped it by a silk bevel. The devil can soon teach my listeners another one, if need and poverty arise.

012 As the children of Israel said also unto Moses and Aaron in the wilderness, The devil told you to bring us out of Egypt. So their faith died out. When the belly of the god no longer saw the sack full of flour, all preaching and the first commandment were forgotten. But Moses told them the reason: "God made you lack, so that you might become his child and disciple, and learn to understand the first commandment correctly, and say: Although the sack is empty, the flour is out, and the dough is eaten up, I still believe him; for he has said to me: "I am your God", you shall have enough; although there is no

1) In the original and in the Erlanger: "im 1g. Cap."

If there is sack, dough, flour 2c., I still have our Lord God with me for provision.

013 But the children of Israel said otherwise, that the devil, and not God, had brought them out of Egypt. So do we also, grumbling against God without cause, regardless of his saying, "I will be your God and feed you; or, am I not so strong and important that I could give you ten florins, a bushel of flour and grain? All this makes it so that no one can recite the first commandment correctly; no one even thinks of learning it, or of taking it seriously.

014 But no man understandeth the first commandment aright, except he come first into want and trouble, that it seemeth as if God forgot thee, as if he would have thee stuck. Then you cry out: Oh God! Where shall I go? Where shall I find comfort and help? Shall I look in the cellar, on the floor, in the kitchen, in the closet, and pull out my treasure? but I have none. Then comes the first commandment, and cries unto thee and to all men, I am the LORD thy God. This householder will give you food and drink.

(15) It must be baked and spun from the first commandment. If you want to have a thread on your skin and a piece of bread in your mouth, the first commandment must give it to you, otherwise you will never get anything; mock it as much as you want, you godless boy! The word: "I am your God", I have sworn to you to do good, that gives the hungry bread and flour in sackcloth, also gives health in sickness, and everything else that one needs; just as here from heaven, from the pure air, bread falls down. The Israelites would not have sought bread in the air, but from a rich baker; nor could God give and provide it. Should he not still be able to do such things? Fie on our sorrowful unbelief!

16. remember this work, for it is in accordance with the word and commandment of God, which says, "I am your God. For there it is written that he does good and gives bread, which no one could have expected from that place. But the dear Jews were little enough grateful to God for this; nor does he give it freely and by grace, so that that such a work be known to everyone, and that the word always remain true that he is our God, and that we trust in him. Who would have thought at that time that He would give bread from the clouds? And yet God did it, so that no one would say, "I proposed it to God, asked Him for it, and thought that He would give it to me out of the air, but He does it out of pure goodness, so that it may be known to you that man does not live by bread alone. 2c.

(17) This saying is also used by the Lord Christ in the fourth chapter of Matthew, v. 4, and confronts the devil with it, who plagued him with the worry of his stomach when he fasted forty days and nights in the desert; he would also have liked to drive Christ into mistrust of God. The Lord Christ answered: "Man does not live on bread alone, but on every word that comes from the mouth of God"; as if he wanted to say: "Even if these stones are like bread, man does not live on them, but on the word of God.

(18) If there is no bread, nevertheless, if a man keeps the word of God and takes hold of it by faith, then bread will come in due time, even if it is sent down out of desire; and before there is a lack of drink, water must flow out of the rocks. Moses teaches this wonderful art, so that one may have enough in need and sorrow. Even if one had nothing more than the mere word of God, which is thus: "I am the Lord, your God", nevertheless from this word food, drink, bread, grain, wool, body and life, and all necessities would have to be provided.

(19) Learn this art also, that thou mayest trust in God. If you have nothing more than the first commandment, all the rest will come from it, even if the clouds rain bread or the rocks give drink. For he who has the first commandment has everything, and the world must confess, if it is to speak rightly, that it has everything it has from the God who says in the first commandment, "I will be your God.

20. learn this first commandment for the sake of the cause, so that God may be pleased with it, to be your God and helper, and to feed you, as he has done mightily in this example.

with the children of Israel, with the manna, and still wants to prove it to all his own. For thus says the 37th Psalm, v. 19: "He will feed them in the torment." Item, David speaks in the same Psalm, v. 25: "he has been young and grown old, he has never seen the righteous forsaken, or his seed going after bread. Other abundant promises of God testify to this, as in the 34th Psalm, v. 10, where it is said: "Those who fear the Lord will not lack any good. And St. Peter in his epistle says: "Cast all your care upon the Lord, for he careth for you" [1 Pet 5:7].

The Lord Christ in the Gospel of Matthew, chapter 6, v. 28 ff., also gives us his examples of divine care for his own, saying how he clothes the lilies of the field that do not sew or spin, and feeds the birds of the air that do not sow or plant; much more will he feed, nourish, preserve and protect his Christians, who are many more than the lilies and sparrows. But Moshe's example is also excellent and important, that God gave bread from heaven out of the air and made water flow from the stones to feed and water the children of Israel for forty years. And it serves us exceedingly well to align our faith with it, and to study and learn the first commandment diligently, so that we remain with the dear words of God, and continue with earnest, Christian prayer; for in this way God still wants to help all believers, and give them what they need in this life.

Our own experience also agrees with this miracle and commandment of God, which should ever move us to trust God all the more. For the God (who was able to perform these great miracles, such as keeping clothes and shoes intact for forty years, not letting them wear out and be used, even though they were worn on the body every day; item, who gave bread from above for forty years, so that he could feed and provide for so many hundreds of thousands of people every day) is also our God. Why then will we not heartily commit ourselves and all our possessions to his fatherly hands?

(23) These words which Moses used here, "Remember all the ways by which the Lord led thee these forty years," and "Remember him, and know that the Lord hath drawn thee, as a man draweth his son," apply also to me and to thee. We are to remember this text and let it be our command throughout our lives. But especially this saying, "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God," we are to take it to heart, to hold it dear and of value; for it commands us to hold the oral word or ministry high and great, to hear and learn diligently.

(24) We should not think that it is enough to hear the ten commandments and the divine word once or twice, but it must be heard and acted upon for and for. For this is the way with external, bodily bread, that if you eat today, you do not leave it at that, but tomorrow you eat again, and continue such eating from day to day, for and for, so that the body may have its food, nourishment and abstinence from it. So do not let it be enough that you have heard and learned the Ten Commandments and God's Word once, but you must learn them all your life, for you can never know them enough nor learn them enough.

Therefore St. Paul also teaches that one should grow and increase in the knowledge of the Lord Christ, which must be done by daily hearing and acting on the divine word. So also the first Psalm, v. 2, teaches that one should delight in the law of the Lord day and night. And John 5:39, the Lord Christ says: "Search the Scriptures, for they testify of me"; he wants us to diligently search and contemplate God's word. One must not become weary or tired of it, let it go, or put it under the bench, but always listen to it, drive it, and bring it out of the way again.

26. we hear here of a beautiful encomium, praise and honor, which Moses gives and ascribes to the divine word and commandments, namely, that there is life in this world, and also in that life; they sustain a man for time and for ever, Ps. 107:9, 20.

Weish. 16, 12. Of which St. Paul also speaks to Timothy: "Godliness (that is, when one believes in God) has the promise of present and future life" [1 Tim. 4, 8]. For whoever places his trust in God has the promise that God will assist and nourish him in this world, and make him blessed in eternal life. For Moses expressly says that God's word makes man live temporally, strengthens him in this life and for the life to come.

(27) In these words Moses speaks all these things of the outward, oral word, against the sects and the spirits that despise the preaching ministry. These are to be held up to their noses. The Jews had the outward word of God, which is thus: I will be your God, therefore you shall believe me; this was a certain promise, also concerning the bodily food; Moses, who leads this word, held this up to them faithfully enough, and through his preaching they received food. Therefore this example is also given, that the children of Israel were tempted with hunger in the wilderness; but because they adhered to the word of God and held fast to God, bread had to come, and so they were abundantly supplied, fed and satisfied in the wilderness.

This miracle still happens daily to Christians, so that they do not have to suffer lack in bodily needs; for St. Paul [1 Tim. 4:8] says that they should have enough here in this life. Even though they must often lack a little, it is only a temptation, and it comes about so that one should run to the word of God and know that the first commandment makes one alive. For if we were not tempted, we would not remember this commandment, nor would we ever learn God's word. The first commandment is a fountain of life; therefore, in time of need, either bread must come, or in its place other food to nourish us; just as in the wilderness the manna came down from heaven and out of the air, without their doing, where no one had sown it. Also the water had to come out of the gorges of stone; their shoes, and everything, held fast and endured well.

29 If anyone now wants to know and have a report of what all these unchanged things are.

Moses himself answers: "The word has done it, in which they trusted. They did not have to tear their old clothes, but to hold them as tightly as if they had been made new, because they received the word that Moses preached among them: I will be your God; by which word they held fast. And this miraculous work, in addition to the attached promises, we should also diligently take to heart and learn to make use of it, for we also have the same word and promise of God, so this deed of God is painted before our eyes in His word. But there it hangs, and will not go away with us either; which Moses complains very much of the children of Israel, that they have not driven it long; it has granted the devotion and godliness with them (as one says) a dance and a high mass.

V. 5, 6 ff. Know thou in thine heart that the LORD thy God hath drawn thee, as a man draweth his son. Keep therefore the commandments of the LORD thy God, that thou walk in his ways, and fear him: for the LORD thy God leadeth thee into a good land, a land wherein are rivers and fountains and deeps within 2c.

Luther read this text until the end of the eighth chapter.

(30) Moses is a very diligent preacher, always chastening and urging the Jews to learn the first commandment, and he did not preach it in one day. But first he says, "God has drawn you as a man draws his son." God dealt with them in a fatherly way, he brought them up tenderly. A father sometimes chides his child, and keeps it hard, scolds and punishes it; but soon the father's anger is over, he gives it an apple or a pear again, takes it from it again, wants to see whether the child loves him as its father, and whether it is good to him: he plays with it, takes from the child and gives it back to it, wants to accustom it to himself, so that it gains a childlike confidence in its father.

God does the same with us. He often takes away our possessions and goods, our health and loved ones, so that when we are in hunger, poverty, sickness, sorrow and heartache, we may run to him, plead with him and ask him. For forgiveness

He sends us to the search, not as an enemy, or as our executioner and executioner, but as our dear Father. He wants you to call and knock and say to him, "Give, dear Father," and to desire this with heartfelt longing and desire. This is what the Jews had to do with their desert and arduous journeys, and that when they were led out of the desert, had endured danger and hardship, and were sitting in wealth and abundance, they would not then become secure, forget God, and run after other gods, but would thank God for such benefits, and recognize that they had it all from Him; and, in turn, did not look elsewhere for help in their troubles, which they should expect from God, and look into His hands. Thus God can deal with us in such a way that we know how to keep ourselves right against Him in lack and abundance; and so He must, as a right father, draw us and accustom us according to His hand and way.

(32) Nevertheless, look at the ungodly nature of the Jews, even to this day in the whole world. The Jews thought they had everything by their own strength; therefore, when they were well off and had everything they needed, from that time on they forgot our Lord God. We find such ingratitude even today against the divine word. In what misery and blindness we have been under the pabstry, when we turned all our possessions and goods to the same false worship. Truly, if we were to recognize such distress, there would be no one so poor and unable who would not give away his skirts and cows, or whatever else he had, so that he might be free of this constraint.

But we have now forgotten. If we were to give a bushel of grain to a priest or other poor people at the time of the Gospel, we would be impoverished. Everybody is stingy and scrounges, and gives nothing to nobody. People know how to say: I have earned it with my bloodthirsty work and diligence, should I give it away like this? They always rob, scrape, steal to themselves, not remembering that we have everything from God. We do not have life from ourselves; death is daily on our necks. Our life hangs in another's hand and Nor does anyone do as he pleases, as if he were master of his life and goods, fearing neither God nor His wrath.

Therefore God must come and make us weary of this life, for the people are hardened and harder than the Adamants. They are still to be found when they are threatened; those who still wish and want the Turk to come hope for him. But, you powerless peasants, you must not hope for him, even if you pretend to: He will make us all free, so that we will not be allowed to give interest, treasury, bullets and tribute. Yes, when the Turk comes, he will cut off your head, he will cut you off in the middle, he will take you away captive with your wife and child. So he makes everything free. But it is no better than always going to the devil with you old people. We still preach for the sake of the young people, whose hearts are not yet poisoned, whether God will give them grace to improve themselves. With the old people it is lost, they are stingy and usurious, they live as if they had the life of themselves, and as if they were masters over life and limb.

(35) As the present world does nothing else, but that ruler and subject, great and small, collect money and goods, and are in contempt of God, serve mammon as their god, and lie in sorrowful security [2 Cor. 4:4]. For this is the thanks and reward of God, when he gives the world everything enough and superfluous, so that nothing is asked about God; no one believes in him, or trusts in him, or calls upon him, or worships him, or even forgets about him. We have another God, namely, our work and our craft. Everybody thinks: I am a rich citizen, a rich farmer, I don't need anybody. Therefore God may send him another people. 1)

(36) When God blesses a land and makes it rich, it is soon forgotten. So do citizens, peasants and noblemen, yes, everyone; they are all beaten over a bar, and all do according to the rule, which is written in the song of Moses [Deut. 32, 15]: Dilectus meus incrassatus et impinguatus, recalcitravit, when the people were cowardly, then they lied against God. This is the

1) This will probably mean: Therefore God may prepare for Himself another people.

Thanksgiving for the divine benefits towards us, and the fine, praiseworthy, honest virtue that, when one has pulled one out of the mud and dirt, that the same one (with leave) afterwards again courts him on the mouth, or again pushes him into the dirt. Thus one forgets God and one's neighbor, one depends solely on the creatures and gifts of God.

37. But God will also avenge and punish this ingratitude, so that all kinds of God's plagues will follow it. For if we forget God, our Lord, we must perish; if we are hardened and hardened, he has hellish fire and heavy hammers enough, and so much that he can soften and melt your heart [Jer. 23:29]. Otherwise God will be Father and our gracious Lord, and will deal with us as a father deals with his son or child. He wants to be your faithful dear God, but do not despise him, and do not be stingy, do not forget him [Hebr. 13, 5, 1. For if you would do that, as gracious, kind and fatherly he would have been otherwise, so angry and abominable he would show himself against you [Sir. 5, 7.]. He would have the devil punish you and lead you astray, and destroy your body, goods and soul, and destroy you through the devil's cunning and deceit.

Thus Moses warns and forewarns, so that each one may beware of himself, and not trust in himself, and not forget God (when he is well), or defy His power and might. For when God removes the lack and gives goods, and one becomes ungrateful to God, God's wrath, pestilence, evil time and war soon follow. He who seeks only how to seek the penny soon forgets God and becomes God's enemy.

(39) Therefore, let each one stand here and pray diligently, recognizing the gifts he has received, that his house, farm, land, wife and children, money and goods and livestock are God's, that he has given them, and that they did not come from his hands; he did not obtain them by his own efforts. So remain in the fear of God, that you may say, "Dear Father, it is yours; my hands did not acquire it, your promise and promise gave it. I see these things with my eyes, but I have them from thee, and not by my hands.

(40) But with the wicked there is no fear of God, there one does not give thanks to God, but the idol, presumption, is there, that one has no trust in God; yes, one thinks: There I have my treasure, my grain and my beer in the house. Item, my handicraft and agriculture, that I have acquired; another also send it to him, I will feed myself well on it [Luc. 12, 19.]. This is the thanksgiving and praise or trust of God. In the same way, one gathers treasures to the detriment of the neighbor, defies and insists on the goods, exults over them, does not remember God, does not help other people, prides, robs, steals, lies and deceives others, and thinks that he has his possessions and goods from his sour work.

41. But a godly man thinks: What I have of goods, that I have not from myself; I have not my life also from the parents, if another workmaster had not come to it; for a hundred years ago I had neither skin nor hair. But, dear God, it is all yours, my wealth, my honor and strength. And because God proves so much good in me, He promises with words and testifies with deeds that He is my God, therefore I should say: I will not anger Him, I will do what He wants me to do; why would I steal? why would I cheat my neighbor? God has more than he has ever forgiven; why would I deal falsely with people? I will have enough; for he says here that he will be my strength, my wealth, my money and goods, and will feed me. He wants to be my procurator and food master, just as he was the procurator of the children of Israel in the desert for forty years. God alone does it. Such a man must be pious inwardly and outwardly; God also loves him, and he is useful to others, and does not live for himself alone.

(42) From this manifold stopping, you can see what a rich preacher Moses is. He diligently practices the first commandment, to set the heart before God, that it may believe Him, and trust in His word and promise. So we should also consider his commandment, his promise, and these deeds or examples described.

43: About all this, we Christians should be think that God sent His Son, the Lord Christ Jesus, into the world and crucified Him for us. We should preach about this daily, for this work is higher than all the treasures and goods of the world. But we also let it pass by and do not ask anything about it, since this love of God, demonstrated to us in Christ, is the most abundant work and highest example of God's grace and mercy toward us, which fills heaven and earth. For we have in the New Testament a much greater sign of God's love for us than those in the Old Testament.

V. 11. Take heed therefore that thou forget not the LORD thy God, lest thou keep his commandments, and his statutes, and his judgments, which I command thee this day 2c.

(44) Moses diligently enforces the first commandment, saying, "Though the world be foolish about it, yet all that we have is of him who says he is our God. Do we not have it all from God? For in that he has scattered his goods and gifts to the whole world, he indicates that this first commandment has been fulfilled. But we use them as if we did not have them from God. So Moses will not cease to inculcate this, and to sing this uneven little song to us, namely: Beware that you do not think that you have it by yourself, your craft, your care, your livestock, but know that you have it from God, from his hand, grace and mercy. Therefore beware of this sin, and of idolatry, presumption; lest thou think that thou hast it all from thyself. Nay, thou hast it not by thy wit, neither hast thou it by thy toil and labor, plow and cow; but by the word of God thou art fed, and therefore it is given thee, not that thou shouldest labor, but that he should be thy God. Know this, and use His with thanksgiving, and He will bless you more; if not, you will have neither happiness nor salvation with your goods.

45 In sum, all goods on earth are works of the first commandment, by which God proves that He is our God. Even if you do not give God praise, nor know him, yet I cannot, Moses will say, leave it, I must rub it in your ears, and tell you who does good to you; now you know this, or not, in his time 1) you will also be spoken to for it. Therefore, if you knew that you had it from me, you would enjoy it everywhere; but if you do not know it, and do not give thanks for it, you will have to pay for it again. For if God is no longer your God, you will no longer be considered His.

46 Therefore thus saith God, I will also do away with my first commandment; I have been your God long enough: but if thou wilt no more take me for thy God, then thou shalt no more be my people: for when the Turk cometh, or any other distemper, they shall teach thee right manners. For whoever does not believe that everything we have and possess comes from God and is given to us, but trusts in creatures, God will louse him up with his great harm.

47 Therefore learn, while ye have time and space, that ye may come to the understanding and experience of the first commandment, and in no wise forget God, of whom ye have all sufficiency; neither despair when ye have nothing; for with him alone are all treasures found, and there let us seek what each lacks. So then, if there is anything, let us fear him, and let a godly man stand firm on the promises and the examples, and know that God loves him and will not forsake him.

(48) This is the long and glorious exposition of the first commandment, where Moses also told all the hindrances that draw us away from the first commandment. For the first commandment is all about a man taking heed to nothing, and leaving him with nothing but God; then he cannot be deceived. For God is also our God, and one Lord and God of the Old and New Testaments; therefore He will also provide for us here in this life and also in the life to come, amen.

The ninth chapter.

V. 1. Hear, O Israel, that you are going over Jordan today to invade the nations that are greater and stronger than you, great cities walled up to heaven 2c.

In the beginning of this fifth book of Moses [Preface § 2. 3.I have said that it is nothing else than a beautiful, delicious sermon or interpretation of the ten commandments of God, and especially of the first and most noble commandment, which he expounds in length and breadth through many chapters, with great diligence and excellent earnestness, as a great master and preacher, so that one may ever learn to esteem the ten commandments dear and great, and see how no better, more useful or more necessary teaching and preaching, nor any higher wisdom or art is to be found on earth.

(2) Now he has hitherto, in order to explain the first commandment well and to make it understandable, told us of many temptations and hindrances that run against it in the world on every side, namely, the great idol Mammon, money and goods, friendship and favor, power and honor, and the like; so that he may warn us to beware and take heed that no one sets his heart on anything other than the word that he has given us and put into this commandment, that he will be our God. For all power is to keep the confidence or trust of the heart pure, so that no one sees or knows anything other than what his God says, speaks or gives.

(3) But of all the hindrances, or vexations, or idolatries, none is greater, nor more injurious, than that which is called our own righteousness or holiness, by which we defy our works and merits. But it is not a coarse, common idol, like the others that rule in the world among the rabble, but the most subtle, beautiful and mischievous devil, which alone charms the highest, most refined people, but most of all afflicts and attacks the right Christians, even clings and clings so tightly that no one can get rid of it as long as we wear this flesh around our necks.

4. for I have often said how we are naturally t is a very inherent and shameful evil that one seeks holiness in works and fails to earn it from God, so that even the very highest Christians have their greatest trouble and work with it. St. Paul, I think, will be one of the greatest saints, like the prophet David; but when they have reached the highest, they cannot be safe from this idol, as they themselves always complain. For Paul freely confesses that God had to send him an angel of Satan out of hell, who speared him and tortured him quite well, only so that he would not exalt himself to great enlightenment, as if he were better and holier before God than others because of it [2 Cor. 12:7].

Behold, the excellent man in spirit and faith stands in such great danger that he would fall into such hope that he would tickle himself and come before God with his own holiness, and with such a register: So much have I done, suffered, preached, converted 2c., that there was no counsel to resist your misfortune, but that he had to have such a devil on his neck, who plagued him in such a way that he had to remain in the confession that what he was out of pure grace, for the sake of neither work nor merit. Thus, the hole to boast about himself was lost.

(6) This is the complaint of all Christians until the last day, how it is so sour and difficult to resist this challenge. Therefore Moses did not put this idol last for nothing, as he is the last one. And even though the others have all been overcome and subdued, this one remains undead even into the pit. For though they also rule mightily, they can all be weakened and overthrown: mammon with poverty, honor and power with shame and misfortune 2c. Even wisdom can be turned into foolishness and disgrace. But where holiness reigns, it cannot be weakened or dampened by any human art or power. For even if one wants to attack and condemn it, it only boasts of its suffering all the more.

and innocence, makes herself a martyr for the sake of God and justice. Summa, it is our old, thick, tough and stretchy 1) skin, which does not want to be peeled off, as one blues and beats oneself with it.

7. Some pious fathers also complained about this in the desert, and one of them gave a simile, saying: It reminds him of this abomination as of an onion, which, when one skin is peeled off, always has another underneath, as long as something of it remains; so is this filth; though it is overcome in one piece once or twice, so that God's grace retains the glory and honor, yet it always comes back, clings and attaches itself to all works, so that no one can remain untouched by it, for it also has some devil who tramples it underfoot, so that it cannot muster holiness.

(8) Therefore it is a great preaching about the first commandment, especially in this piece, that a man should come to the point of not presuming holiness in works before God. Although, I hope, it is not very necessary for the common crowd, because they do not stand for great piety or holiness, they remain with their idol Mammon and other common idols, so that they cannot come so high. There are few of them who defy great art or wisdom, which is also subtle and high; but none does so much harm as this one, for he wants to be nowhere but with the very best, and because he is the most beautiful, he also seeks the most beautiful church, leaving the others well satisfied. So they are careful enough not to do so, for he who does not do good works does not suffer much.

9th Now this is the right devil and great abomination, hitherto most highly honored under the papacy, shouted out in all churches, monasteries and convents, in all pulpits and high schools, in addition to which so much worship has been instituted and established, and the world's goods have been heaped in heaps; yes, torn down to such an extent that no rich man has died otherwise than in the opinion that, because he would leave nothing better behind him, nor take anything else with him but good works and worship, he should make his will, and contribute so much to the church.

so that God would be served and remembered. Summa, God began in time, yes, he was the first in the beginning of the world; but in particular he has been in the ascendancy and publicly raised as the highest worship in Christendom, now longer than a thousand years, since nothing else has been taught or known, but to place our confidence and blessedness on our own works.

(10) Therefore Moses comes first to overthrow and condemn this idol, using all kinds of ways to frighten and tear his Jews away from it, even though it did little good with them, because afterward they fell as deeply into idolatry as we have been so far. First of all, he warned them when they came into the land, so that they would not go away and say that they had earned it from God, as if their holiness had been so great that he should have given them the land and driven them out and destroyed them.

11. But notice how evenly and masterfully he meets and depicts their mischievousness and hypocrisy, so that they make a pretense of holiness. For this they do nevertheless, the pious peelers, that they give God the glory that he has done it; they are not so rude that they attribute the work to themselves, but in their hearts they play this along with God: He must let them make him a fool and an idol, and take the name that he must look upon their righteousness, and give the land for it, if he would keep his honor otherwise. But they want to do their best, that the blame and cause of the work is not God's, but their own merit, and yet it should be called God's honor, as said, that he is so pious and gives the pious what they deserve, when it is truly nothing else than God's honor robbed, and measured out to them themselves. For God's glory is only that He gives, helps, benefits and saves everyone out of pure grace.

12) Now this is certainly the characteristic of their own righteousness and of all false saints, that they pretend great honor to God, and pretend to be excellently humble, saying that they are poor sinners, not worthy of God's grace, do not want to be called holy nor pious, 2c. but in essence it is nothing else than a desperate, doubtful hopefulness and presumption, so that they cannot be called saints.

rather come before God, they are pure and holy beforehand, nor accept his grace, they have earned it beforehand, that not he but they have the glory. [She] will not take anything from him as a gift, but will give it to him first, that he may repay her as he is our debtor. That is to say, she has made of God a faithful one, who cannot do without our holiness and merit, and has no gratitude for giving us anything unless it is well deserved. Behold, this is a virtue of praiseworthy piety.

(13) The other is like it, in that it comes before God, adorning itself with a work or two that it has done, and wants to cover all the sin and shame that it has ever committed. As we have seen under the Pabst: If someone has lived thirty or forty years in vain sin and iniquity, and after that has fallen down, made a will, or said so many masses, God should welcome him, and all the evil things he has done all his life should be paid for with one florin or ten florins. Is this not a devilish presumption, yes, an insulting mockery and ridicule of the divine majesty, that he, putting all wickedness aside and keeping silent, should for the sake of one florin let everything be given and settled, and give heaven in addition? Yes, he will give them a heaven in which the angels walk with clubs (as people say).

(14) Moses also wants to expose such disgraceful virtue of false holiness, how it conceals countless disgraces and vices under a small appearance, and yet is allowed to step unashamedly before God, to reckon with Him, and to boast as if there were pure holiness, that He must see no more sin and forget all wrath. Therefore, he continues afterwards, telling and reproaching them to see what they have done against God all the forty years before they came into the land. As if he should say: Dear one, if it is to be reckoned and set on an equal footing with God, then you must put so many works against it. Now you consider him to be such a fool, 2) who does not see your iniquity, or ever to it

And be glad of your impotent money, and not count against it the goods he has given you, life and limb, house and home, sun and day, and all that heaven and earth can do or bear; in sum, be silent of all his benefits, none of which is so small as to outweigh all your works, if you can give him.

(15) But if you say, "Yes, God is merciful, and does not demand or reckon so harshly, but spares and gives, as we angered Him before. Answer: So you should also have a good year! Can you now believe that he will forgive you in vain so many sins and iniquities in which you have lain so long, and that God will show you all kinds of good deeds of which you have never been worthy, and think that he cannot or will not take you to heaven without your ten guilders, or whatever you may give him? What is this but that either thou art a fool, that thou missest to put away innumerable sins with one florin, if thou hast never done a good work unto death, or that thou thinkest God, as a desperate knave, to be a fool, who, like a child with a number penny, can be fooled or deceived into not seeing thy wickedness?

16 Now this is all the blindness of evil nature, that where it sees only a spot that is a little pure and white, if it once imposes a good work that it calls well done, it can make it so useful to it, reflecting and tickling itself, that it should regard God as the greatest saint. This is the cleverness of the ostrich, which, when it comes under a bush to cover its head, thinks that it has hidden its whole body so that it cannot be seen, and like young children, they close their eyes and think that if they do not see, no one should see them.

(17) Therefore Moses will teach and conclude: If anyone wishes to come before God, let him not prescribe for himself the way to bring forth his works and to stand on his rights, but let him look at another record and count how much God has given him and done for him without merit, so that he may learn that all our righteousness is nothing and condemned, and that there is no other way or path to righteousness but to know and confess this, that we are before God.

2) Potzen --- scarecrow, popanz.

God are not pious nor righteous, but must receive what he gives us out of pure grace, no work being required or considered for it. As the prophet says in the Psalter, Ps. 143, 2: "Do not go into judgment with your servant, for there is no living man righteous before you. Item, Ps. 130, 4: "With thee there is nothing but forgiveness to fear thee." Such a heart that denies itself, that finds neither piety nor merit in itself, is true piety before God. And for the sake of such faith and confession, it is called pious and righteous to confess 1) freely: Dear Lord, I know of no piety in my body and in my life, but this is my comfort and defiance before you, that you gladly give to a poor sinner, and forgive all sin out of sheer grace.

The Pharisee comes and stands before God with his works: "I thank you, Lord, that I am not like other people, nor like this tax collector; I fast two times a week, and tithe everything I have. O an excellent saint, whom no one could punish without the shameful idol of 2) presumption, that he comes trolling, boasting, and giving thanks not of grace, but of his fasting and good works, as if he had no right to grace.

(19) Next to him is the poor tax collector, who has neither works nor merit, and knows nothing that God should look upon unless he freely confesses that he is a sinner, and for this very reason he comes and asks for mercy, seeking and desiring nothing but to receive from God. Christ pronounces judgment on this one, that he has gone home righteous and pleasing to God because of this faith; but the other, with his holiness and many works, is condemned and not worthy to hold a candle to the publican.

020 Behold, we all lack this now, even as the Jews lacked it. For this, as I said, is our old skin, through flesh.

and blood, marrow and bone; for everyone would like to raise up something that would be valid before God, on which he would like to rest and rest, and boast that [it] would be his own, and not have to stand naked and bare before God, and bring his shame before Him [Gen. 3:11]. For this reason all spiritual orders have been established, all churches and services have been set up, all wills and spiritual devices have been created, so that everyone hoped that God would look at it and consider it so exquisite as they thought that He would have to lift us up to heaven and take us.

21 Therefore, if one rejects this and teaches against it, it will immediately follow that everyone will cry out, "Well, then, let us do no good works;" and quickly go the wrong way, either making God a fool and an idol with our works, or doing nothing at all. There is no way to avoid 3), there is no way to stop here. No one wants to remain on the middle road, that we denied ourselves badly before God, as those who sought nothing but to receive the grace and promise offered, but then went and did what we could, even freely for nothing, for the sake of no merit or our own enjoyment. It is said, preached, and heard, but no one can do it, if one is to be able to do it and prove it. For my part, I must confess it, and I respect that no one so holy and full of the spirit will have to confess it. For, since all the saints have felt it and lamented it, we will certainly not be above it. I feel it well, when it is a matter of meeting, how nature resists, seeks and reaches out, and would like to find a work that it could push up to God, and speak: I have nevertheless done this, preached and directed so much. And even though I know that [it] does not apply, nor should it apply, I cannot let it go, nor can I come to the point that I could so merely surrender to His grace.

22 But is it not a miserable pity that a man should not be able to do so much, when God Himself beckons to him, saying, "Dear one, you have two paths before you; take them.

and yet choose one: Wouldst thou rather have my grace and eternal blessedness freely, given and carried home, without all thy cost and labor; or stand to gain it by thy works, and yet not obtain it? Yes, [he] exhorts and entices to grace, and against it dreads eternal wrath and punishment, where we do not accept it. How should or can he do more, if he does not help us, that he so abundantly offers and pours out his grace, provokes and gives, admonishes and frightens, punishes and strikes us? he himself would like to let go of justice, and make a line through it: so we want to have justice without grace, and yet also have our own little idol with us.

(23) Such is the misery of our lives that we do not accept the treasure, on which we should devote life and limb, spare no food or effort, and run so that we would sweat blood if it were to be found in any place. Now he comes from himself and brings the treasure to the door, admonishing so warmly and fatherly, praying so earnestly, threatening so terribly; so may we not be. If we should spit on ourselves and become enemies, that we are such unholy people, who against the offered grace rightly defy, that is, invite wrath and disfavor upon us.

(24) For what is it but to seek and to require justice, saying, Go into judgment with me, and give me that which I have earned? Summa: I am not allowed to your mercy anywhere; but next to it out of sight all sin and wickedness, as if you had not angered God once. See, this is what Moses wanted to put down, to warn and to defend, that one should look out for this idol and beware of it. Therefore, let him who can learn learn that he should by no means seek merit or his own righteousness, nor should he have anything to do with any work that he wants to bring before God, but run and flee from it, as from the devil himself.

25 Thus sayest thou: How is it then that there are so many sayings and promises in the Scriptures, that those who are pious and do good works shall both here and there receive their reward? as [Luc. 6:38], "Prayer, and it shall be restored unto you" 2c. Answer: It is therefore necessary to know what is to be done.

To be righteous before God and to do good works, of which I have said enough; that is, not that you should come in disguise and say, "Lord, I have done this, write it down, and repay it;" but that you should say from the heart, "Lord, I take all your goods, benefits and graces as a sinner and a desperate man, worthy of eternal wrath and hellish fire, as I go and stand, if you should deal with him according to justice and merit. But I do not look at my sin, nor at what I have earned, but at your word and earnest commandment, that you command, admonish and forbid that no one bring any work before you to earn anything, but out of fatherly kindness receive forgiveness of sin and all kinds of benefits, and stand and remain in the pure confidence of your grace.

26 Wherefore if there be such confidence in the heart, the works that are done therein shall be called good and acceptable unto God, and for that cause shall obtain the promise. For this is the promise: He that keepeth the first commandment, and standeth in grace, shall also all his life, and whatsoever he doeth, be acceptable and well-pleasing; for apart from grace an idol is so soon made of it, under false pretences of good works. But he that hath this understanding cannot trust in them, nor make them an idol, but abideth pure and right in faith, and doeth works in and of grace. Therefore they are called righteous good works. Behold, the Scripture speaks of this in the 112th Psalm, v. 1, 2: "Blessed is he that feareth the Lord, that delighteth in his commandments: his seed shall be mighty upon the earth; the generation of the righteous shall be blessed." So also in the 128th Psalm, v. 1. 2, the Holy Spirit says in the same way: "Blessed is he who fears the Lord and walks in his ways. Thou shalt be nourished with the work of thine hands: thou shalt prosper." As if to say, it is in the work that it lies, which must be before and in all works; for fear suffers not that one should trust in works, or leave his comfort. But if the heart's confidence in God's grace is right, God is so pleased with the works done from such a heart that he graces them with all kinds of blessings and benefits, as the Psalms now quoted indicate.

The other part.

27 From all this we see why Moses is so diligent and serious about the first commandment, and so faithfully warns against this idol as against the most harmful poison. But he needs a strong defense against it, shows and gives strong medicine, so that one can come before it and resist it.

28) First, by indicating and concluding that God did not bring them into the land for the sake of holiness, nor for the sake of wickedness, but for the sake of His promise, which He holds out to them, saying [v. 5]: "That He may perform the word which the LORD swore to your fathers 2c, which is, as he elsewhere often says, for his name's sake; whence also the 25th Psalm, v. 11. asks, "For thy name's sake, O LORD, be merciful to my iniquity." Now where is the name? Just in the first commandment, where he unites himself and lets preach and offer to the whole world that he wants to be our God and give everything good. With this, it is said: Your holiness counts for nothing, your piety deserves nothing, but the commandment, in which his name is written, his promise is bound and set forth, that counts, that does it, that is the only reason why he does you good and gives you the land.

29. If you want to know where you got body and soul, money, goods, honor, art, wisdom, power, etc., just look at this commandment, which will show you that you were not born to it, nor did you acquire or earn it through your luck, cleverness, work, or effort, but everything came from the fact that he promised, before you ever did anything, that he would be your God; therefore you have everything you can, down to the last penny. It is always necessary to do this, as Moses does here, so that one learns to regard this commandment rightly, and to recognize and extend it in such a way that one draws and grasps oneself and all divine goods into it, yes, also the Lord Christ and the whole New Testament, which even springs and flows from this promise, and finally remains in it, as in him such promise is fulfilled and confirmed, that he is our gracious Father, and through Christ forgives all sin, redeems from sin and death, gives all his goods, and gives eternal life.

(30) Secondly, that Moses might teach them these things, and put away their pride, he began to describe their legend, and made a long register, wherein he told them, and set before them all that they had committed, because they were in the wilderness; that they might see and understand that God gave them nothing for their merit, but only for his promised grace. And this is the summary of the whole chapter: What should he give you because of your piety? You have been a stiff-necked, stubborn people from the beginning to the present time, who have continually provoked and angered God, so that when he should have acted according to your merits, he should have destroyed you all in one heap long ago.

Behold, there stands the glory and praise of us all, a beautiful and praiseworthy virtue, which befits the wretched creature in the face of its God and Lord. When God does us all good, more than we can wish, we give him nothing in return but cursed disobedience and a stiff-necked head. How then the world is now everywhere full of stiff-necked, unruly people, servants, maids, peasants, burghers, nobility, like the coarse, crooked and awkward blocks 1) and logs, who have nowhere to serve but in the brick kiln with fire to cope. Let them not be told, nor hindered, nor controlled, as they are threatened with fire, water, pestilence and all misfortune, as if they had iron and steel in their necks, which no one can break until the executioner knocks them in two with the wheel or death strikes them.

But much harder and more stiff-necked is the people, who are under the delusion that they are holy and God's people, as the Jews boast [Matth. 19, 20]. There are people so hard and stiff that neither God nor the world can bear them, in whom everything is lost, how one deals with them, one warns, urges, begs or pleads. As this history sufficiently shows and paints, how they were so often tormented and beaten during the forty years, and daily had so many cruel, terrible examples of God's wrath before their eyes, before which their heart should have melted; nor was it forgotten and despised from hours. This is the fruit of the great holiness, sought and praised by his own works, which, as said above [§ 15], may throb, boast, and defy God with a florin or two, and have a work or two so blown out, proud, and stiff, as if he must count their unvirtue and idolatry to great merit.

(33) Behold, Moses will enforce these things upon them, and bind them up, that they may be reflected in them, and have them always before their eyes: therefore he speaketh so much, and maketh it great and dreadful, that they may tremble at it, as they have been ever disobedient and rebellious from the day that they came forth out of Egypt (Exodus 32:8, 9). And consider especially the thing which they did as soon as they came out of the land into the wilderness, at Mount Sinai, when God made a covenant with them, and gave the ten commandments, how they committed idolatry with the golden calf, and angered God so much that he wanted to destroy them all at once, that Moses also had to burn the calf with fire and turn it into powder, and then throw the dust on the water and give it to them to drink. 32, 20. ff.] that they had to drink their own abomination. Behold, the sin he will not keep silent nor forget, writes it in the book, that they had to read and hear [it] publicly several times a year, drives also even the words: Remember it, and do not forget 2c. So that they do not throw it behind them and put it under the bench, nor leave it out of consideration, as if God had forgotten it, but always let it ring in their ears, and hear nothing but their sin and shame.

34 Let this be said to him by way of example, both by me and by others, against this temptation; for, as I have said, there is no better counsel nor art against it, than that every man should take hold of his own bosom, and there he will find a register, which will tell him much other than his holiness, that thou must put down the peacock's tail, and say, Lord, I will gladly forget all works and merits, that I may only come to grace. Like the poor publican (Luc. 18, 11. ff.), who lets the Pharisee read his register, and boasts of good works; but he knows neither works nor holiness, but uses another register, which is called: Mihi peccatori, in which is written

Nothing but vain trespasses and sins; such a sight teaches him finely to despair of it, to make no holiness of his own, and to run from the merit of works to grace.

For this reason, God also rules His saints in such a way that they always carry sin around their necks, even keeping such rough knots on them, that they must remain in fear and humility and not become too secure or presumptuous. Christ wanted to have St. Peter and Paul as high apostles, but before that, he wanted them to start and fall low enough that the former denied him [Matth. 26:74] and became apostate to him; the latter persecuted him [Acts 9:4], blasphemed him and condemned him to the utmost; only because he tied a shackle around their necks, so that they could not forget their misfortune, otherwise they would also have fallen into this desperate misfortune. But now they must remain here, so that they may not presume on any holiness, and may not despise any sinner. Therefore, whoever wants to escape from shameful presumption, let him also do so that he looks behind him and reckons how he spent his life before. As I and others have to say, "As long as I have been a knave, deceiving countless souls with false doctrine and idolatry, blaspheming and crucifying my Lord daily," 2c., so he will probably crawl to the cross and be glad that he may come to grace as a sinner.

36 The Book of Jesus Sirach also teaches this on the 5th, v. 5: Noli esse sine metu de propitiato, do not be sure and without fear of the sins that are already forgiven. Why is that? Precisely because Moses also teaches us to ward off misfortune. For as soon as we forget what we have been, we forget the grace that has been given to us. Because we no longer consider the misfortune that should humble us, it soon follows that the gospel is no longer tasty, and after that all kinds of horrible bad habits come in again with heaps, ingratitude, pride and arrogance, contempt for one's neighbor, 2c., and then becomes seven times worse, as Christ says (Matth. 12, 45. Luc. 11, 26.), than it was before; as we now see and experience all too much every day.

37 St. Peter must have seen this as well, since he says of such 2 Petr. 1, 9: <sup>1)</sup> "With whom these things are not, he is blind, and seeth nothing, and forgetteth the purifying of his former sin." 2c., that is, such a man is made of them, as one that goeth blind, and seeth nothing with open eyes, nor regardeth or feeleth, and is secure and presumptuous, as if he had never troubled no water, 2) and could no more err. But it is said: "That your sins are never sins and forgotten is not the fault of your yellow hair, but of grace and forgiveness; but if you are thus forgotten, and neither see nor consider how much God has confessed to you, and how great a treasure he has bestowed on you, you give place to the devil again, so that he plunges you into blindness, and all kinds of sin and shame. Therefore also now so many of our kind have fallen away from the gospel, only because they make themselves believe that they now have it, are full and safe, and no longer think that before they also lay in hell and deep blindness, or were before the net and yarn.

38 Therefore, lest we fall into this accursed evil, let us diligently learn the first commandment, and always keep it. Learning, I say, so that we remain disciples all our lives, and beware of overindulgence and harmful delusion, as if we had heard enough and could now do it well; for we have no rest, even from all other idols and temptations, but much less from this conceit of righteousness. I confess myself to be one of the most, for I have done diligence, so God also has great mercy, and helps to resist confidently, yet I cannot bring myself to get rid of the idol, and must remain a disciple of the first commandment as long as I live. All the other people on earth can do it all too well, not only the ten commandments, but also far above them, so many orders, and ranks, and works to excess; think that the Holy Spirit had to teach and set much higher things in conciliis, as if they had gone far beyond all ten commandments, yet there never was, or still is, anyone who has rightly considered the least commandment, or understands the least part.

V. 8-10. For in Horeb ye provoked the LORD to anger, so that he would destroy you with wrath, when I went up into the mountain to receive the tables of stone, the tables of the covenant which the LORD had made with you; and I tarried forty days and forty nights in the mountain, and ate no bread and drank no water, and the LORD gave me the two tables of stone written with the finger of God, and on them all the words as the LORD had spoken to you out of the fire on the mountain in the day of the assembly.

39. It has been shown to you many times how Moses used many words in the interpretation of the first commandment, which he practiced with great diligence, just as a schoolmaster reads and teaches the lesson to his students with great diligence, so that they may grasp and learn it well; Or as a mother spreads porridge on her child, that it may eat it and be nourished; so he wills that the people of Israel, through these many words and sermons, may well understand the first commandment, learn it diligently, and live by it. And he would gladly bring them to the knowledge of themselves, that they should take it by the nose, and think behind themselves, as they had done in the wilderness, saying: I fasted for forty days in the wilderness for your sake, and had great labor and trouble, that I might fetch you the commandments of God, and bring them to you from Mount Sinai, which trouble I had to lose; this labor was done in vain, because ye angered our Lord God with the golden calf.

40 He reads this virtue to them in this register, always impressing upon them that they have been a stiff-necked and stubborn people, idolatrous and disobedient, and that it has cost him much effort to swear them in to God, 3) and to bring them back to grace. They are to read this register, they are to look into this mirror. He sets it before them written, so that they should not forget it, but be humbled by their legend. And their sins and vices must now serve them so that they may be more devout.

41. we should also not forget the wrongdoings we have committed.

but to remember it for our humiliation. I also use to do the same for him. For I, Martin Luther, have also been a prankster for a long time, and have been in the monastery life, have seduced people, and I cannot pay the souls that I have seduced. I must still keep this record and this bad habit in mind, so that they may preach to me about my good works and my own righteousness, on which I also relied in the papacy, and may now remember that I no longer desecrate and blaspheme God. And even though I am now no longer a blasphemer nor a desecrator of God, for I do not deceive the people with my preaching, I also no longer sacrifice and crucify Christ in the mass, but I praise and extol the mercy of God: nevertheless, my life is done in such a way that I need God's grace and mercy, my life is insufficient, and my works are so incompetent that I may not defy God on them, nor ask and desire heaven for them. I must say with David, Ps. 143, 2: "Lord, do not enter into judgment with your servant" 2c., my life is too weak and frail, and my faith too little, so love is somewhat cold in me. I need the mediator and throne of grace, the Lord Christ JEsu. I must crawl under this cover and ask him for forgiveness of sins; he must forget that which is still sinful and frail in me, cover it up, and grant me grace. But whoever else wants to seek right from God will find right enough.

V. 11. And after the forty days and forty nights the Lord gave me the two stone tablets of the covenant 2c.

(42) These are the virtues they should look at; they should look at this list and sit down, look behind them, and realize who they have been. They shall not put this painting under the pew, but put it before their eyes, and look at it, and preach from it in the pulpit, and let them bring up their badness, and let them always hold it up before their noses, as they have done from their youth, and what wicked deeds they have committed against God, so that their hearts may be afraid of it, and the people may say, "Lord,

Do not deal with us according to our sins, do not repay us according to our iniquities", Ps. 103, 10, but be merciful to us poor sinners, we desire mercy and not justice [Dan. 9, 18. 19.]; thus they would remain finely humble. Therefore, if we do not curb the old rascal, we also forget the grace of God. Therefore, Moses is always reproaching the children of Israel for breaking in two the tablets that God Himself had written. He makes their sin great and grievous, so that they almost despair, for he says that he is angry with their sin and has broken the two tablets of the Ten Commandments.

(43) And they would say, Though our fathers have sinned, yet will we not do so, and sin. Yes, they did it even worse than their fathers, after they had entered the land. Under the papacy we also made it bad enough with idolatry, and also made idol calves more than they. The people of Israel did not worship the cast calf, but they wanted to worship God Israel by this calf; they wanted to serve God under the image of the calf, they erected it in honor of God. For they knew that in the Old Testament the Old Fathers and Patriarchs, as Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, sacrificed calves to our Lord God, therefore they approached, wanted to improve it, and also erected a golden calf to the living God, thus they wanted to serve the God who had led them out of Egypt; they certainly did not want to serve the devil.

(44) Just as today, with our apparent and glittering works, we also want to honor and serve God and make Him gracious to us. For my own part, I did not enter the monastery to serve the devil, but to earn heaven by my obedience, chastity and poverty. That is, to raise a calf and to worship the calf. But this, the sin of the Jews with the calf, was still a golden and delicious sin against our idol and sin. And if we had been there, we would have eaten the calf with great devotion and holiness. You have certainly taken into consideration and remembered the glorious examples of your Ancestors, that the patriarchs used calves for their sacrifices, therefore they wanted to follow their fathers, and honor our Lord God in this image, and he who should have overthrown them and talked them out of it, he must have been bold.

(45) We are all of such a mind and nature that we soon forget our sins, but Moses brings it up again, and says to the people, "Remember how you kept yourself, and what trouble you caused me, that I turned away your sin, and reconciled you to God by my prayer, and stopped his fierce and burning anger.

V. 25. and fell before the Lord, as at first, forty days and forty nights, and ate no bread, and drank no water 2c.

46. in the other book of Moses [Cap. 32, 20] you have heard how Moses burned the golden calf to powder, and poured water into the dust, and also gave the Jews who had worshipped the calf the dust to drink, so that they might see what a weak, loose and impotent god they had served and worshipped. Moses did this to their great shame, that they had to eat their god and drink it into themselves; he turned their worship into dust and ashes and destroyed it completely, so that he would not have left even a small pea of this calf. From this we learn that one should not establish one's own worship, nor should one defy and rely on it, for one's own righteousness is a great sin.

(47) And that Moses also did not leave the dust, he shows the great displeasure and serious anger of God when we do our own worship.

(48) We must do the same to this day, and not cease from destroying the pope's idolatry and false worship and abuses. We must give up to the pope and his

They curse the rich, blaspheme and defile them, and do not shut their mouths, but preach against them without ceasing. For some now pretend that we can do nothing else but condemn, reproach and blaspheme the pope and his own. Yes, this cannot be otherwise; for as soon as one forgets the errors, the grace of God is also forgotten, and the grace offered is despised; therefore one must always remember it and preach against it. For God is heartily hostile to one's own chosen devotions and worship, and does not want one to leave a single stump of it, but to keep one's heart pure in the faith and trust of God, who thus says: "I am the Lord your God. And we should know that God gives us everything; for He has promised to be our God, and to keep His faithful all here and there.

So Moses is a fine teacher. He interpreted the first commandment well, and led the people to their own knowledge, and humbled the hopeful, presumptuous spirits, above which he also reproached them with all kinds of bad habits, so that they would deserve something else than the promised land. Just as we think ourselves worthy of the good gospel, so now our evangelicals are seven times worse than they were before. For after we have learned the gospel, we steal, lie, deceive, eat and drink, and do all kinds of vices. Since one devil has been cast out from among us, seven more wicked ones have now come back into us, as can now be seen in princes, lords, noblemen, citizens and peasants, as they are now doing, and behaving without all shyness, despite God and His decree. 1)

C. D. Mart. Luther's Interpretation of the Song of Moses, Deut. 32.

Laid out in 1530 or later, issued in 1532.

Translated from the Latin by Justus Jonas.

Preface of Justus Jonas.

When the high prophet Moses in his fifth book had presented and interpreted the ten commandments, namely the first and the second table, to the people by many noble, faithful, delicious sermons; as then this same fifth book is a real bundle, and an exceedingly excellent glossa ordinaria and commentarius about the ten commandments; Shortly before his death he left this song for the whole people of Israel and all his descendants as a memorial and for the last time, in which he summarized and understood in short words the summa of the first, most noble and highest commandment, and otherwise of all preaching, admonition and admonition, which he did for a long time, from the first day of his profession and entrance, with the great people; so that they might understand this first, highest commandment of the first table: "I am your God" 2c. and the whole divine law, not only to be proclaimed, read and preached by priests and Levites every seven years, and to be heard in its time, but also that the same teaching be practiced among the people, among young and old, in the congregation and in homes, with daily remembrance, with daily teaching, practicing and admonishing, with daily singing and saying, and be sounded to the people; just as songs and chants are still being made for the common man and the youth, in which the Summa of the whole gospel and knowledge of Christ.

For Moses, as a special high man, knew well that this blessed teaching, namely to spread and preserve the true word of God among the people, no human wisdom, no work, no care, no effort, nor diligence is enough, and that it does not help that one has the books and writings; As some now think, if they have the books alone, they are learned and holy; indeed, that it does not help that Deuteronomy lies in the ark of the covenant, or in the Liberei [2 Mos. 25, 16. 40, 20. 2 Kön. 22, 8.], but if also the preachers (as, such high prophet of all high prophets, Moses himself, and others) drive the divine word with all highest faithful diligence, with living voice and daily stopping. If these ten commandments, or divine word, are imagined by young and old people alike, with daily incitement, with supplications, with entreaties, with entreaties, with singing and saying, with all inward and outward exercise, it may nevertheless be great good fortune, and special rich grace of God, that it adheres and remains with some, before such great, fierce raving and raging of the devil, who would gladly wipe it to the ground, and through false *Luther originally wrote this interpretation in Latin, but no single Latin edition of it is known, nor is it included in the Latin collections of the Wittenberg and Jena editions. It is also not known exactly when the interpretation took place. Seckendorf (nist. Tutb. lib. II. 53, x. 148 a) and Walch (Vorrede zum 3. Bande, § 12) place it in the year 1529; but there can hardly be any doubt that it is to be placed later. (Cf. the notes to ? 29, ? 50 and ? 70.) Justus Jonas translated it into German and added a preface. This translation (perhaps from a "manuscript") was first published by Georg Rhaw at Wittenberg in 1532 under the title: Auslegung I). Mart. Luther's on the Song of Moses at the Two and Thirtieth Cap. Deutero. Translated from Latin by Justum Jonam. In the same year another edition was published, printed at Nuremberg by Kunigund Hergotin. In the German collections, this translation is found: in the Wittenberg edition (1556), vol. V, p. 247b; in the Eisleben edition, vol. I, p. 555; in the Altenburg edition, vol. I V, p. 786; in the Leipzig edition, vol. I V, p. 287, and in the Erlangen edition, vol. 52, p. 400. Both Walch and the Erlangen edition are based on the text of the first edition, so we have followed these. The Wittenberg edition has allowed itself so many and in part so significant changes with the text that it can come into consideration for us only here and there for the correction of individual readings. If one had only the Wittenberg edition, one would believe that the preface also originates from Luther, for the title of the same reads: "Preface to the Song of Moses", and in the preface itself the words: "according to the interpretation of Martini" have been omitted, and the relevant passage there reads: "I have therefore printed this song in German". In the Erlangen edition, the preface by Jonas is missing.

Doctrine and other wiles of Satan and wickedness of the desperate world will not be completely forgotten and even suppressed.

And so Moses, as a great man, to whom such an unspeakably great burden of governing the great people was laid, shortly before his death, was already thinking in his heart how soon all the good that he had done would fall; how miserable and wretched it would be after his death and further on; how the longer it would become, the worse it would become in the same people in the future, he briefly touched upon and exalted the great, excellent blessing that God had bestowed upon the people in this song with very important words; 1) after that, throughout the entire song until the end, he, as a true, sharp Moses, uses all kinds of harsh, horrible words of punishment and ghastly threats of divine seriousness and wrath.

And, as his proverb reads [Matth. 12, 34]: "When the heart is full, the mouth overflows", one can see in these words that Moses wrote this song out of fierce, heated, godly zeal, and that this song, shortly before his death, cost the faithful pious heart, the excellent high man, many a heavy, sorrowful thought, many a strong challenge; as we shall see. As if a faithful, pious preacher, who from the bottom of his heart would like to see God's word remain among the people and reach out to the descendants, should sing a little song, as it will still be in thirty or forty years in all the world, for the sake of the excellent, unspeakable, great ingratitude and contempt, which now and then bishops and princes, and also noblemen, citizens, peasants 2c. on this side show against the divine word, he would also not find much joy or gaudeamus, but much heartache, requiem and lament to sing. Rather, Moses had great anguish and pain from it, who prophesied here in this song, how it should go to the whole people in the future and for a long time, when they will now have their kings and princes 2c., until s<sup>es</sup>] be over with them.

Because this song does not only concern the Israelites, but also all of us, and the dear gentle fellows, who nowadays in all classes despise God, the Lord, with his ten commandments, and say: The pastors can do nothing else, but preach the ten commandments, I have given this song, according to the interpretation of D. Martini, 2) German want to give day, the scholars, so their parish priests with to make those who despise the Ten Commandments uninstructed again; to show that Moses does not hold the Ten Commandments in low esteem, that they may see what the Ten Commandments are, who the man is who was seen and heard on Mount Sinai (as described in Ex. 19:16, 18), with proofs of divine majesty, with great and terrible fire, with strong lightning and thunder. with proof of divine majesty, with great terrible fire, with strong lightning and thunder, as one who wants to be and remain the Lord, let himself be seen and heard; and what great things the whole world, emperor, pope, princes, lords, kingdoms, countries, people, is interested in the short ten commandments (which every peasant and farmhand can now hear, but nevertheless despises and tramples underfoot).

It is a great, special gift and grace of God that the catechism is now being taught purely in the church, namely, the Ten Commandments, faith, and the Lord's Prayer. For through this, every person has the whole theology, and can learn what the right, best, highest, true service of God is, what God's will and commandment is, what He demands of us; item, how each one in his state, in all conduct and life, should hold himself against his neighbor, and live so that it pleases God. And if the Lutheran doctrine (to which the devil is so bitterly hostile) had been of no use other than to make the Catechism and the Ten Commandments known to the people again, which under the Papacy had to be the least doctrine against the pilgrimages, against the doctrine of monasticism and hearing mass, it would still have built more in the Christian church than Paris and all the high schools, as long as they had been on earth.

But the wicked world is everywhere ungrateful and perverse, both against God's commandments and against the Gospel. When it hears the commandments, it cannot think how great the Lord is until it feels thunder and lightning, either physically or spiritually in its conscience. If grace and mercy are proclaimed to her, she cannot let them be given to her, but wants to earn God's grace with her own works.

So, when the Ten Commandments are preached to people, they do not think that God is so serious about the commandments, and that they concern all the greatest things that are in heaven and earth, in this world and that. For the first tablet concerns God Himself, His divinity, His divine honor, which angels and men owe Him. But the other panel concerns the greatest things that are under heaven and on earth, all politics and regiments, all

The commandments are the basis of all households, all commerce and advertising, and therefore there is no wisdom, life or being that is not included in the commandments.

But many, when they hear the ten commandments, think of the children's Bible, think it is a bad children's sermon; do not think that they are such very high, great commandments, and that behind them is such a great Lord, such a high majesty, such a high master. But we know, praise God, that hearing and learning the Ten Commandments, item, knowing what is law, what is gospel, what is commandment, what is promise, is not to be regarded as such a bad children's teaching, but they are the highest two teachings under the sun, without which no one can come to God or know the truth.

We will leave it for this time to speak of the Gospel; but when you hear the Ten Commandments mentioned, you must not go with your thoughts into the children's Bible, or think that they are short words, which are also written in other children's books, which one hears every day, but you may well go higher, and know that you are hearing a teaching, especially in the first commandment: "I am your God" 2c., "Thou shalt not have other gods", which no prophet, not even Moses himself, not even an apostle, not even an angel in heaven has learned or studied.

For a poor creature, a poor man, to truly consider the high majesty that created heaven and earth, angels and men, as their Lord and God, to promise himself all good things to him, to trust in him in life and death, is not an art that can be studied. No saint on earth ever lived in this way, not even John Baptist, who studied it. This is why the Lord Christ says in Matthew 22:40 that the whole law and all the prophets hang on the two commandments.

For in the first commandment everything is comprehended that concerns God's glory, His divinity, His holy name, His holy will, and the highest, holiest divine service. Therefore, all ceremonies, all spiritual life, all worship services, whether among Christians or pagans, should and must be judged by the first commandment, so that if they are in accordance with it, they are quite pleasing to God; if they are not in accordance with it, they are idolatrous, devilish and vile abominations before God.

So in the other commandment, "Love your neighbor," or in the other tablet, are comprehended all right, godly, Christian good works, which may be done in all the world by young or old, in whatever state they may be, shall also and must be judged by the other tablet, and be judged. And they that cry much of good works, but tread under foot this greatest register, where the good works are told, and commit adultery, murder, thievery without ceasing, may well be reflected in the other table. For all other good works, though they seem great and shining, if they are not according to the commandments of the other table and are done in obedience to God according to the first commandment, are vain hypocritical works, which God does not respect and which are of no use to the neighbor.

So then, everything concerning God and the neighbor is set forth in the Ten Commandments; and all the books of the Prophets, as well as many of the Psalms, are all preaching, reminding, and interpreting, with more and richer words, the first commandment: "I am your God. Item, all the histories in Joshua, in the book of Judges, of Kings, of Chronicles are examples of how God held so firmly above the first commandment, how He punished the unbelieving and the wicked, and how He saved and comforted the faithful.

But so great is the cunning and wickedness of the devil, that he can destroy holiness and worship, which have the greatest glory and appearance before the world, as the innumerable statutes and monasticism under the pope and the Turk, so that everyone, or the greater part of them, falls upon them, and not only leaves the right commandments of God, especially the first, standing, but tramples them underfoot.

So under the Pabstthum no mad monk's dream has been, no lie of rosaries so impudently, it is more violently driven with teachings and preaching, with words and works, than the holy ten commandments, and the highest, holiest, noblest commandment, which demands the highest, purest, noblest service of God, that we should believe God from the heart, fear him 2c.

Therefore, when Moses knew that there were all kinds of hypocrites among the people of Israel, who were following the worship of Baal and other false worship, deviating from these commandments and throwing the first commandment to the wind, he left this song for them to read, In it, he warns them with short but strong words, which all the prophets have subsequently warned them of, which has also happened to them in such a way that both heaven and earth must testify that not a single word has been missing, that everything has come true.

And in this song we will now see that God does not want to joke with the Ten Commandments, but how small and weak they seem, how little they are respected by the mighty, by the rich, by the wise, by the false saints, yet they shall rule in heaven and on earth.

They will condemn all false holiness and heresies, overthrow and erect kingdoms and principalities, as they have proven in the kingdom of Israel and Judah, and still prove daily with many examples.

For even if the world does not believe it, and in certainty and blindness despises God with His commandments, God the Lord nevertheless continues.

He shows that he is the Lord and God, comforts and saves his pious children, shows them abundant kindness and grace; however, under all kinds of crosses and tribulations. Again, he afflicts, punishes, redeems, and finally overthrows the wicked, as the first commandment says, and as the Psalms sing about it; as can be seen in all histories, both of the Scriptures and of the Gentiles. This is what we will continue to hear and read in this song.

The Song of Moses, Deut. 32.

(1) In this song (although he should speak in a friendly manner at the end), the prophet Moses does not need many gentle words, but speaks everything with great, excellent, hard earnestness; he scolds, condemns and punishes in the fastest way, shows great severity and sharpness. And first of all, he throws countless, great, bodily and spiritual benefits before God's ungrateful people, puts them before their eyes so that they may grasp them. Again, he paints before their eyes their fine gratitude, which they and their descendants will prove to the pious, faithful God; namely, that they will forget all great benefits and God Himself, turn away to foreign gods, and therefore invite God's wrath and malediction from themselves.

(2) And Moses, like a true Moses and preacher of the law, does not offer much fatherly enticement, but scolds, punishes, jeers and is angry at their great ingratitude, speaks burning, fiery words, and threatens everywhere with an almighty, strong God, from whose hands no one will escape or escape.

3 With this he indicates the nature of the law [Rom. 4, 15. 7, 7.], namely, that it shows sin, terrifies the conscience, and that without grace and mercy through the law no one can become godly before God, that [it] is also not to be dared to deal with such great majesty through our beggarly, miserable works, or to meet the fire with straws.

V. 1. Hearken, ye heavens, I will speak, and the earth shall hear the speech of my mouth.

He calls heaven and earth and all creatures to witness, as in a great matter, which concerns not temporal goods, not a kingdom or principality, not a house, court, gold or silver, but the highest and best of each; namely, either to have God, the fountain of all good, with all eternal and temporal salvation, with heaven and earth and all creatures, or eternally (which is terrible) to lose and do without. Yes, what matter does not concern the emperor, not to reconcile princes or lords, but to have God, the eternal Majesty, graciously, to prosper here and there, or to die and perish in God's disgrace, in eternal despair of all divine and human consolation, without all help or salvation, eternally and without intermission.

(5) In such a great matter there should still be little testimony or little witnesses too little; there should still stand up the beautiful, high, wide sky, with the noble sun, with the moon, with all the stars. The earth with all its plants, with all its birds, with all its animals, and the great wide sea with all its fishes, and everything that moves in it, would have to come and bear witness to their God against the wicked, save His eternal divine honor and justice, and confirm His judgment [Revelation 6:12, Wis 19:6 ff].

(6) When the hour comes for God the Lord to awaken against the despisers and never to be forgotten or despised, suddenly all their courage falls away, their hearts and minds are filled with fear.

know so completely upset, stupid, sad and despondent that they feel nothing but that not only God, but heaven, earth, leaves and grass, all creatures are angry with them, convince them, accuse them and condemn them.

7 Thus Habakkuk the prophet forewarns the king of Babylon, saying in chapter 2, v. 11: "For even the stones of the wall shall cry out, and the beams of the bars shall answer him"; that is, when God shall visit him, he shall have such a desponding spirit, when a plank cracks on the wall, that he shall think the heavens are about to fall. So also Moses, in the 26th of the third book, v. 36, warns the wicked that God will make them so despondent that they will chase a rustling leaf 2c. But we see the same thing in Isaiah in the first chapter, v. 2, that he, following Moses, cries out to heaven and earth about the ingratitude of the stiff-necked, godless, wicked people'. Yes, they will also witness all too strongly in his time.

V. 2. Let my teaching drip like rain, and my speech like dew, like rain on the grass, and like drops on the herb.

(8) Here Moses desires that his teaching may drip like the rain and dew on the grass and herbage, that is, that it may be strong and bear fruit, so that he does not speak and preach in the wind. After he speaks of the greatest thing on earth, of the business of religion, namely, of the first, highest commandment of God, which is right religion, which is the highest and most excellent service of God. And again, what is the highest abomination before God;- namely false doctrine, false worship, false holiness, all kinds of hypocrisy, which all goes straight against the first, highest commandment of God, which hypocrisy Moses [v. 33.] calls vain vipers and dragons poison and gall [Isa. 59, 5. 6.].

(9) Therefore he desires that this his right doctrine may bring forth fruit in many. He compares God's word to rain and dew. For where it is preached purely, it is not, like human statutes, without benefit or fruit, which Peter [2. Ep. 2, 17.f] calls "clouds without rain", but works and creates something great. He compares the audience to grass and herbage [Isa. 40, 6.] For like rain and

The dew makes the meadows cheerful and green, so that flowers and grass spring up and grow according to every desire; thus God's word refreshes the hearts and consciences; and where the same rain of divine word falls, it does not go off without improvement and fruit.

V. 3. For I will call upon the name of the LORD. Let our God have the glory.

(10) That is, I will sing a little song, which I will start high, and no one under the sun shall start it higher, nor be able to make it better. My best song and best teaching shall be the first commandment of God; namely, that one should give glory to the one, true God, heartily fear and love him, trust in him alone and build on him, and that all other services, however holy, excellent and delicious they may seem, if they are performed apart from or next to the first commandment, are vain idolatry and hypocrisy.

(11) And my song is thus: "Give glory to God". That is, to the one, true, living God alone belongs the glory, praise and honor in heaven and on earth. "He alone is (as Moses says in this fifth book Cap. 10, 17.) one GOD above all gods, one HEART of all lords," who created heaven and earth and the sea, and all that is therein [1 Tim. 6, 16. Revelation 1, 8.]. Who hath all kingdoms of the earth in his hand, directing and subduing them as he pleaseth; who giveth breath and life unto all men of the earth; who formeth and ruleth all kings' hearts, senses, and thoughts, and otherwise all men of the earth, inwardly, as it pleaseth him; who alone giveth all gifts, bodily and spiritual; without whom no man can have body, life, wisdom, strength, health, power, wealth, or any other good, or keep them for a moment. To him, says Moses, give glory, that is, recognize him for a Lord who creates and works all things, from whom alone all gifts flow. So also Jeremiah says in the 9th, v. 23, 24: "Let not a wise man boast of his wisdom, let not a strong man boast of his strength, let not a rich man boast of his riches; but let him that will boast boast of this, that he knoweth and knoweth me, that I am the LORD" 2c.

(12) Now here it is decided that no man's glory is, but all majesty, all majesty, authority and power is God's alone, who alone gives wisdom [Luc. 21:15], strength, wealth, to whom he wills, takes it away again, and changes it with all men as he wills. Therefore no kingdom can stand longer than he wills; no government, no household, no wealth or welfare can last or remain longer than he wills. As Daniel Cap. 2, 21: He raises up kingdoms and brings them down as he wills.

(13) To recognize and know this, to give all glory to him alone, to earnestly expect from him all gifts, all physical and spiritual help and comfort, to rely on him in fortune and misfortune, in life and death, to flee to him in all temptations, to seek and call upon him alone in all distresses and afflictions, this is the highest, most pleasing service of God.

14) The glory, however, 1) is given to God the Lord only by the small group, the faithful and pious on earth; these trust and rely on Him from the heart, recognize that they have all goods from Him, that they could not stay a moment before the devil, if God does not protect and guard them [1 Sam. 2, 6-8. f.]. The hypocrites, however, and all other godless people, even though they profess God's omnipotence and glory with their mouths, still rely in their hearts on their own holiness, wisdom, strength, ability, on their own works, on man's help and comfort; and if they do not feel the same in times of need, they become frightened, despair and despair, run away from God, blaspheme and curse God.

15 Now this is a strong comfort to the pious and faithful: Even though they see daily in the world that God's word and works are so shamefully mocked, ridiculed, despised and trampled underfoot, they still know it to be true that it may last for a while. It may be for a moment that God watches the despisers, but at last they learn that this first commandment remains true, and that God retains the power and glory. How to

Now and then they see that small and great are stingy without fear of God, without shyness, despise God's word and the pious, faithful preachers, and throw the ten commandments to the winds as a small doctrine; but they do not know that finally this first commandment will remain true; and that they now and then do not want to believe, they will have to experience in their conscience, in body and soul, in honor and property, wife and children.

16 Therefore, if one leaves the glory to God, seeks all help and comfort from Him, and waits for Him, for He has promised blessing and grace, then it will be well, whether in church matters or in the ministry, whether in government, in housekeeping, or in small or large affairs. We can see this: Where there is a pious, faithful bishop and pastor who does not seek his own honor, but recognizes that he has the Spirit, grace, the Word and all gifts from God, God Himself is bishop and pastor with him; again, where heretics and false teachers rob God of His honor and seek their own honor, it works, as we have seen and experienced more in our time with Thoma Münzer and others. So also in regiments: Where there is God-fearing authority, which keeps God before its eyes and gives Him glory, God Himself sits in the council, helps to watch, guard and govern.

17 Again, where kings, princes and lords forget God, rob God of His glory, build on their own schemes and wisdom, on wealth and power, on covenants, understanding and the help of men, everything goes back, there is neither happiness nor blessing; as experience shows, as the histories of the Gentiles and the Bible indicate. But even if our Lord God allows the wicked to carry out some evil plans, ungodly counsels and thoughts, so that it seems they do what they want, they do it as they please, and theirs is the glory and power, God does nothing about it, it still comes to an evil end in the end, as the 73rd Psalm, v. 19, says: "They perish, and come to an end suddenly and with terror."

V. 4. Without change are the works of the Rock; for all his ways are judgments. Faithful is God, and no evil in him; just and upright is he.

18 He calls God a rock with an almost subtle, comforting title, that he is a very strong, certain comfort to all who rely on him and dare cheerfully. All other help and comfort is an uncertain sandy ground. This is found in experience. But whoever heartily relies on God can stand in all temptations. So David also says in the 18th Psalm, v. 3: "My rock, my fortress, my refuge, in whom I trust." Item, Ps. 62, 8: "With God is my salvation, my honor, the rock of my strength, my confidence is in God."

His works are without change and perfect.

(19) He speaks of the works of God, which God works in all believers' 1) hearts, and in all who fear and love God rightly. For when hearts are cleansed and sanctified by faith, there is no hypocrisy, but there is true perfect holiness and purity, and true holy worship, so that the heart rightly recognizes God, esteems Him great, fears and loves Him dearly, thanks Him for so many benefits, and calls upon Him in every need.

(20) And the works that God works in us, he holds against our own works, since by works invented by ourselves, or by our own dreams, we want to make God worship according to our own convenience, which he should please him with, but by which we turn away from God to foreign gods. As has been, monasticism, item, the masses, and the like under the papacy; these are not works without change, but hypocritical, imperfect, damned works.

'21. Further, he says, "All his ways are judgments." All the life and walk of believers is righteous, going according to GOD's command and word, according to the holy ten commandments, not in human dreams or discretion. Thus, GOD is faithful, just, righteous. He speaks all this of God in such a way that he indicates what God demands in the first commandment, because he wants us to respect and hold him as a faithful, just, benevolent God who means it paternally. For here he does not speak of a divine nature or essence, but speaks of what one should consider God to be, what one should think of Him in the heart, and what one should think of Him in the heart.

1) Thus Walch and the Wittenberg edition; Erlanger: allen gläubigen.

He wants to have touched the false gods and all idolatrous abominations with these words. As if he should say: Whoever truly serves God, namely, that he heartily trusts and fears him (as the first commandment says), is certain of all his things, does not build on himself nor on his works, but on God's word and promise, which cannot waver nor fail; there the heart is satisfied with God, there the conscience can be joyful and quiet. This is the right, highest, holiest service of God; there is no falsehood, no lies, nor hypocrisy, but the heart within is holy and pure through faith. Therefore, all other outward works and conduct are holy and pure to the pure.

22 Again, in all other services, however delicious they may seem, which are outside the first table, without faith and fear of God, with all kinds of outward acts, there is all uncertainty, all toil and labor, heartache and sorrow of conscience. There the hearts and consciences always remain in doubt, and can never come to rest; there the heart remains inwardly full of blindness, full of unbelief; therefore also the outward works, so that one wants to earn salvation, how holy they seem, are a vile abomination, vile filth and dung before God.

V. 5. the perverse and insane kind have corrupted him, and are not his children, because of their reproach.

(23) Moses prophesied here how it would be after his death, that they would easily fall away from God's commandment and commandments, despise the Ten Commandments, worship according to their own conceit, trample underfoot the first commandment, as all hypocrites do, and become a wicked, evil, adulterous people. Therefore, they will no longer be dear children nor God's people, even though they bear the name, but enemies of God and children of harlots, adulterers and adulteresses, because of the spiritual fornication they will commit [Ezek. 16, 26. f. 23, 5. 11. ff.]. So he says just before this song, in the 31st chapter, v. 29.: "I know that after my death ye shall destroy it, and go out of the way which I have commanded, then shall calamity befall you."

V. 6. Do you then give thanks to the Lord your God, you foolish and unwise people? Is he not your Father and your Lord? Has he not made you and prepared you?

24. Now here the high prophet Moses, looking at the unspeakable goodness and innumerable benefits of God, and on the other hand the great ingratitude and shameful contempt, is completely inflamed and says: Is this the thanks that God has adopted you as his own dear children, that he has snatched you out of the midst of death, led you out of Egypt, delivered you mightily from the hands of Pharaoh, made the Reed Sea stand before your eyes like walls, fed you with the bread of heaven in the wilderness 2c.? As if to say: For all this, that God is just, faithful, kind, and a gracious Father to all, that He chose you above all other nations, peoples and kingdoms on earth, for your sake drowned King Pharaoh, took the kingdoms of Canaan; item, that for so long you have lacked nothing, but like a father or mother her child, carried you on her hands, protected and sheltered you everywhere; you and your descendants will pay him with such fine thanks that you will esteem all kinds of idolatrous, foolish worship more highly than the first commandment of God, than the first tablet, where he demands that you take him for a god, build on him alone and trust in him. For you will become apostate sons of whores, who will be able to hope and trust in their own works, in idolatry, in the favor of men, in help, in comfort, in gold and silver; but not in God, whom you will easily regard, as if there were no help nor counsel with him, as if nothing at all were attached to him. Therefore you will not be sons of the Father, but a foolish, unwise people who will seek help when there is no help. This may well be said to us at this time of the gospel: Is this the thanksgiving that you have been delivered from the ministry and innumerable troubles? 2c.

V. 7. Remember the former days, take note of the years of the former times. Ask your father, he will tell you; your elders, they will tell you.

(25) Then he begins to count, as from a register, the benefits of God, beginning with the first, that God has chosen this people above all other nations, that God has done so many countless benefits to the people. Therefore he says, "Ask your father," that is, ask your fathers and your elders. As if he should say: If you look at Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, you will find innumerable benefits, how God loved your fathers, how faithfully he took care of them. Such a reminder is necessary for us. For Adam's children are like that, when a good deed is over, it is soon forgotten, as experience shows in our time.

V. 8 When the Most High divided the nations and scattered the children of men, he set the boundaries of the nations according to the number of the children of Israel.

The first blessing is that although God the Lord is one God of all nations, peoples and kingdoms on earth, all of which He created, He also divides to each people its borders and measure, as is written in the first book of Moses, Cap. 11, 8, 9, ff. 17, 26, 27, he did not choose a nation among all of them to establish his worship, to call himself God and Father of the house, but the nation of Israel. And it is truly an excellent, great blessing, praise and glory that the high majesty will not be preached, recognized, found or encountered anywhere but in Israel alone. And that among so many kingdoms and lands there should be no knowledge of God but in the people alone, and that he has separated all other kingdoms, lands and borders so that no other people on earth should be called God's people but as far as Israel dwells and their land reaches; all the others should be called godless Gentiles.

V. 9: For the Lord's portion is His people, Jacob is the cord of His inheritance.

That is, God's people do not go further than Jacob and Israel [Ps. 74:1, 2, 100:3]. With these words he wants to show how dear children, how holy, pleasant and chosen they are above all other nations.

V. 10 He found him in the wilderness, in the arid desert, howling. He felt him over and gave him understanding: he guarded him like the apple of his eye.

That is, he gave his law to the people on Mount Sinai, made a covenant with them that he would be their God; also led them so wonderfully for forty years in the wilderness, preserved and nourished them, delivered them from so many hardships, fears and dangers, so often gave them credit for their shameful unbelief, impatience and grumbling, so often forgave their sin and stubborn hardness. He guarded them like the apple of his eye, in spite of those who would harm them; he protected and preserved them from all evil, sorrow and misfortune through his angel, so that they had no lack of anything. Now this is the other, and an almost great blessing. Whoever among us also considers how God so wonderfully guides us from our youth, so graciously nourishes us, protects us from all evil like the apple of our eye, will also find how ungrateful we are.

V. 11: As an eagle wakes up its nest and soars over its young. He spread his wings and took him and carried him on his wings.

29 With the words he indicates how he tolerated and carried them in the desert. One says, and the nature heralds, as Plinius, Aristotle and others write, that various eagles are, but the best kind uses to beat its young ones with the wings, and to make them brave, that they learn to fly, also to hold against the sun shine, and which do not look immediately into the sun, throw them out of the nest, as a bad kind. So Moses wants to say: God, the Lord, has kept you under his wings, as in the nest, and taught you to fly, 1) as an eagle does its young; for he has both tried, with mercy and punishment, to bring you to learn to fly, that is, to trust and believe in him; as we have seen in the eighth chapter.

V. 12. The Lord alone guided him, and no foreign god was with him.

(30) That is, under Moses the right true worship was going on, where God Himself preached, spoke, and taught among them through Moses, where God Himself kept house, was near and among the people. The other Gentiles were left to walk in darkness in their erroneous ways. So now, when the Ten Commandments are preached and the Gospel taught, God Himself also teaches among us, greeting us kindly enough, if we could thank Him alone. Before, there was only false teaching and error. In addition, he also led the people outwardly himself, and gave them a great, strong, safe escort by public, divine signs, by day by a cloud, by night by a fiery pillar.

V.13. He made him go up on high on the earth, and etched him with the produce of the field, and made him sing honey out of the rocks, and oil out of the hard stones.

(31) The third good thing he shows is that God drove out the Gentiles and their kings from the land of Canaan for their sake, and made them dwell in a glorious, delightful, good land, where they had fullness and plenty of everything. But that he said: "He made them suck honey from the rocks and oil from the hard stones," he uses such figures to indicate that God had given them all kinds of rich blessings in crops, food and fruits in the lands; So that even where there were not good, moist meadows, where there were not fields or meadows, there nevertheless grew fig trees, oil trees, all kinds of other trees; there nevertheless was enough milk and honey, and all kinds of need; so also otherwise oil trees grow gladly where there is dry land, and bees make honey, where there is not good land, but sandy, dry land.

V. 14 Butter from the cows, and milk from the sheep, with fat from the lambs. And fat rams, and goats with fat kidneys, and wheat, and watered him with the blood of grapes.

32] There he uses poetic, flowery words, as is customary in songs and hymns, and wants to indicate that they are connected with all kinds of bodily

1) Wittenberg and Erlanger: learned.

2) There can hardly be any doubt that this statement refers to z 30 ff. of the previous scripture. From this it would follow that our interpretation would have to be set later than 1529. This assumption is made certain by what is said in § SO of this chapter.

God abundantly provided us with food and bodily blessings, livestock, fruit, butter, lambs, sheep, and fat rams.

From this we are to learn that God also gives such gifts of the flesh, and if He does not give them, no amount of work, diligence, carts or shepherds, diligent stewardship, care or toil will help. What nobleman or farmer thinks that he has such gifts from God, or that God in the first line of the Ten Commandments, when He says, "I am your God," demands that all the same goods be asked of Him and maintained, or that without Him no one can have or keep them? But here he calls "grape blood" wine, that in the same countries much, and the several part of red wine grows.

V. 15: When he became fat and full, he became horny. You became fat, and thick, and slippery. And he hath forsaken the God that made him; he hath despised the rock of his salvation.

34 That is, God, who delivered you from the hand of Pharaoh the king, who showed you so innumerable good things, you have forgotten, and just by this you have forgotten that it was well with you.

(35) It is a wicked, poisonous kind of human heart that it becomes angry through divine benefits, through happiness and good days, and the more God graces it, and the greater, more excellent gifts God gives it, whether physical or spiritual, the less it humbles itself against God, the less it fears, the more secure it becomes, the sooner it forgets God and His word, the sooner it trusts and builds on itself, and wants to be God itself. Therefore Moses warns in this book at the 6th chapter, v. 10-12. He says: "When you have great and fine cities that you have not built, and houses full of good things that you have not filled, and wells that you have not dug, and vineyards and oliveyards that you have not planted, so that you may eat and be satisfied, then beware lest you forget the Lord who brought you out of Egypt. Item, in the 8th chapter, v. 7, 8, 10, 11: "The LORD your God leads you into a good land, a land where streams, wells and deeps are within, which flow by the mountains and in the meadows; a land where wheat, barley, Vines, fig trees and pomegranates are inside; a land where oil trees and honey are inside 2c. Take heed therefore that thou forget not the LORD thy God." And so the heathen also have said that it is easier to bear misfortune than not to abuse good fortune and good days; and they all testify that no such wise man has ever been found who has not been more fortunate. But isn't it a shameful plague that God should be responsible for all His innumerable benefits?

V. 16: And hath provoked him to zeal by strangers, by abominations hath he provoked him to anger.

They have fulfilled this, unfortunately, too much. For when they should have been thankful for so many bodily and spiritual benefits, they turned away from God to strange gods, sinned without ceasing against the first table with all kinds of abominations and idolatries, provoked God the Lord to zeal and anger, paid him for his benefits with vain disobedience and ingratitude; as the histories of the judges and the books of the kings indicate. For such are the fine fruits of Adam's children: If God keeps them meager, or makes them suffer poverty, they grumble against Him, as the Israelites also did, when they said, when they lacked water, "Is God among us, or not?" [If he gives enough, they will be sure and proud, despising and forgetting God.

(37) Therefore, to hold fast to God the Lord, and to trust in Him heartily (for better or for worse), is the highest holiness, the highest art and wisdom, the noblest worship on earth. And even if the hypocrites have been dealing with other worship services for a long time, the first line in the Ten Commandments always comes and says: "I am your God", you hypocrite, you holy Baalite, you holy Papist, you never believed a tittle of it.

V.17. They sacrificed to the devils of the field and not to their God, to the gods they did not know, to the new ones who came recently, whom your fathers did not honor.

038 That is, all kinds of idolatry of the heathen, as Baal, Ashtarothe, Moloch, Chamos, Camarim 2c., and set up all kinds of worship, on the mountains and heights, in the forests and groves, of which nothing was commanded in the law, of which their fathers knew nothing, which they had invented and invented for themselves, because they followed their conceit and thoughts, about which afterwards all true prophets complain vehemently. This is what we did with the monasteries and the papist mass.

V. 18. Your rock that gave you birth you have left out of account, and you have forgotten God who made you.

(39) Moses speaks these words out of great, mighty earnestness and out of a heart that is inflamed with divine zeal to save God's glory against the devil's lies. As 1) he should say: "Oh, my heart would break for sorrow that I know, and now I see before my eyes, how you will so easily abandon and so shamefully despise the true living God, the great, certain consolation, the most solid fortress and strongest rock in all temptations and hardships, without which you could not live or remain a moment before the devil, who gave birth to and raised you alone, like a mother to her child. Yes, that you will so shamefully forget the dear, hearty Father (who so fatherly means you, so graciously protects you from the devil and all evil, and so abundantly showers you with all kinds of graces and goods), and instead cling to hopeless, dead idols, and devise all kinds of idolatry and idols, which can neither advise you nor help, comfort, protect, nor save you: that is worth lamenting.

V.19. And when the Lord saw it, he was moved with anger against his sons and his daughters.

(40) Then he indicates that the wrath should be all the more swift and fierce, because such dear sons and daughters forget the faithful father.

V. 20. And he said: I will hide my face from them, will see where it will go out with them at last. For it is a perverse kind, they are children, there is no faith in them.

41. that he says: "I will hide my face from them", he speaks in the person of God; that is, I will blind them, so that they shall not see with seeing eyes 2c. [Isa. 6, 10.], that they shall die and perish in vain blindness and error, without God and God's knowledge, seeking God with their works and services, and yet not finding Him. For to see God's face is called in the Scriptures: To know God, to see and notice His will and works. Thus the 80th Psalm, v. 20, says: "Lord, show us your face, and we shall be helped." Again, God's face is hidden from those who are blinded, so that they do not recognize God or His work.

But "children", "since there is no faith in them", he calls such hypocrites, who pretend to be holy and pious with all kinds of outward works, and yet neither know nor want to keep the highest, holiest service of God (which is required by the first commandment); they think that they are the dear children, if they are damned bastards, and God's worst enemies.

V. 21 They have provoked me to anger against that which is not God; they have provoked me to anger with their vanity. And I will provoke them again against that which is not a people, against a foolish people will I provoke them.

(43) That is, as they in the wilderness received another God, which was not grievous unto me; so will I again reject them, and receive another people, which shall also be grievous enough unto them. As Paul tells the Romans in chapter 11, v. 11 ff., the Gentiles were accepted through the gospel. Therefore also at this day the Jews are most bitterly and fiercely angry with us, that we say they are never God's people, but we are God's people; as this verse says.

V.22. For the fire is kindled by my wrath, and shall burn unto the lowest hell, and shall devour the land with her increase, and shall set on fire the foundations of the mountains.

(44) Fire is called here not only a bodily fire, but all the terrible, dreadful desolation that was done by the sword and by fire, when the king of Babylon, and the end of Babylon, and the end of Babylon, and the end of Babylon, and the end of Babylon, and the end of Babylon, and the end of Babylon.

The Romans have so miserably destroyed, destroyed and devastated Jerusalem that in the whole country, and especially in Jerusalem, not one stone has been left upon another, that all the precious buildings have been turned into a heap of stones and ashes [Jer. 52, 13. ff. Luc. 19, 44.] And this is what he indicates when he says, "and shall burn unto the lowest hell," that is, in the whole land there shall not be left any building or plant, but even the bare ground and the mountains shall burn, as if the fire would eat through the earth into the lowest hell; for so it goes when desolation comes.

V. 23. I will heap [all] calamity upon them; I will shoot all my arrows at them.

The same misfortune is described and told as in a register in the fifth book of Moses at the 28th chapter, v. 16. ff., and Moses himself describes in the next verse also the arrows, and the same misfortune.

V. 24. They shall faint with hunger, and be consumed with fever and with bitter pestilence. I will send the teeth of beasts among them, and raging serpents.

(46) There he mentions three or four arrows, famine, fever, pestilence, wild beasts; and in the next verse he puts war and bloodshed; and these plagues are afterward often referred to in the prophets. To this he says "raging serpents." These are the right whisks and sharp rods with which our Lord God has executed many a great, secure, proud bogeyman 1) and despiser. And when he starts it, it is quite horrible. It does not help that woman and child miserably weep and wail, lament and scream. This is what the citizens and peasants (who now despise God's word, preachers and priests, and say: The priests can do nothing but preach the Ten Commandments) want to experience.

V. 25. From without the sword shall rob them, and in the chambers terror. Both, youths and virgins, the babes with the gray man.

That is, war and disaster will come upon them, and they will be filled with pusillanimity, terror and dismayed, frightened minds.

1) "Uä ein Uebermüthigen, Frevler.

V. 26. I will say, Where are they? I will lift up their memory among men.

(48) That is, I will bring down their kingdom and priesthood to the ground, I will destroy them [Hab. 3:6 ff], I will destroy the chief city Jerusalem, the temple, and the ceremonies, all in a heap; and where before there was royal rule, and all manner of good order, and sacrifices, and glorious feasts, there shall be desolation and silence; and every man shall say, Where is the kingdom of the Jews? Where is their priesthood? Where are their glorious feasts and sacrifices? All this has come true, as Jeremiah the prophet mourns and laments [Klagl. 1, 12]. So there is also the experience to this day, that although there is still a handful of Jews, yet their government and all their worship are torn to pieces, that they have neither their own kingdom nor priesthood, as other nations.

And their memory is preserved among the people.

49 That is, they are everywhere despised, poor people, who have neither name nor reputation anymore, that they are something or are able, but are vain footcloths compared to the fact that they floated above before and were the head.

50) That God is able and able to do this, namely, to make a whole, great, glorious being, as a whole kingdom's splendor and name, desolate, desolate, and quiet in a hurry, of this he boasts in the first commandment, when he says: "I am God," 2c. but one does not believe it. The pope and the papists would not have thought fifteen or sixteen years ago, 2) that so many great monasteries and convents, since their services were so glorious, should become desolate because of their abominations. But God's judgment and work are before us.

V. 27. If I did not give the wrath of the enemies, lest their enemies should be proud, and say, Our hand is high, and the LORD hath not done these things.

2) Compare the note to § 29 of this chapter. By this statement it becomes certain that our interpretation is to be put into the year 1530 or later.

051 For this cause saith he; because he hath often provoked his wrath, and hath redeemed the wicked, and delivered them from their enemies. He did this for his name's sake, so that his name would not be blasphemed by the surrounding nations. Therefore, with this verse he raises the glory and pride of the Jews, because they might want to say: "We have not been as wicked as Moses sings, for God has often delivered us by miraculous signs. He answers them and says: "It was not because of your merit, for you would have deserved the above-mentioned punishment at all times; but if I had accepted you as a people, I had to spare my name, even if you were desperate, unbelieving boys. But I will not look on nor spare you forever, but your end shall come at last, as you have deserved.

V.28. For there is a people where there is no counsel within, and there is no understanding in them.

That is, they know neither God nor His works; they boast that I am their God, and do not know Me; in their blindness they walk securely with their hypocrisy, and without ceasing do all kinds of idolatry against the first, highest commandment; they are presumptuous and secure, wanting to think that they are dear children, and that their cause is well with Me, when My fierce wrath shall soon be poured out upon them. That is why they do not even think of converting or reforming.

V. 29. Oh that they would be wise, and understand these things, that they might know what is to come after them.

(53) As if to say: I have preached to them for so long, now I have admonished them enough that they should fear and love the one God alone, and trust in Him and not depart from Him (as the first commandment reads). The prophets after this time will also do nothing else, but that the fear of God and faith in God is the highest service of God. If God wanted such sermons to be preached, they would then become wise, not despise it, and realize that their death and life, their prosperity and destruction, their blessedness and damnation, are all concerned with it.

54. but I know they will be safe and idolatry; And as they have caused me much heartache in the wilderness, so they will let the future prophets also preach to the wind, nevertheless running after their idolatries, until Sennacherib and Salmanasser, item, Nebucad Nezar, the king of Babylon, come, and finally the Romans, and teach 1) them to understand the ten commandments, namely, that God is a zealous, strong God, who finally does not let unbelief and godlessness go unpunished. Thus Solomon also says in Proverbs, chapter 1, v. 20. 24. ff: "God's wisdom is heard in the streets. She stretches out her hand, and no one pays attention to it. So also will I laugh (says God) in your calamity, and mock you when there cometh that ye fear; when upon you cometh as a storm that ye fear, and your calamity as a weather, when upon you cometh fear and trouble." Thus, when the Lord Christ looked upon the city of Jerusalem with compassion, and wept over her [Luc. 19:41]. Since he himself, and afterwards also the apostles, exhorted the Jewish people to reform, and warned them of their great accident, there were very few wise men who took it to heart, no one had any regard for what would follow after 2) their preaching or heartfelt lamentations and weeping; but after a short time they experienced it all too strongly.

V. 30: How is it that one shall chase a thousand of them, and two shall make ten thousand to flee? Is it not so that she has sold her rock, and the Lord has delivered her up?

That is, when the punishment comes, their heart and courage will be gone; they will not only hear the words of the prophets, but they will know by the work that it is over with them, that God has forsaken them. And so it happened when the king of Babylon attacked them like a terrible weather, when the Romans destroyed Jerusalem, when one Gentile frightened a thousand Jews and put them to flight, and when there was nothing on the Jews' side but trembling, fear, trembling, and despair, but before that, when God was still with them. One Jew frightened a thousand Gentiles, and all blessed victory was on their side [Deut. 26:7, 8]. So, [to].

1) Wittenberger and Erlanger: learn.
2) Erlanger: still.

At this time, one will not believe what a strong power God's assistance is until he removes his hand and lets us try what strength, ability, heart or courage we have of ourselves.

V. 31 For our rock is not like their rock, for our enemies themselves are judges.

56 That is, when your God, your great, certain, strong protection, stood by you, you did well; when a king of the Gentiles was as a fly to you, it was the same to meet the enemies with great or small armor, for God was with you, who has not only horse and man, but also all the hearts and minds of the enemies in his hand.

Because our rock is not like their rock.

57 That is, we have a different Lord and God than the Gentiles. The heathen have idols of silver and gold, have much riches and power; but our God has it all in his hand, and can no man overthrow a sword, neither look upon you with anger, nor have an evil thought in his mind.

(58) The nations themselves have confessed that no one could harm or break the people of Israel by force or power as long as their God was with them. Therefore Balaam also gave counsel to King Moab that he should first provoke the people to sin, so that their God would let them go, and so that he would prevail [Deut. 31:16]. So Balaam is one of the witnesses who must testify that Israel's God is a strong rock and an unconquerable God. So also the Egyptians are witnesses, who said in the 14th chapter of the 2nd book of Moses, v. 25: "Let us flee [from] Israel, for God is fighting for them." So also the Philistines are witnesses, in the first book Samuelis at the 5th chapter, v. 7. Therefore no gods have kept so hard with their people, or proved their power, as the true, living GOD in Israel. So he says here above in the 3rd chapter, v. 22: "Do not be afraid of them, for the LORD your God fights for you."

V. 32 For their vine is of the vine of Sodom, and of the field of Gomorrah. Their berry is a bilberry; they have bitter grapes.

(59) That is, they should be a pleasant vineyard, which God Himself has planted, in which there would be many fruitful vines according to all pleasure [Hos. 10:1]. They should be a fine, God-fearing, thankful people, with many, many faithful, pious children among them, who would love God's word with all their heart, bring other people to it, and bear much fruit: there are vain thistles and thorns, vain wild grapes, vain misgrowth, rotten, spoiled berries, and vain such fine little fruits as Sodoma and Gomorrah. If there should be found among them vain delicious, pure, strong must and good wine: then it is vain lurking, 1) yea, vain poison and gall, all manner of false doctrine, and even fancied, idolatrous worship. So the other prophets have taken such a likeness from Moses; as when Isaiah says in the 5th chapter, v. 2, "He waited for his vineyard to bring forth grapes, but it brought forth wild grapes." And the 80th Psalm, v. 14, also compares the whole nation to a vineyard, which the wild sows ravage 2c. These fierce, harsh words he speaks out of quite heated zeal and great earnestness, against false doctrine and false worship.

V. 33: Their wine is the fury of dragons and the gall of fierce vipers.

(60) He gives this fine title (since he calls it dragon's fury, poison and gall out of great, fierce anger and zeal) to their false doctrine, by which all kinds of abominable error were introduced, and the right doctrine of faith of the true prophets was suppressed. For there is no more harmful and evil poison under the sun than false teaching, which does murderous and unspeakable harm, and leads people away from God without ceasing, to vile abomination and vile blasphemy.

61. Such poison and gall was the worship of Baal in the days of Elijah the prophet [1 Kings 18:26]. Such poison and gall was also the calves of Samaria, and all the worship of the high places 2c. [1 Kings 12:28, 32.] Still the people, the kings and princes hung den-

1) In the original and in the Wittenberg correctly: "laur", which Walch and the Erlanger have changed into "saur". "Lauer" is bad wine. See Vol. XX, 2396 of our edition s. v. Lauer.

2) Thus the Wittenbergers. Erlanger: mörderlich unsäglich.

They listened to the false prophets, persecuted and strangled the pious prophets [2 Chron. 18, 17. ff]. Such poison has been under the papacy so many innumerable, godless teachings: the doctrine of the mass and of the opere operato, of purgatory, of monastic vows, of the celibate state 2c., which has done terrible and unspeakable harm; nor is all this praised by the devil and his apostles as holy sacrifice, holy, godly devotion and worship, as the Holy Spirit through Moses calls harmful poison and gall; and Paul the apostle also says [1 Tim. 4, 1. 2 Tim. 2, 26.] that such false teaching is devilish teaching, and eats away at it like cancer.

V. 34. Is not this hidden with me and sealed in my treasures?

(62) That is, do not think that I am a god like Baal, who does not see nor hear, from whom you can finally cover or hide yourselves. I know and see all your abominations, all your ways and works that you do; but for my name's sake I spare you, but it shall be borrowed from you, not given. Even though you do not see out of blindness and certainty what kind of punishment has been decreed for you in heaven, and how the first commandment should and must remain true, I have hidden all the records of your abominations, your ingratitude, your contempt with me, and no one may take it into his mind that a despiser or godless person should remain unpunished.

(63) This is said against safety, that they should not think, because God gives them money, goods, fields and meadows, that they are therefore well with God, and that all things are good; for he also gives bodily goods to the heathen; but that they should consider what punishment they have earned, how the first commandment should remain true, so that it cannot be false, since God the Lord is concerned about his divine majesty, honor, praise, and all of deity. For no one should think that he has a gracious God when he gives him bodily goods, house, farm, wife, child, fields, meadows; for the 37th Psalm, v. 20, 35, and all Scripture say that the wicked are richest and happiest in the world.

If there is a blessing, look first at what God has in the secret register.

64 But no godless man can do this, but go along in vain blindness and security. So now and nobility, peasants and burghers 2c., that they are relieved of many burdens, the indulgence, the ban, the money fairs, the stationers, the mendicant monks 2c., by which, through the spiritual salvation of their consciences, they annually receive noticeably more of their food, thereby retaining many a florin; they think, if God increases their bodily food, that they have a gracious God; they go in vain security, now also utterly despise God's word and the preachers who faithfully mean it; but they do not know what God has in the register, and that he will spare such sin terrible punishment until his time.

V. 35. Vengeance is mine, I will repay. In his time shall her foot slide; for the time of her accident is at hand, and her future hasteth on.

In this word, which God says here through Moses, "vengeance is mine", the first commandment is praised again, that it should remain true, and no wicked person should escape vengeance or punishment. Thus, according to these words of Moses, the 94th Psalm, v. 1-3: "O Lord God, who is vengeance, God, who is vengeance, appear. Arise, thou judge of the earth, how long shall the wicked defy?" "Mine (says he) is vengeance"; as if he should say: Though I spare for a time, and bring up punishment for my name's sake, yet your abomination shall not go unpunished; Though ye now dwell in a good land, and have fields, and meadows, and vineyards, and all manner of fruits in abundance, and so walk as in a mummery or a larva, as though ye were dear children of God, yet vengeance is mine, and mine hand, when it shall go, no man shall withstand it; when ye are most secure, then will I let myself be seen, that my name be LORD.

66 And so it happened to them: The punishment was delayed until the hour came when the Romans played havoc with them, and all at once sought them home, as they had long before deserved. And so their foot slipped, so that now they have neither Kingdom nor priesthood. And so you see that Moses prophesies that one day the people with kingdom and priesthood shall have an end. The good fellows who now so shamefully despise the gospel and misuse it will also learn that God's vengeance is upon them.

V.36. For the LORD will judge his people, and he will repent of his servants. For he will see that their strength is gone, and is finished, even with him that was shut up and left.

67 That is, in this matter, since it concerns his honor, he will not spare even his own people, and will not consider the glorious name and glory that they are called Israel, that they are called God's people and God's inheritance, that they are called dear children, but the first commandment's sentence, which is called: "He seeks at home the iniquity of the fathers against the children" 2c. will strike them. And there shall be no help for it. But he will be merciful, as the other part of the first commandment says, and will show mercy, without regard to person, to those who fear and love him with all their hearts and keep his commandments. And here Moses prophesies that the rest of the small group of Israel who turn to Christ will be preserved. Otherwise it is said [v. 36]: "Their power shall be utterly consumed, even with him that was secretly shut up and left," that is, little or nothing shall remain of the kingdom of Israel, and finally of the whole people; they shall all be scattered among the Gentiles in mourning and misery.

V. 37. And they will say, Where are their gods? Their rock in which they trusted?

(68) With all the wicked and such hypocrites who pretend to holiness and worship, without the fear of God and faith, without the highest worship of the first table, God finally allows their own consciences to contradict and mock them, so that they think in their great anguish, "Oh, where are we now? O where is our God now? For, while things are going well, all hypocrites are quite secure, think they are very well with God, think nothing else, that it is because they are so holy that they are so well; but when adversity comes, they become despondent, and

Their own hearts and consciences say to them, "What good are our good works, our labor and our toil? [Weish. 5, 6. 7. ff.]

It is true that the devil would like to speak such bitter words into the hearts of true Christians and believers: Where is your God now? as the 42nd Psalm, v. 4, indicates. But the true God holds firm over His first commandment, and when it comes to the highest, or to the right moves and needs, He finally does not remain outside. He soon says how silent he is: Here I am; and the longer he consumes, the richer he comforts. But false, idolatrous consolation remains outside, and the false gods let their worshippers float and sink. Only then do they see and realize what they have been in their security, what they have believed, what a fine god they have. This is what he means: "They will say, Where are your gods?"

V. 38. From which sacrifice they ate fat, and drank the wine of their libation. Let them arise and help you, and protect you.

They make themselves believe that they are very holy and do not eat sacrifices to idols, but their sacrifices are pleasing to the true, right God. Thus the papists have done with the great abuse of the masses. Thus the Turk, who sets his Mahomet above and beside Christ, boasts that he also serves God and has great worship among his people; but because he does not recognize Christ and does not believe in the true God, all his worship is an abomination, and it will also be said to him, "Where are their gods? Where is their Mahomet? And next, since he was situated before Vienna in Austria, 1) it may well be said, since sixty or eighty thousand people have died of the pestilence, and since such despondency has come to his people that he has had to depart and publicly see and experience the hand and power of the true, living God and our Savior Jesus Christ.

V. 39. See now that I am I, and there is no God beside me. I can kill, and make alive; that which I have broken, that

1) Compare in the previous interpretation Cap. 7,? 54. There it says: "a few days ago"; here: "next", that is, in recently past time:

I can heal it, and there is no one to deliver it from my hand.

This is the way of the wicked and all hypocrites, that they pretend to holiness with many outward services, as if they were greatly concerned about God, and yet they live in all security, despising all of God's commandments, especially the first commandment, as if there were no God, as if the ten commandments were a dream [Titus 1:16]. Therefore, if God, the Lord, is to preserve His divinity, He must finally let them find and experience it through experience, otherwise they will always say, as the Psalm says in the person of the wicked, "Should God know anything about this? [Therefore he must prove by experience that he is God, so that the despisers must finally confess that he still lives and reigns, when they have despised him for a long time.

V. 40. For I will lift up my hand to heaven, and will say, I live forever.

This is a strong affirmation, since God the Lord swears by Himself that the first tablet and the first commandment shall remain true. And this oath, since God swears by Himself, if He has no one greater over Him, is expressed here for the comfort of the faithful and true Israelites, and for the terror of the despisers and the wicked. For this strong oath, and such glorious defiance and glory, indicates that God alone has a certain, eternal, infinite life and infinite power and authority. All our life and being, doings and fortunes are uncertain, transient. Now here God's eternal power, which no one can hinder, is praised, as it is said: to judge, to praise, to avenge; the three R's belong to God alone; we are not to subject anything to ourselves, nor to praise anything of ourselves. So the 2nd Psalm, v. 12. says: "GOD's is the power."

V. 41. When I shall sharpen the lightning of my sword, and my hand shall attack judgment, I will again avenge myself on my enemies, and repay those who hate me.

73This is the word that is written in the first commandment, that I, God, seek at home the iniquity of the fathers against the children, in the third commandment.

and fourth generation 2c. I will make and keep a reminder, not only to you, my people Israel, but in all the kingdoms of the Gentiles; and I need the very words of the first commandment, "To those who hate me" 2c.

(74) By saying, "The lightning of my sword," he means that God's punishment and vengeance will be great and terrible, which will strike and pierce all the wicked, all the despisers of God's commandments, whether Jews or Gentiles, when the hour comes, like lightning and a strong, sudden thunderclap, which cannot be stopped, which cannot be resisted.

V. 42. I will make my arrows drunk with blood, and my sword shall devour flesh, over the blood of the slain, and over the prison, and the enemy's head shall be bared.

75. I will make my punishment and cruel vengeance in such a way that, even though I have raised up wrath, it will be completely pitiful in the end. But that Moses says in the person of God: "My arrows shall be full of blood", "my sword shall devour flesh", he speaks in the Hebrew language. [But he says, "When the wrath comes, I will suddenly give place to their worst enemies, and I will bring war and sorrow and calamity upon them like a great and strong river, and I will cause a bloodshed, and there shall be no mercy nor rest.

(76) These things also, verily, happened unto the Jews, when the king of Babylon, Nebuchadnezzar, and after him 1) the Romans, laid waste the city of Jerusalem, that, as Josephus wrote, eleven times an hundred thousand were left dead by famine and by the sword. But that he says, "The head of the enemy shall be stripped," that is, my disobedient people, my enemies, shall be deprived of their kingdom, [there] shall be an end of all things with them. In our time, we also see publicly that God, by all kinds of signs, is threatening his wrath with the most terrible enemy, the Turk; thus, unfortunately, he has shed much Christian blood; but there are few who went to meet the divine wrath with earnest prayer.

1) In the original and in the Erlanger: "da ernach"; Wittenberger: "da hernach".

V.43. Rejoice, O nations, with his people; for he will avenge the blood of his servants, and will avenge himself on his enemies, and will make atonement for the land of his people.

That is, though he will punish his people severely for their sin, yet you Gentiles will still rejoice with his people, and will be made partakers of the rich grace, blessing and promise. For there will still be a remnant that is rightly Israel, rightly God-fearing and faithful, as the prophets, apostles and their disciples, in whom he will nevertheless (when such a great storm and weather of such terrible wrath is over) fulfill all the blessed promise of grace, and through them make holy Abraham's seed and children out of the stones, that is, out of the idolatrous Gentiles [Matt. 3:9].

78. "And will avenge the blood of his servants," that is, the blood of all the pious prophets, and after them the apostles, and all the innocent blood that this people will shed manifold to maintain their false, idolatrous worship, God will avenge terribly, from Planer's blood to the last innocent drop of blood that will be shed. And yet "will be gracious to the land of his people", that is, to the rest of the Israelites who will believe. To him God will raise up a new and everlasting kingdom on the throne of David and in the house of Israel, which will have no end, since the Lord and King will be the Lord Christ, which is now revealed through the gospel, to whom be praise and glory forever and ever, amen.

End of the song Moses.

V. Interpretations on the Second Book of

From the last words of David, 2 Sam. 23, 1-7. *)

1543.

Preface.**)

1 St. Jerome writes that he was moved to reinterpret the Biblia from Hebrew into Latin, that the enemies of Christ, the Jews, mock us Christians, as if they had

we do not have the correct Biblia, which was then in use throughout Christendom, because it lacked some words and letters that would be much different in Hebrew; which

*) In his second great writing Against the Jews, "From the Appearance of Camphoras," Luther says that the best translators of the Bible have allowed themselves to be influenced too much by the rabbis, and thus lacked the analogy of faith. Then he continues (Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. XX, 2107, F 190): "For I myself have followed their translation about too much, that I must recant, especially 2 Sam. 23 in vsrdis novissimis Duvii, as I will soon do." Luther fulfilled this promise immediately. Still in 1543, our writing was published in Wittenberg by Nickel Schirlentz under the title: "Von den Letzten Worten Davids. D. Wart. Luther." In it, Luther shows in the most glorious way that only those can have the right understanding of the Holy Scriptures who look at them in the light of the New Testament, that is, in the faith in the only Son of God, Jesus Christ, D. Caspar Cruciger translated our writing into Latin. During this work he fell ill, but nevertheless completed it on November 15, 1549, and died the next day. (IVitt. [1549s, Dorn. III, col. 130 d.] LI. Georg Rörer first included it in the third volume of the Wittenberg Latin edition published in 1549, but then it also came out separately under the title: Ds novissimis vsrkis Davittis Oorninsntutio pia st sunota, Martini Dntüsi wüsolo^ins Doctori", (isrinuniss sxploata ak antors, st in Datinnm ssrionsrn onovrsu, stnrlio st ttiliMntia Osspuris OrnoiMri, D. The Latin translation is found in the Latin Wittenberger (1549), Dorn. III, col. 911>. We give the text according to the Erlanger, which follows the first edition, comparing the Wittenberger, the Jenaer and the Latin.

before also moved others more, as, Aquila, Theodotus, Origen 2c., until that one had at the time with sixfold interpretations, which they called Hexapla. So now, in our time, there is also so much interpreting, that perhaps in time (as happened then) so many bibles will come, so many masters will be in the Hebrew language, that there will be no end.

2. And this must also happen in the end, if one wants to turn to what the Jews say or judge about our Bible, who are not one among themselves, so stretching and tearing the Bible with their grammar that one can certainly (where one should follow them) never come to a unified Bible, because each rabbi wants to be better than the other; They must also all confess that in some places they do not understand the words, much less have a pure, certain Hebrew Bible, without any deficiency, even to speak according to the grammatica, let alone the theology, in which they are nevertheless to nothing at all.

(3) Therefore such mockery of the Jews does not concern me, and for the sake of their judgment I did not want to know one letter in the Hebrew language. The reason is this: We Christians have the sense and understanding of the Bible, because we have the New Testament, that is, Jesus Christ, who promised in the Old Testament, and who came afterwards, bringing with him the light and understanding of the Scriptures; as he says John 5:46: "Moses wrote of me; if ye believed Moses, ye would believe me also." Item, Luc. 24, 44. 45.: "It must be fulfilled, what is written of me in the law, prophets and psalms. And opened their minds, that they might understand the scriptures."

For there it is, there it lies, there it remains: Whoever does not have this man, who is called Jesus Christ, Son of God, whom we Christians preach, right and pure, nor wants to have him, let him leave the Bible alone, that is my advice, he will certainly be offended, and the more he studies, the more blind and foolish he becomes, whether he is a Jew, a Tartar, a Turk, a Christian, or however he wants to boast. Behold, what did the heretics Arianis, Manichaeis, Pelagianis 1) and countless others lack among us Christians? What did the pope lack? Have

1) Erlanger: Pelagianus.

Did they not have the certain, bright, powerful words of the New Testament? What is lacking in our rotten ones at this time? Do they not have the New Testament clear and certain enough? If the New Testament were to be translated according to any such mad devil's head, how many New Testaments would we have to have?

(5) Now, if it should be wished and chosen, either that I should have St. Augustine and the dear fathers, that is, the apostles' understanding in the Scriptures, with the defect that St. Augustine sometimes does not have the right letters or words in the Hebrew, as the Jews mock; or if the Jews should have certain letters and words (which they nevertheless do not have through and through, everywhere) without St. Augustine and the fathers' understanding, that is, with the Jews' understanding, it is well to reckon what I would choose. I let the Jews go to the devil with their understanding and letters, and lead to heaven with St. Augustine's understanding, without their letters. For although Augustine cannot, as the Jews do, say Kikajon, since he says cucurbita, Jonā 4, 6. item, cannot say veniet Hemdath, since he says veniet Desideratus, Hagg. 2, 8. and the like, his faith does not break the neck nor the leg, because he knows the right man, who is called Way, Truth and Life, of whom the prophets prophesy and testify; as said.

6 Again, the Jews, because they do not accept this Christ, cannot know nor understand what Moses, the prophets and psalms say, what right faith is, what the ten commandments want, what the examples and histories teach and give, but the Scriptures must be to them (according to Isaiah 29:12). Prophecy) as a letter to one who cannot read, who sees the letters very well, but does not know what they give, as the German proverb says: A white field, in it is black seed, many a man passes by who does not know what is there. But he who is able and ready to read runs over, grasps the meaning, regardless of whether he does not actually look at some letters or words. Before the other one spells a word, he has read the whole letter. Thus, a musician has sung a song before the other searches and finds whether it is a sol or fa in the clave.

7 Look at the fine man Lyra, who is a good Hebrew and faithful Christian, how he does such good work, where he goes against the Jewish mind, according to the New Testament. But where he otherwise follows his Rabbi Solomon, how coldly and lazily he goes off, that it has neither hands nor feet; whether he certainly has the words and letters, nor is he even better and purer than they all, both old and new Hebrews, who follow the rabbis too much. Truly, one must not make diligence with interpreting and glossing, as one brings the Rabbis' and grammarians' understanding among us Christians; without that, it sticks to itself all too readily, like pitch and glue, even if one wants to beware of it deliberately. For the letters and examples of the others blind the eyes, that one sometimes lets the sense of Christ go, where it should not be, so that the Jewish mind creeps in unawares, as has happened to all interpreters, none excepted, not even me.

8. summa, if we do not turn our diligence to draw the Hebrew Bible, wherever it will suffer, to the understanding of the New Testament, against the mind of the rabbis, it would have been better to remain with the old interpretation (which has the best and most out of it, through the New Testament), than that one should have so much interpretation (for the sake of a few others, which should be different, or still uninterpreted), 1) which misleads the reader's memory, and hinders his study, and makes it more uncertain than before.

(9) Therefore I have taken upon me for an example to interpret the last words of David, not as they are translated, when I followed all the others, lest I should be wise alone; but now I will be self-willed, and follow none but my spirit. Whoever does not like it, let it go. It is not the first time that I write what others do not like, I am well used to it (praise God). For I, in turn, do not put up with everything that others write. Let each one see how he builds on the foundation, gold or wood, silver or hay, precious stones or straw. The day of the Lord will reveal it (1 Cor. 3:12, 13).

1) This parenthesis translates Cruciger: proptsr pauos. yuasäm loea, ubi ant Hbraiva Isotio niia sst, and quorunäum voeum lutsprstatio nonärnu esrtu öst.

Interpretation of David's last words, 2 Sam. 23:1-7.)

V. 1. These are the last words of David.

1 He means such last words, on which he wants to die and go away, as one says: Thereby I will leave it and remain forever. For these are not the last words of his life or regiment, but his last will and testament, which we Germans call "Seelrecht" (right of the soul), on which a man wants to die, so that it will happen and remain after his death. Ultima voluntas is what the lawyers call it; a person can live for a long time, talk a lot, do a lot and suffer a lot, but his will and last will always remain firm. So these are also David's last words, that is, his soul's testament, even though he may have spoken, done and suffered much after that; as follows in the text, when he had the people counted and was punished for it, appointed his son as king, built the temple on the foundations of the city.

to build the mountain Moriah, also took a young maiden, Abishag, a 2) Sunamite woman, as his wife, who was supposed to warm him, because none of the other wives were allowed to him after they had been violated by Absalom 2c. [1 Kings 1:3.]

David the son of Jesse spoke.

(2) How humbly he looks on; he does not boast of his circumcision, nor of his holiness, nor of his kingdom, but badly, "The son of Jesse"; he is not ashamed of his lowly lineage, that he was a shepherd; yes, that is much more, he confesses his birth, when he came here full of sins, and worthy of death.

2) The words: "Abisag, eine" are missing in the Wittenberg, in the Jena and in Walch. Also in Latin the name Abisag is missing.

as all men are. For he will speak of other things so high, that no nobility nor holiness shall avail, and no misery, neither sin nor death, shall hurt.

The man assured of the Messiah of God Jacob spoke sweetly with Psalms Israel.

(3) Then he goes forth, and boasts exceedingly, but with truth, without all haughtiness. Here David is another man than Jesse's son. This he has not inherited from his birth, nor learned from his father, nor gained by his royal power or wisdom. It was given to him from above, without any merit on his part, so he is happy, praises and gives thanks so heartily. What is it then that he praises? First of all, it is that I am the man to whom God has promised the Messiah of the God of Jacob; that he will come from me, from my blood, tribe and house, I am sure and certain. Not only because God has promised it to me, who is certain and firm in His words and will certainly not lie to me, but also because I firmly believe it, stand firm and immovable on it, as I cannot fail in such faith, and comfortably rely on God's word with all confidence. Therefore I am joyful, willing to live and die as and when God wills. I know where I or my soul will stay and where I will leave it. It shall not float away from me in error or in doubt, nor shall it depart in evil. I have certain assurances from God about His Messiah, so I also have a firm, certain faith.

4 The word Hebrew is not well to give with one word. Constitutum est, says St. Jerome, is close enough. Stabilitus, certificatus, firmatus, gefestiget, I would like to say. But I am averse to new words, so it does not read well here either, gefestiget from Messia 2c. I think the epistle Hebr. 11, 1, looks here at the word

XXX, since it speaks: fides est substantia; graece υποβρασις, which we have translated: "Faith is a certain confidence." There is no other way to say it to a German, if he is to understand it. For faith is, and ought to be, a steadfastness of heart, the does not waver, shake, tremble, falter or doubt, but stands firm and is sure of his cause. The same word is also found in the saying Isa. 40, 8: "God's word endures forever." "Abide", that is, it holds fast, is certain, does not waver, does not flinch, does not sink, does not fall, does not fail. Where this word comes into the heart with right faith, it makes the heart like it, also firm, certain and sure, so that it becomes so stiff, upright and hard against all temptation, devils, death, and whatever it may be called, that it defiantly and haughtily despises and scorns everything that wants to doubt, tremble, be angry and wrathful, because it knows that God's word cannot lie to it. Such is a stabilitus, substantiatus, constantius, substantificatus,<sup>1</sup> ) hypostaticus, certus passive, sicut verbum Domini certum active; like Paulus 2 Tim. 1, 12.: "I know and am certain" 2c., 2 Petr. 1, 10.: "Make your profession certain."

(5) So David is one who is sure of the promise, and believes it firmly, that Messiah, whom God promised to the patriarch Jacob (Gen. 49:10).(Gen. 49:10): "The scepter of Judah shall not depart until the coming of Shiloh"), should certainly come from his blood; and the promise of Messiah to Jacob is hereby negated and made clearer in David (as will follow), that henceforth the tribe of Judah is to be left on both sides, and that David's house alone must be looked to, as from it, and no other house in the tribe of Judah, Messiah must come in all certainty. Yet, although the two parts, promise and faith, must be together, for where there is no promise, there can be no faith, and where there is no faith, the promise comes to nothing; Faith, however, is not always equally firm, but is sometimes challenged and weak, but the promise, as the eternal word of God, always remains equally firm and certain for and for; therefore David is primarily called XXX, firm, that he has the firm promise, although he cannot keep or grasp the same without faith, he must also be there. This is said of the first.

6 On the other hand, he boasts: "Lovely with

1) In the Wittenberg, in the Jena, and in Walch: stantiuatus; in Latin this word is missing.

Psalms Israel"; that is, he did not keep this certain promise of the Messiah with him, or only for himself. For faith does not rest and celebrate, it goes out, speaks and preaches of such a promise and grace of God that other people also come and share it. Yes, with great joy he begins to compose beautiful, sweet psalms, sings lovely, merry songs, so that at the same time he can cheerfully praise and thank God, and also usefully provoke and teach the people. So David also boasts here that he has made many beautiful, sweet, lovely psalms of the promised Messiah, which were to be sung in praise of God in Israel, and have also been sung, in which at the same time also excellent prophecy and high understanding are preached and given to the people of Israel. And since David began such poetry of the Psalms and brought it into pregnancy, many others were enlightened by it and awakened to be prophets, who also helped and made beautiful Psalms, such as the children Korah, Heman, Assaph 2c.

(7) For he does not mean only the sweetness and sweetness of the Psalms according to grammatica and musica, where the words are graceful and artificial, and the song or tone is sweet and lovely, that is, beautiful text and beautiful notes, but rather according to theologia, according to the spiritual understanding, where the Psalms are quite sweet and lovely, because they are comforting to all sorrowful, miserable consciences, which are in the anguish of sins, and death torment and fear, and all kinds of distress and misery. To such hearts the Psalter, because it sings and preaches the Messiah, is a sweet, comforting, lovely song, even if one reads or says the mere words without notes. But the musica or notes, as a wonderful creature and gift of God, helps very well, especially when the crowd sings along and is very serious. For we read of the prophet Elisha, 2 Kings 3:15, that he awakens the spirit of prophecy in himself through the playing of the psalter (since the psalter was played according to the order of David); just as David often chases away the evil spirit of Saul with his playing of the psalter, or prevents or weakens it, we read in 1 Sam. 16:23. For the evil spirit does not like it when one sings or preaches God's word in the right faith.

He is a spirit of sadness, and cannot remain where a heart is spiritually joyful (that is, in God and His Word); of which St. Anthony also says that spiritual joy hurts the devil.

But he calls his psalms "Israel's psalms" and does not want them to be his own or to have the glory of them alone, but Israel is to confirm them and judge and recognize them as his own. For it is important that the people of God or God's people accept a word or song and recognize it as right, because the spirit of God must be in such a people, who wants to be honored in his people. This is how we Christians speak of our psalmists. St. Ambrose made many beautiful hymnos ecclesiae, called hymns of the Church, because the Church accepted them and uses them as if she had made them and they were her songs. Therefore, one does not say: Thus sings Ambrose, Gregory, Prudentius, Sedulius, but, thus sings the Christian church. For they are now the church's songs, which Ambrosius, Sedulius 2c. sing with the church, and the church with them, and when they die, the church remains, singing their songs forever. So David wants to call his psalms "Israel's psalms", that is, the psalms of the church, which has the same spirit that made them through David, and sings them continually, even after David's death. He felt in his spirit that his psalms would remain forever, as long as Israel or God's people would remain, that is, until the end of the world; as has happened until now, and will happen. That is why they should be called "Israel's Psalms".

V. 2. The Spirit of the Lord has spoken through me. And his speech has been through my tongue.

(9) Here David wants to become too strange for me, and to go too high; God grant that I may attain it a little; for here he begins to speak of the high holy trinity of divine being. First, he mentions the Holy Spirit, to whom he gives everything that the prophets prophesy. And on this and similar sayings St. Peter 2. ep. 1, 21. sees: "No prophecy has ever been produced by human will, but the Holy Spirit is the source of all prophecy.

The holy men of God have spoken by inspiration of the Holy Spirit. Therefore, in the article of faith 1) one sings of the Holy Spirit thus: "Who has spoken through the prophets." So now one gives to the Holy Spirit the whole holy scripture, and the outward word and sacrament, so that our outward ears and senses are moved or moved; for also our Lord Christ Himself gives His words to the Holy Spirit, as He speaks Luc. 4, 18. from Is. 61, 1.: "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, therefore He has anointed me" 2c. and Matth. 12, 18. from Is. 42, 1.: "Behold, this is My servant, whom I have chosen. I will put my spirit upon him"; and Luc. 1, 35.: "The Holy Spirit overshadows Mariam", stirs her, takes her blood and makes her pregnant, so that the Lord says: "conceived by the Holy Spirit."

(10) What a glorious, arrogant arrogance this is! He who may boast that the Spirit of the Lord speaks through him, and that his tongue speaks the word of the Holy Spirit, must of course be very sure of his own things. This will not be David, son of Jesse, born in sins, but he who is raised to be a prophet by God's promise. Should he not make sweet psalms who has such a master who teaches him and speaks through him? Hear now who has ears to hear! My words are not my words, but he who hears me hears God, he who despises me despises God [Luc. 10, 16]. For I see that 'many of my descendants shall not hear my words, to their great hurt. Neither we nor anyone who is not a prophet may lead such fame. This we may do, provided we are holy and have the Holy Spirit, that we may boast ourselves catechumens and disciples of the prophets, as those who repeat and preach what we have heard and learned from the prophets and apostles, and are certain that the prophets taught them. These are called in the Old Testament the "prophets' children," who do not set anything of their own nor new, as the prophets do; but teach what they have from the prophets, and are "Israel," as David says, to whom he makes the Psalms.

V. 3. The God of Israel has spoken to me, the refuge of Israel has spoken, the righteous ruler among men, the ruler in the fear of God.

Now we have three speakers. David says above [v. 2] that the Spirit of the Lord spoke through his tongue; thus the person of the Holy Spirit is clearly indicated to us Christians. What Turks, Jews and other godless people believe, we do not respect. Thus we have heard that the outward effect is attributed to the Holy Spirit in the Scriptures and in our faith, since He speaks, baptizes and rules with us bodily through the prophets, apostles and church ministers. Therefore these words of David are also of the Holy Spirit, which he speaks through his tongue from two other speakers. What then does he speak of them? First, he speaks of the God of Israel, who spoke to David, that is, promised him. Now who God is, this speaker, we Christians know from the Gospel of John, namely, it is the Father, who spoke in the beginning, Gen. 1, 3: "Let there be light"; and His word is the person of the Son, by whose word all things were made, Jn. 1, 3. The same Son is called by the Spirit through David here XXX, the "stronghold of Israel, and righteous ruler over men". He also speaks, that is, the Holy Spirit introduces the guardian Israel that he also speaks. So all three persons speak, and yet is One Speaker, One Promiser, One Promise, as it is one God.

12) Just as the outward effect of God on man is assigned to the Holy Spirit, so it is the quality of the Son that He became man, a Lord and Judge over all men, and is set over all creatures, as Psalm 8:5-7 sings: "What is man, that you remember him, and the Son of man, that you visit him? Thou hast made him lack a little time of God, but with honors and ornaments thou hast crowned him. Thou hast made him ruler over the work of thy hands; thou hast put all things under his feet." It is not yet a threefold dominion, or three rulers, but One Ruler and One Dominion, which the Father has given to the Son, yes, to man and man's child, no doubt not in such a way that He excludes Himself and the Holy Spirit from it.

1) That is, in the Nicene Creed.

I have closed. Nevertheless, it is and is called man's dominion, which God gives him. Therefore, the same man who is called ruler here must be true God, because he possesses God's kingdom and is therefore equal to God in the unified rule. For God does not leave or give His honor or His own kingdom to anyone else; as He says in Exodus 20:3: "You shall have no other gods before Me," and Isaiah 42:8: "I will not give My honor to anyone else, nor My glory to idols." But now he gives his glory and kingdom to this man and to the Son of man, that is, he subjects everything that is made to him, as he himself has it under him: so the same man must be neither another God nor an idol, but the true, natural God with the Father and the Holy Spirit. If we have time and grace, we will discuss more such sayings hereafter, especially in the Psalter.

Now let us work out these words of David beforehand, wherein he finely confesses the two highest articles, that in God there are three distinct persons, and that the one, the Son, should become man, and receive the kingdom and glory from the Father above all things, and that the Holy Spirit should write these things in men's hearts by faith, who also proclaimed them beforehand by the bodily mouth and tongue of the prophets. This is not the work of men or angels, because it is not the work of men or angels to promise these things beforehand and to create faith in the hearts of men afterwards. It is God's gift (says St. Paul [Eph. 2, 8]) such faith, which the Holy Spirit works and gives.

(14) It is also not for everyone to notice and read the divine three persons differently in the Scriptures and Psalms; for where a carnal mind comes upon these words, he reads them one after another, as they are written: "The Spirit of the Lord has spoken through me, the God of Israel has spoken to me, the Lord of Israel has spoken, the righteous ruler among men" (2c), and do not think otherwise, it is all spoken by GOD, as by One Person, with many other words; or fall into the Jewish blindness, since they make David such a righteous ruler and ruler in the fear of GOD, and the promise in

The commandment and the laws are reversed, that he who wants to rule over men should be just and godly, when David so devoutly and heartily boasts that these are words of promise from the Messiah of the God of Jacob, and not commandments over worldly lords.

(15) It would be the same for him in the other Psalm, since the three persons speak differently, as three different speakers. God the Father speaks [Ps. 2, 6]: "I have set my king on my holy mountain." This king is certainly another person of yours who sets him as king. Now it follows quickly, "I will preach from the way," which reads as if it were still the Father, and so reason would read it, if it were the King, the Son, as follows [v. 7.]: "The Lord hath said unto me, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee." That the same is a man is certain; for he shall preach, and be Messiah, as he says in the other verse: "They rage against the Lord and his Messiah." But that he is God is proved by the fact that the Father says, "Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee"; as we Christians well know. Item, that he gives him the whole earth as his own, with Gentiles, and what is in it, which is just as much as God's own kingdom. Item, he commands, v. 12: "They shall kiss the Son" or worship him, serve him with fear, and curses that "blessed are all those who trust in him", which belongs to God alone. Whether they do not all obey him according to the Gospel, nothing breaks off his rule over all creatures. Whoever will not be under him with grace must be under him with disgrace. He who will not reign with him must (like his enemies) be his footstool. He is judge over the living and the dead. Do you think that the Turk, the Pabst, the Jews and all the wicked people of the world and the devils will not want his grace, but will rage against it, so they will escape his power? They will certainly find out. For "God mocks them in heaven, and will speak to them in his wrath" [v. 4]. Summa, he is Lord, and remains Lord, as far as God himself is Lord, for he has given him dominion over everything; the power is certain, and remains well. Woe to him who does not accept it with grace, he will find it with wrath forever.

(16) Now here we have two distinct persons, the Father and the Son; so the Holy Spirit is without that, who made and spoke such Psalm 1) of the Father and the Son, introduced with their words, 2). Thus the distinct Trinity of Persons is in One inseparable Divine Being, and that the Son is Man and Messiah confesses, as it is confessed in the last words of David. A carnal heart runs over, or thinks that David made it as a pious man, of himself or others; as the blind Jews do; but David will not suffer the words to be ascribed to him. They are funny, lovely "Psalms Israel" (he says), but I did not make them, but "the Spirit of the Lord has spoken through me". And how could flesh and blood, reason and human wisdom speak of such high, incomprehensible things? It is vain foolishness and vexation before it.

17) But to confirm this opinion of David, that he believed as said and died on it, let us take before us the words on which he based himself, and from which he made such lovely psalms, which are found in 2 Sam. 7:12 ff. 1 Chron. 18:10 ff. and read thus:

[And the LORD hath declared unto thee, that the LORD will build thee an house; and when thy days be expired, and thou shalt return unto thy fathers, I will raise up thy seed after thee, which shall be of thy sons. And I will establish his kingdom, and he shall build me an house, and I will establish his throne for ever. I will be his father, and he shall be my son. And I will not turn away my mercy from him, as I turned it from him that was before thee; but I will set him in mine house and in my kingdom for ever; and his throne shall be established for ever.

1) In the original: "such psalms", that is: such psalm.

2) "introduced with their words" that is: in which father and son are introduced speaking. - Cruciger offers: kos psatmos, but here only the second Psalm is spoken of.

18) The first part, where he says: "The Lord proclaims to you that the Lord will build you a house", is clearly said about the house of David, that his children shall possess the scepter of Judah up to Messiah; as enough is said about this in that booklet about the Jews. 3) And here again we find the three persons in God; first of all the Holy Spirit, who speaks through the prophet Nathan, as we have seen above.

[§ 9] heard that the holy Scriptures are spoken by the Holy Spirit, according to the saying of David, "The Spirit of the Lord hath spoken by me." In the same way he speaks through all the prophets. Further, the Holy Spirit introduces the person of the Father in his speech, saying, "The Lord proclaimeth unto thee." And immediately after, the person of the Son, saying, "That the Lord will build thee an house." And yet there is one God and Lord, who speaks through Nathan, and David proclaims, and builds his house; all three One Speaker, One Proclaimer, One Builder. Whether such a difference of the persons is not seen by everyone's reason in the Scriptures, there is nothing to it. I know well how they gloss over this and similar words, the wise men who master the Holy Spirit.

(19) But where you find in the Scriptures that God speaks of God as if he were two persons, you may boldly reason that there three persons are indicated in the Godhead. As, here in this place the LORD speaks, that the LORD will build David a house. Item, Gen. 19, 24: "The LORD rained fire and brimstone from the LORD" 2c. For the Holy Spirit is not a fool, nor a drunkard, that should speak one tittle, much less one word, in vain. Now if the Lord (that is, the Son) rains fire and brimstone from the Lord (that is, from the Father), then at the same time there is the Holy Spirit, who speaks such things through Abraham, or whoever it was, from the two Lord. Nevertheless, they are all three One Lord, One God, who rains fire and brimstone. We will hear more of such examples hereafter.

20) And the other piece, when he saith, When thy days be expired, and thou shalt go unto thy fathers, I will raise up thy seed after thee.

3) That is: in the writing "Of the Jews and their lies". Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. XX, 1902, § 96 ff.

awaken" 2c. Here the right text is about Messiah. For such cannot be said of Solomon, much less of another son of David; it must be the right some son of David, Messiah, who was to come after the scepter of Judah. "He shall build me an house," he says, "and I will confirm his kingdom forever." This house cannot be the temple of Solomon. Because hard before it [1 Chron. 18, 4. 5.] he says: "You shall not build me a house for a dwelling. For I have not dwelt in any house since I brought the children of Israel out of Egypt." And Solomon himself 1 Kings 8:27: "Do you think that God will dwell on earth? Behold, heaven and all the heavens may not comprehend thee; how then shall this house which I have built?" But even more powerfully says Isaiah, Cap. 66, 1: "Thus saith the LORD, Heaven is my throne, and the earth is my footstool. What then is this house that ye will build me? or what is the place where I shall rest?"

21) Here God rejects with expressed words the great devotion of the Jews, who boasted of the temple, as if they built God a house, and did God great service with it, became proud, stiff-necked prophet murderers, yet God here confesses that he does not want to look at the temple, but a humble, afflicted spirit, which is afraid of his word [Is. 66, 2.], yes, that shall be his temple and rest; rejects also there all sacrifices and services of the temple, since he speaks, v. 3.: "He that killeth an ox is even as he that killeth a man. He who sacrifices a sheep is as one who breaks a dog's neck. He who offers a grain offering is as one who offers an offering of sow's blood. He that offereth incense is as one that offereth iniquity," that is, idolatry, "praise." For God did not have the temple built so that they would proudly despise His word and sacrifice much to sanctify themselves, but "that His name", not He Himself, "should dwell there" (as the Scripture says everywhere), that is, they should hear His word there and call upon Him, so that He would be honored. So they wanted the glory and honor of having such a temple, and beat the prophets to death for the sake of God's word.

(22) Therefore this house of God, which Messiah, David's son and God's son, is to build, must be a much greater and more glorious house. For, you yourself calculate, if God is to dwell in this house, it must be much greater and more glorious, neither heaven nor earth, because He is so great that heaven is His chair on which He sits, and earth is His footstool. What room is left here, where his head, breast, and arm may dwell? That it is well said, What house of stone and wood would ye build me for a dwelling, if heaven and earth were far, far too strait for me? Of this house the Holy Scriptures, especially the New Testament, teach us, and it is called the Holy Christian Church, as far as the world is; not only that, but also an eternal house, which abides and lives forever, since God eternally dwells, rules, and keeps house within it. This wants to become a little house and temple!

23 Now let us look at the carpenter or builder of this house. He is to be a man and David's son, as the text says, "one of your sons"; and yet he is to build a house of God that is better and more glorious than heaven and earth, and that will endure forever. Where will he get the art and power? This cannot be neither man's nor angel's art or power. For angels cannot create heaven or earth, not even the smallest creature, much less man. Therefore, this house's carpenter must be a real true God, who has the right power of divine nature to create heaven and earth, and much better, that is, he must be an almighty God, and yet is not the person who says of him: "I want to be his father, and he shall be my son, and he shall build me a house. Here the persons are tremendously and clearly distinguished, as father and son, and as master builder and master of the house. Nor can there be two gods, or the son be another and strange god. For the first commandment does not suffer it, saying, "Thou shalt not have other gods beside me"; and Deut. 6:4, "Hear, O Israel, the LORD our God is one LORD," or God.

(24) Thus we have heard above [§ 9. 16]: Where the Scriptures speak of the two Persons of the Father and the Son, the Holy Spirit, the third Person, is also with them, who does this through the

The prophets say that in this place it is thoroughly and powerfully proven and testified to a believing heart 1) that God, the Almighty Creator of heaven and earth, is certainly one true God, and apart from Him no other God can be 2) and yet is three different persons, the Father, Son and Holy Spirit; so that only the Son became man and David's son. And for this reason, no doubt, the people of Israel were so severely commanded that they should not worship more than One God, so that they would not be offended when Messiah came and preached and believed for God, just as if he wanted to teach against Moses more than One God, or a foreign God, but to keep their ears and hearts still, to be taught how the first commandment of One God was to be understood correctly and thoroughly. Follows:

[1 Chron. 18, 14.] And I will set him in my house and in my kingdom forever.

25 What is this? Here let us hear. Hans shall be and remain eternal, as it is also said above [§ 22], therefore the master must also be eternal, and have an eternal divine power. Here he speaks further to David: "The house, which my son and your son shall build for me, he shall also be the master of the house inside, as well as I. He shall be like me in every way. He shall be like me in one house. I will put him in it, and he shall have it as myself. Now we have heard that this house of God is greater, better, and more glorious than heaven and earth. Now if David's son Messiah is master and ruler of this house, he is surely also master and ruler of heaven and earth, and much more and better. For he who is the master of this house, like God Himself, is certainly much more, 3) also the master of heaven and earth, like God Himself; but no one can be, except the one and only God, Creator of heaven and earth. From this it follows that Messiah, David's natural son, must be real true God, and not a foreign God. For,

As I said, God does not allow a foreign god to be lord in his own house; he must and will have his honor and authority himself, and leave it to no one else. This should be clear enough that Messiah, David's son, is a lord and king in God's own kingdom, or equal to God; for it is certain that God speaks of Messiah there.

But if someone wants to Judaize, and these words "my house", "my kingdom", point to the temple in Jerusalem and to the people of Israel, he should do it without me for himself, because I know very well that God calls the temple his house, Is. 56, 7: "My house is a house of prayer", as Christ introduces this Matth. 21, 13. Luc. 19, 46. 2c, and Israel is called his kingdom, Ex. 19, 6: "You shall be my priestly kingdom" (but it says, "if you obey my voice and keep my covenant"). Also I know that God says Ezek. 18, 4. says: "The father's soul is mine as well as the son's soul." Yes, I know that the wine I drink and the bread I eat is also called his bread and wine; and what is there in heaven and earth that is not his? as he says Isa. 66, 1: "Heaven is my chair, the earth my footstool; what house will you build for me? Has not my hand made all this, and is all ready there?" that is, if I had not made heaven and earth before, where would you take lime, stones, wood, iron, and what belongs to the building? Is it not all mine before? Where did you get it? What did you work on it? Yes, who and white are you yourselves? Am I not your creator? So David also confesses in his beautiful praise, when he says about the supplies to build the temple, 1 Chron. 30, 11: "It is all yours, O Lord, and we offer you what we have received from your hands.

27 He also speaks of the sacrifice of this temple, Ps. 50:13: "What will you sacrifice to me? "Do you think I must eat beef and drink goat's blood?" Where did you get your sacrifices, ox, sheep, goats? Is it not all mine before? What are all the oxen, sheep, and all that go to 4) pasture on all the face of the earth? Have I them

Not created without all your help? Where would you take them as an offering to me, if I had not given them to you first? This is what is said: I must not have any of your sacrifices, and you must not think that you serve me with them, as if I had to have them and could not do without them; but this is the opinion that you should recognize and confess through such sacrifices how you have everything from me that you are and have, and thus honor, praise and glorify me [as] your God and Creator. Yes, for the sake of the cause I let it be called my sacrifices for a time. Where the cause is out, the sacrifice is nothing.

028 As I have called the temple my house, not that I should dwell therein, nor that ye should minister therein unto me: but for your sakes I have called it my house, that ye should pray therein, and praise me, and call upon me: for it shall not be my dwelling house, but your house of prayer; yea, it shall be called a house of prayer. Now for my sake it cannot be called a house of prayer, for I have no one to worship or call upon but God, whom I have no need of. Wherever my house is needed other than a house of prayer, it is a murderer's pit and not my house; as those who think they are doing me great service by building me a house want to be praised for it, and have the honor of such work and building, as if they had earned great favor with me. Then such a house must be destroyed, ruined and destroyed as the most shameful pit of murder, which is no longer my house, but the devil's own hell.

29. Now whoever, according to such a mind, wants to understand these words "my house", "my kingdom", as 26] said, of the temple and the people of Israel in this place, must also take it upon himself to prove with good, strong reason how the temple at Jerusalem and the people of Israel in the land of Canaan have always remained for and for, even now and until then, since the time of David, because the text here clearly states: David's house shall remain forever, and David's son, Messiah, shall sit in God's house and kingdom forever. We Christians must confess that we cannot prove this, as we know that God's house, the Temple at Jerusalem, was in ashes at 1500 years.

David's house and kingdom and the people of Israel have not been anything for 1500 years, nor have they had a regiment or kingdom in the land of Canaan, and we must stick to our previous understanding that the words "my house" and "my kingdom" must mean the eternal kingdom of God, where he wants to dwell and rule forever, which his son and David's son, Messiah, should build by his almighty divine power and wisdom. Let us hear David himself, how he understood these words. Thus it is written in 1 Chron. 18:16:

When Nathan had spoken all these words to David, David the king came and sat before the Lord, saying, "What am I, O Lord God? And what is my house, that thou hast brought me hitherto?"

30 Here David indicates that he understood the words well, since God promised him through Nathan: "I will be his father, and he shall be my son; I will set him in my house, and in my kingdom forever." Therefore he says, "What am I? What is my house, that thou bringest me hither?" It is too high and too glorious a thing that you promise me, that my house, I, my son, should come to sit in your own 1) eternal kingdom, to be Lord and King? O Lord God, where are you taking me? He cannot tell for great wonder, and calls it "until then". Whither, whither, my dear God? If I (that is, my flesh and blood) am to sit like you in your eternal kingdom, then my flesh and blood, my son and your son, will have to be right true God, who sits like you. Ah GOtt, where are you taking me? Follows:

V. 17. You have looked upon me as in the likeness of a man, who is God the Lord on high.

Almost all other Hebrew scholars interpret much differently here; however, some, such as Bernhard Ziegler, 2) give me evidence that it may be and should be interpreted according to the Grammatica as I have now translated it. Herewith David clearly confesses that his son, Messiah, should certainly be a right man, in all form, manner and measure like another man, Phil. 2, 7, and yet above and on high, where no man-wise, but only God is and rules, he should be God, the Lord. This, I say, is clearly the opinion of David, spoken out in dry words. Therefore he says above [v. 14.], Whither, whither, dear GOD, dost thou bring me? And here: Why do you consider me unworthy, that my son should be king in your eternal kingdom? He understands well that in God's eternal kingdom, being king is not due to anyone but a true God. Since the Son of David is a man, and another person than the Father, who places him in his kingdom, and yet cannot be two, or more than one true God, David hereby concludes that his son, Messiah, must be a true, natural God, and yet not another God than the Father, but another person in the same unified, undivided Godhead, and the Holy Spirit, who speaks of the Father and Son as true God through Nathan and David, is the third person in the same unified Godhead.

This is the doctrine and faith of the New Testament, namely, that Jesus Christ of Nazareth, the Son of David and the Virgin Mary, is a true man, the natural and eternal Son of God, one God with the Father and the Holy Spirit, and three distinct persons. Because David's words in this place gladly give such understanding, according to all kinds of Hebrew language, we Christians should neither seek nor respect any other understanding in it, but consider this [for] the only right understanding, all other interpretations for human futile conceit. The New Testament cannot be missing, so also the Old Testament, where it rhymes and is similar to the New.

33. may you ask here: If the words of David and Nathan so clearly give the article of the deity of Christ, how is it that neither the holy fathers, nor any other teacher, have seen or ever touched such a thing, and you new, young Hebrews

Why do the rabbis of the Jews not see it? Answer: The Hebrew language was little and poorly known after the time of the apostles. [The dear fathers and teachers were content with the New Testament, in which they have such things and all things abundantly and superfluously. But the prophets and apostles saw it well, as we shall hear hereafter. But that the rabbis do not see, it is quite true. 1) For he that is blind shall see nothing, as Isaias, Cap. 6, 10, saith of them, "With eyes that see ye shall be blind." Whoever has to learn from them will also become blind, certainly. Indeed, we ourselves would not see it either, if we "could not, enlightened by the New Testament, see rightly under the eyes of the Old. For without the New Testament, the Old is obscured, 2 Cor. 4:3, 4.

34) Behold our times, when we preach of the grace of Christ against the presumptuous works and holiness of our own, how many there are who see it, or receive it with earnestness? What is lacking? It is so brightly preached, taught, read, written, sung, painted, and practiced in all ways, that wood and stone should understand it, if they had a little sense: yet not pope, kings, princes, bishops, scholars, lords, nobles, citizens, peasants, see it, but pass by, blind with seeing eyes, deaf with hearing ears; for their heart is not at home, and stands elsewhere. So the prophets in their time prophesied of Christ clearly enough, that he should be God and Lord over all, as David does here. But few believed or respected it, the others were blind and deaf to it, followed their hearts and their conceit. It is called mystery, secret, and remains mystery. Whoever understands it and is serious about it, gives thanks to God, and does not turn to the other great heap of despisers.

35 Do you not think that Isaiah read this text of David with diligence, when he says, Cap. 9, 6. 7: "A child is born to us, a son is given to us, and his dominion is established.

1) Cruciger: iä sans rsets st msrito 6t - it certainly serves them right.
2) Thus the Wittenbergers and the Jenaers. Erlanger: serious.

His name is called Wonderful, Counselor, God, Hero, Everlasting Father, Prince of Peace, that his dominion may be great, and there be no end of peace, upon the throne of David and his kingdom, that he may establish it and strengthen it with judgment and righteousness from henceforth even for ever"? Here Isaiah takes the word out of Nathan's mouth, when he prophesies of Messiah that he shall be an everlasting king and father in the kingdom of God, and he also calls him God: for the word El, according to the letter, means power; but when it is a proper name (as here), it is called God, through all Scripture, who alone has power; as both Jews and Hebrews must confess.

Isaiah agrees with David and the New Testament that Christ is an eternal king and true God; therefore his kingdom must be a divine, eternal kingdom on the throne of David 2c. For he especially moved the word "eternal kingdom", since God speaks to David through Nathan: "I will place your son in my kingdom forever", and feels well that this is spoken (as David speaks) of a man who must be on high El, that is, God. For to possess the eternal kingdom of God and to be king in it cannot be of a bad man, nor can it be a transient, temporal, earthly kingdom, which has an end, and the king must die with his children after him; but here the Son of David shall be an everlasting king in the everlasting kingdom of God, and, as Isaiah agrees, of peace no end; and he, the Son of David, the child that is born and given unto us, shall be an everlasting father and prince of peace, from henceforth even for ever. Therefore he must be God or El, who by his divine power can give and maintain such eternal peace.

37) Such eternity of the kingdom of Messiah is shown by Isaiah in more places than Cap. 51, 4. 5: "Take heed to me, 1) my people; hear me, my people. For from me shall go forth a law, and my judgment will I set for the light of the nations. My righteousness is near, and my salvation is gone forth," And soon.

Then, v. 6: "My salvation shall endure forever, and my righteousness shall have no end." This is the eternal righteousness, of which Daniel also says, Cap. 9, 24: "Seventy weeks are determined, that eternal righteousness should come," and is Messiah, as all ancient Hebrews understood it. "Eternal righteousness" but and salvation cannot be a bad man nor angel, but must be GOD Himself; and yet David's Son, natural man, and another person of Him who speaks of Him, calling Him "my salvation, my righteousness." The third person is the Holy Spirit, who speaks such things of the two. So the New Testament also calls him, 1 Cor. 1, 30.: "Jesus Christ became to us from GOD a wisdom, righteousness, sanctification and redemption." This rhymes with 2) Isaiah, and Isaiah with Paul.

38. item, Isaiah 60, 19. 20.: "The sun shall no more shine unto thee by day, neither shall the brightness of the moon shine unto thee: but the LORD shall be unto thee an everlasting light, and thy God shall be thy glory. Thy sun shall go down no more, neither shall thy moon lose her light: for the LORD shall be unto thee an everlasting light, and the days of thy sorrow shall be at an end." Here it is clear that our eternal light is to be the Lord and our God Himself, and one Lord speaks of another; indeed, throughout the whole chapter it is not Isaiah who speaks, but the Lord, and says here: "The LORD shall be your everlasting light." Who is the Lord who speaks this? Without doubt God the Father. Who is the LORD of whom he speaks, "The LORD will be your eternal light"? Without a doubt GOD the Son, Jesus Christ. For here is written the great name of GOD, Jehovah, which we write in our Bible with these great letters, LORD, as distinguished from the other names. Who is it then that speaks these things through the tongue of Jehovah? Undoubtedly God the Holy Spirit, who speaks through the prophets, introducing the person of the Father, speaking of the eternal light, that is, of His Son, Jesus of Nazareth, David's and Mary's Son.

39. such an eternal light, yes, such a lord, can

1) "me" is missing in the Wittenberg, the Jena and the Erlangen. In the Latin it is expressed.

Nor can he be a bad angel or a bad man. And in this Isaiah's prophecy agrees with the New Testament, because our Lord Jesus Christ often calls Himself a light, Joh. 1, 4. 5.: "The life was the light of men, and the light shone into the darkness, but the darkness did not understand it. Because this rhymes with the New Testament, Isaiah's prophecy should be understood joyfully, and not differently from Jesus Christ, who has not prepared a kingdom for us under this sun and moon, which is passing away, but wants to be our eternal light, sun and moon, life and salvation, as he says above, Cap. 51, 6: "Lift up your eyes to heaven, and look down on earth! Heaven shall pass away like smoke, and the earth shall wax old like a garment, and they that dwell therein shall die as nothing: but my salvation shall be for ever, and my righteousness shall have no end.

40 Dear, tell me, can this and the like sayings also suffer the Jews' great understanding of their Messiah, who is to be a mortal, worldly king at Jerusalem, on earth? because God here holds His Messiah against heaven and earth, and says: "(The) heaven shall pass away like smoke (that will not happen without fire, 2 Pet. 3, 12.), the earth shall decay like an old garment, men shall die away like nothing. But his salvation, which is near (he says), his righteousness," which has gone forth, "shall abide forever," and be an everlasting light; for he is the LORD himself, and your GOD. Here you see if Isaiah understood the words of Nathan, 1 Chron! 18, 13, where he introduces GOD: "I will be his father, and he shall be my son; I will set him in my kingdom forever." And David's words, 1 Chron. 18, 17. where he says: "You have looked upon me as in the likeness of a man who is God the LORD on high"; and 2 Sam. 7, 19.: "This is a manner of a man who is the LORD the LORD", ubi Latinus<sup>1)</sup> ) habet: Ista est lex Adam, Domine Deus; et nihil significat [where the Latin has: "This is the law of Adam, O HERR Gott", and gives no understanding).

41 Let us also see Daniel, who says

Cap. 7, 13. 14.: "I saw in the night vision, and behold, there came one in the clouds of heaven like the Son of man unto the Ancient of days, and was brought before him, and gave him power, and glory, and kingdom, that all nations and people and tongues should serve him. His power is eternal, which does not pass away, and his kingdom has no end." Christians can and do understand this saying, but let us also see how it rhymes with the New Testament. A man child he sees in the clouds; no doubt that his kingdom shall not be earthly, transitory, nor temporal, but heavenly and one, as he speaks, "The Ancient of days," that is, GOD the Father, "gave him dominion over all things, and his dominion shall be eternal, and have no end." This eternity or everlasting realm cannot be given to any bad creature, neither angels nor men, because it is divine power, and GOD's own power. What would or could God keep or have if He gave eternal power and eternal kingdom of Himself? He would keep nothing everywhere, and would himself come to nothing, because there is another who has the eternal power. There can be nothing above and apart from the eternal power. Eternal power comprehends everything and does not allow anything else or greater to be above it or outside of it; it must be God Himself and nothing else.

(42) Here the text of Daniel also gives the article of the Godhead in three persons, and of the humanity of the Son; for there must be another person who gives, and another who receives. Namely, the Father gives eternal authority to the Son, and the Son has it from the Father, and all this from eternity, otherwise it would not be an eternal authority; so the Holy Spirit is there who speaks it through Daniel. For such a high, secret thing no one could know, if the Holy Spirit did not reveal it through the prophets; as was often said above [§ 9. 11] that the holy Scriptures are spoken by the Holy Spirit. Besides, the Son is nevertheless also a man-child, that is, a right man and David's son, to whom such eternal power is given. So we see how the prophets well regarded and understood Va's word "eternal," since God speaks to David through Nathan: "I will place my son and your son in my eternal kingdom."

1) I,Ltinu8, that is, the Vulgate.

43) Here, Mrs. Klüglingin, 1) the reason, which is ten times wiser than God Himself, is upset and asks: How can God give His eternal power from Himself to another? What would he himself retain? Is it not said above [§ 12] that God says Isa. 42, 8: "I will not give my glory to another, nor my praise to idols"; especially he cannot give it to a man who has not been from eternity, like God, but began here temporally, was born, and is mortal; as we Christians confess and preach about Jesus, David's and Mary's son. The Jews, Mahomet, Turks and Tartars are such highly intelligent people, who can grasp the incomprehensible nature of God in the spoon or nutshell of their reason, and say that God has no wife, therefore he can have no son. Fie, fie, fie to you, devil, with Jews and Mahomet, and all those who are students of blind, foolish, miserable reason in these high things that no one understands but God alone, and how 2) much the Holy Spirit has revealed to us through the prophets.

44 We Christians, enlightened by the New Testament, can answer correctly, clearly and finely, thus: Christ our Lord has two births, or two natures in One undivided Person; for He is One Christ, not (as the mad spirit Nestorii deceives) two Cyristi. After the first birth he received, not temporally, but from eternity, from the Father the eternal power or Godhead, and the Father gave it to him wholly and completely, as he himself has it from eternity. He did not give it to him in such a way that he deprived himself of it or got rid of it, but he gave the same authority to the Son, and no other, which he had completely and totally from eternity and retains for eternity. For there are not two Gods, but both Persons are one Godhead, and is rightly said, Isa. 42:8: "I will not give my glory to another, nor my praise to idols." For the Son is not another God, nor an idol, but with the Father one, true, eternal God.

45 He himself speaks of this in John 16:15: "All that the Father has is mine. Does not say: The Father has nothing, I have it all alone; or: The Father has it all alone, I have nothing; but: The Father has it all; but the same "all" that he has, that is mine. This is plainly so much as said, that the Father and Son have one Godhead, and of the same all of the Father that is of the Son, the Holy Ghost also hath it; as he saith there, "He shall take it of mine." From which "Mine"? Undoubtedly from the Mine that the Father has. So the Holy Spirit takes from both your Father and Son the same complete whole Godhead from eternity. Item, John 5:26: "As the Father hath life in himself, even so hath he given to the Son to have life in himself"; and, v. 21:23: "As the Father raiseth up the dead, and quickeneth them; even so the Son quickeneth whom he will; that they all may honor the Son, even as they honor the Father." All this is said of the first, eternal, divine birth.

46 After the other, temporal, human birth, the eternal power of God was also given to him, but temporally, and not from eternity. For the humanity of Christ has not existed from eternity, as the divinity; but, as it is counted and written, Jesus, the Son of Mary, is 1543 years old this year. But from the moment that Godhead and humanity are united in one person, the man, the Son of Mary, is and is called almighty, eternal God, who has eternal power, and created and sustains everything, per communicationem idiomatum, because he is one person with the Godhead, and also true God. He speaks of this in Matth. 11, 27: "All things have been given to me by the Father", Matth. last, v. 18: "All authority has been given to me in heaven and [on] earth." Which one: "To me"? To me, JEsu of Nazareth, Mary's son and man born. From eternity I received them from the Father, before I became man; but when I became man, I received them temporally after mankind, and kept them secretly until my resurrection and ascension, when they were to be revealed and transfigured; as St. Paul Rom. 1, 4, says: He is transfigured, or "proved a Son of God powerfully". John calls it "trans-cleansed" Cap. 7, 39.: "The Holy Spirit was not yet [there], because JEsus was not yet glorified."

(47) Behold now, whether Daniel speaketh not almost on the stroke, as did Isaias, of the Son of man receiving the everlasting kingdom from God, and as Nathan and David speak, that God would make David's son king in his everlasting kingdom; and that these things are spoken (saith David) as of a man who is God the LORD on high.

(48) Alas! that we Christians should recognize such unspeakable grace so abundantly, both in the New and Old Testaments, and not rejoice and give thanks as is fitting. It would not be a miracle if a Christian's heart thoroughly considered and grasped it, so that it would die of joy and come to life again of joy. What a wonder it is that God is man, speaks with us, lives, and dies for us! David is stunned and frozen with joy, he can no longer say: "What am I? What is my house that you have brought me there?"

49. all this is still spoken of the text 1 Chron. 18. on which, as above

17] the last words of David are based on, that Christ must be true God and man. And what more springs from such a text, we will see later (with God's help). For the prophets after David, and he himself also, took much from it about Christ, that he was God and man. As the 110th Psalm, v. 1: "The LORD hath said unto my LORD, Sit thou on my right hand, till I make thine enemies thy footstool." What else can 1) "sit at my right hand" mean but to sit like God, that is, to sit in God's eternal kingdom? For he sits not at his head, nor at his feet, neither higher nor lower; but at his right hand, like unto him, that heaven is as well his throne, and earth his footstool; as he saith Matt. last, v. 18: "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth"; and Marc, 16th [v. 19]: "He is taken up into heaven, and sitteth at the right hand of God." And when he asks the Pharisees, Matth. 22, 43. ff.: "If Christ is the Son of David, how then does he call him in the spirit (that is, the Spirit speaking through him) his Lord? saying, "The Lord said to my Lord, Sit at my right hand," they could not answer him.

50) So the Jews 2) cannot answer it even today until eternity; they blaspheme very much, only contrary to us Christians, with clumsy, malicious profanity, also against their own old rabbis and teachers. You may read Lyrar about this there. But we have the New Testament, which not only rhymes with this Psalm, and the Psalm is similar to it; in that we Christians (as has now often been said [§ 32]) have enough to draw the Old Testament to our understanding, and cannot lack it, but all other understanding must lack it. So Christ himself is there with his apostles, who testify and show us this understanding with rich words and works, and this psalm is also the Oerter one, since the three persons are proclaimed differently, in One Godhead; which alone is the understanding of the prophets and Christians, given by the Holy Spirit. Jews, Mahomet, reason shall know nothing of this. There is the Father, who says: "Sit at my right hand"; and is David's son, Christ, to whom he speaks such things.

51 Now the Father is not Christ, or the Son of David, and Christ is not the Father, yet he must sit at the right hand like the Father, having the same kingdom, authority, honor and everything. For God suffers no equal to sit beside Him in equal power and honor; therefore Christ, David's Son, must be right and with the Father a common God, sitting equal to Him; since no more than a common God must be; as the first commandment says, "Thou shalt have no other gods beside Me." So the Holy Spirit is also there, as the right one God, who speaks to us men through David and all the prophets, and reveals and teaches us all the truth of the Godhead; as David says: "The Spirit of the Lord has spoken through me," and Christ himself Matth. 22, 45: "How does David, through the Spirit, call Christ his Lord, if he is his Son?" Admittedly, without the Spirit he would

1) Erlanger: "can be called".

2) In the Erlanger: "They can" instead of: So can the Jews.

neither call it nor know it, as Christ would be his Son and Lord. The Holy Spirit, however, is not Christ the Son, nor the Father, and yet cannot be any other God. Thus it is evident that there is one God, and yet there are three distinct persons, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, from eternity to eternity.

52. Here someone wants to move why David says, "What am I? What is my house?" Item: "Thou hast looked upon me as a man that is on high GOD the LORD." But God did not say to him, "You shall be my son, and I will place you in my eternal kingdom." He said, "Your son shall be my son, and I will place him in my eternal kingdom." How then does David change the words of God, and interpret them to himself, as if he were the man who is God the LORD on high? Well, David is the father of this son (as you hear), and from his house and from his flesh and blood he shall come. Now it is in the nature of a father to rejoice in the glory of his son so high, and even higher than the son himself, to whom he grants all honor and good, and much more than to himself. Again, the scorn and disgrace inflicted on the Son is much more upsetting to him than it would be to himself. Therefore not only David, but also his whole house (as he says: "What is my house?") boasts of the glory, that from their flesh and blood such a son will come, who will sit at the right hand of God.

53 Thus one reads in the histories that a father, whom they call Chilo, died of joy, because he heard that his son had kept the victory in Olympus. 1) And a Roman woman, not knowing otherwise that her son had been slain by Hannibal at Cannae in the war with others, and he suddenly coming home healthy, when she looked at him, she fell down with joy and died. So David is so full of joy and spirit that he does not know how or what to say, and does not accept his son's honor, his flesh and blood, any other way than as if it had happened to him.

54] Moreover, such a son of David is still in his flesh and blood at this time, and there is nothing of it but himself, David, in his person and with his flesh and blood, from which the son was to come in the future. For this history and these words happened in time before Nathan, David's son (from which cord Christ came, Luc. 3, 31.), was born; indeed, his mother Bathsheba had not yet become David's wife, but was still Uriah's wife, a good while before the fall and adultery. Therefore [it is] not a shapeless speech of a father, when he praises and thanks GOD of his son's glory, with these or such like words, Oh dear GOD! What am I? What do you look upon me for, that you honor me so highly, and make of my flesh and blood such a lord? For it is I who am the glory and the joy, for it is my flesh and blood that is still in me and on me, but in the future [but] 2) shall be born.

55 Therefore also our Lord Christ is often called in the prophets by the name of his father David, Hos. 3:5: "After this the children of Israel shall return, and seek the Lord their God, and David their king, and shall honor the Lord and his mercy in the latter days. Here David is called our Lord Christ, and is placed in equal honor with God, and called Lord, whom they will seek and honor. It is one seeking, that they may seek and honor God and their King; just as with one faith we honor the Father and the Son, not with another faith the Father, and with another the Son. And here is the third person, the Holy Spirit, who speaks these things verbally through Hosea, and teaches us to believe.

56. item, Ezek. 34, 23. 24.: "I will raise up for them one shepherd to feed them, that is, my servant David, who will feed them and be their shepherd; I will be their God, and my servant David will be prince among them." Here Christ is called David and God's servant, as he is also called Isa. 52, 13. "God's servant", and in 3) many places more. In addition Paul Phil. 2. makes a servant out of to him, who 1) yet always and always preaches a true God, since he speaks, v. 5-7: "Let every man be like Jesus Christ, who, though he was in the form of God, did not consider it a robbery to be like God, but expressed himself, and took on the form of a servant" 2c. Let us ask the apostle how he may speak so clumsily. If Christ is like God, how can he be a servant and in the form of a servant? If he is a servant, how can he be like God and in the form of God? But we Christians understand and know all these things well; but the Jews are confidently obdurate with this saying of Ezekiel, and want to be sure of their mind (I wanted to say madness); let them go.

57. item, Jeremiah 30:8, 9: "In that day, saith the LORD, I will break the yoke from off thy neck, and thy bands shall be rent; and they shall no more serve the strangers (or like aliens) within; but shall serve the LORD their God, and David their king, whom I will raise up unto them." Here Christ is also called David, as the Jews, old and new, must understand this saying of Messiah, without that they do not understand the yoke and the bands rightly, want to make the prison of Babylon out of it. But the whole three chapters one after the other speak strongly of the redemption that Messiah is to do, that is, of the death and sins that the law brings upon us, of which Jews and reason know nothing. There is a reason for the Christians, and what has been Christian from the beginning of the world 2c.

(58) Nevertheless, with this saying Jeremiah makes this king of his, David, the right God, because he puts God and this David together in the same service and honor that the people of Israel should do to him. For if this David were not the right God, God would not place him next to Himself and say: "They shall serve their God and their king David"; for it is said: "You shall not serve any other god, but you shall fear the LORD your God and serve Him only", Deut. 6, 13, and 10, 20. And do the words of Jeremiah agree with the saying 1 Chron. 18, 11. 17.: "I will place your son in My eternal kingdom, who is a man, and at the same time I will place him on the earth.

above, on high, is God the Lord, who is honored and served like the Father. Here the Holy Spirit must be the third person, who speaks such things through Jeremiah, and teaches us to believe and understand them, and is one God, beside whom we honor and serve no other God.

(59) With this it should be enough of the text 1 Chron. 18, on which David's last words are based, namely, that Christ is God and man, born of David, that we now want to return to David's last words, to end them, in which he confesses Christ as his Son and praises him for his God, according to the saying [1 Chron. 18, 17.]: "Thou hast looked upon me as a man," qui superne vel in supernis, vel in excelsis est Dominus Deus, "who high above, or on high, is GOD the LORD." For that our Latin text says in vocativo, Domine Deus, gives no sense, as little as 2 Sam. 7, 19.: Ista est lex Adam, Domine Deus; which would be better: Ista est lex vel forma hominis, Domini Dei; seu, qui sit Dominus Deus etc. Enough said of that now. But because the matter is so good, and, unfortunately, we are the least of the prophets and apostles who take care of Christ, the crucified David and eternal God, we want, before we finish the last words of David, to continue talking about it, to strengthen us in our faith, to annoy all devils, Jews, Mahometists, Papists, and what is hostile to this son of David.

(60) And first of all, let us take Moses, the chief fountain, source, father, and master of all the prophets, before us, and see if he will let himself be made a Christian, and stand by us, because Christ himself baptized him, John 5:46, saying, Moses wrote of me. If he wrote of him, he certainly also prophesied and preached of him, and commanded all the prophets after him to write and preach of Christ; as they did with all diligence, so that even all the Jews, young and old, know to say that a Messiah was to come. But Moses is buried to them, so that they cannot know where he lies. Therefore we will send two faithful, certain legates or messengers.

1) Thus the Wittenbergers. Jenaer and Erlanger: to them.

They are called John Evangelist and Paul Apostle, and they shall seek him, find him, wake him up, and bring him here. What does it matter, they will meet and not miss! But lest you forget what I said above [Preface § 8]: I want to take care of that this time, where the Hebrew text gladly gives itself and rhymes with the New Testament, that such is and should be the one right understanding of Scripture; everything else, what Jews, Hebrews, and whoever they are, according to their destroyed 1) and mangled, forced grammatica, chat against it, shall certainly be vain lies to us.

(61) St. John begins his Gospel thus: "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and God was the Word. The same was in the beginning with God. All things were made through the same, and without the same nothing was made that was made." These are the words of St. John, or rather of the Holy Spirit, who gives life to all things; now let us see if he can find Moses with this and raise him from the dead. For Moses heareth very softly, and cometh freely, and saith, Here am I. For even as thou, John, speakest of words, so have I spoken, and so speakest I, and thou takest the words out of my mouth. For so have I also written, in the beginning of my book, of the beginning of the creature [Gen. 1, 3. ff.]: "God said, Let there be light; and there was light. God said, Let there be a firmament among the waters. God said: Let the waters under the sky be gathered together into special places, that the dry land may be seen. God said: Let the earth bring forth grass and herbage. God said, "Let there be lights in the firmament, and let day and night be divided"; and so on.

Here Moses agrees with John that in the beginning of the creature there was a word, through which God spoke everything that is, created and made. And Moses does not lisp 2) or stammer here, nor are there any words.

dark, uncertain speeches; the Grammatica is also certain that where there is a speaker, there is a λόγος, word or speech. Whether now the Jews, heretics, Mahomet dream their own interpretation here, contrary to the Christian faith, there we ask nothing. We have the text and Grammaticam Mosis for us, which stands dry and clear, that in the beginning and apart from all creatures God has spoken, and there is one word, through which God speaks everything; as St. John writes to us, Joh. 1, 1. ff. Which gospel the dear fathers Hilarius, Augustine, Cyril 2c. have abundantly and powerfully acted upon, so that it is not necessary to write further about it now, their books are available. It is enough this time, that we see and hear here, how Moses rhymes with himself, so similar and even with John, that even the blind reason cannot deny it, but must confess according to the certain grammatica, that they both lead the same way and speech of the word, through which God created and made everything in the beginning.

63 For both Moses and John want to show how and by what instrument, or out of what God made such a great work, the whole world. But there is no tool, no wood nor stone, nothing at all, out of which the world was made; but by the Word alone were all things made. The Word, however, is not made, but it is with God in the beginning, when He made everything, as Moses says here: "God said, 'Let there be' this and that 2c. By the word, he says, all things came into being. Now, apart from the creature, nothing can be with God that is not God Himself; therefore, the Word must be God Himself, as great and powerful as God Himself, because all things are made by Him; and yet cannot be the person who speaks the Word. The speaker and the word must be two different things. Again, there must be, not two gods, because there is no more than one, right, true God, and there must be one Creator of heaven and earth, not two or three Creators or gods. Thus Moses testifies with St. John that God and the Word are certainly two distinct persons, and yet both are one Creator and God, inseparable in the one divine essence.

64 So David read and understood Moses when he said Ps. 33, 6: "The heavens were made by the word of the Lord, and all his host by the spirit of his mouth. "Made" is the heaven and all that is in it and on it (he speaks). Dear, made of what? Out of nothing. By what? By his word, and by the spirit of his mouth. Doesn't David here also speak the same as Moses, and also wants to say with almost the same speech: God said: Let there be heaven, and there was heaven? But if heaven, 1) with all that is therein, was and is made by God's speaking or word, then without doubt the earth, with all that is therein, was and is also made by the same word. Now the Word is not heaven, nor earth, nor anything that is in it, or made with it by the Word. Therefore it must be God Himself, and yet another person of the speaker, who makes everything through the word, in some undivided essence, divine power, might and effect. But if we have the Word, we shall well find the third person, since David says here, "And by the spirit of his mouth all his host."

He says "made" only once: "The heavens were made by the word of the Lord, and all his host by the spirit of his mouth. 2) He calls three persons differently, namely the Lord, his word and his spirit; and yet he does not put more than One Maker, without any difference. It is all made. By whom? By One Maker, who is the Lord, Word, Spirit. The Lord does not make his own work special, the Word does not make his own work special, the Spirit does not make his own work special; all three distinct persons are one maker of every work; and every work is of all three persons, as of one maker or master. For as the Lord maketh heaven, so maketh the Word the same, and no other heaven; so maketh the Holy Ghost the same, and no other heaven; there is one that maketh it, and one that maketh it.

is one work that all three persons do. Again, as the Lord makes all the host of heaven by his Spirit (as the text says, "By the Spirit of the Lord is all the host of heaven made"), so the Spirit makes the same, and no other host of heaven; so also the Word makes the same, and no other host of heaven.

For this reason, a Christian is well advised, as Athanasius says in his Symbolo, not to mix the persons into one person, or to divide or separate the one divine being into three persons. For if I give a special work to each person from the outside, in the creature, where the other two should not have anything to do with it, then I have divided the one Godhead and made three gods or creators; that is wrong. Again, where I do not give a special distinction i) to any person within 3) the Godhead, or apart from and above the creature, which is not due to the other two, I have mixed the persons into one person; this is also wrong. Here belongs the rule of St. Augustine: Opera Trinitatis ad extra sunt indivisa, the works, which God has made from within the Godhead, are not to be divided, 5) that is, one should not divide the persons into the works, assigning to each one from without its different work; but one should distinguish the person from within the Godhead, and yet assign to all three from within each work without distinction.

67. so that I may give examples: The Father is my God and your God and Creator, who made me and you; the same work that I and you are, the Son also made, is both my God and your God and Creator as the Father. So, the Holy Spirit made the same work that I and you are, and is my God and your God and Creator, as well as the Father and Son. Nor are there 6) three Gods or Creators, but one God and Creator of us all. Here, with this faith, I keep myself from the heresy of Arii and his like, that I do not divide the one divine being into three gods or creators; but keep in the right Christian faith no more than the one God and Creator of all creatures.

68. Again, if I now go above and beyond the creation or creature into the intrinsic, incomprehensible essence of divine nature, I find, as the Scriptures teach me (for reason is nothing here), that the Father is another distinct person from the Son, in the one undivided eternal Godhead; his distinction is that he is Father, and has the Godhead not from the Son, nor from anyone; the Son is a distinct person from the Father, in the same one fatherly Godhead; His difference is that He is the Son, and has the Godhead not of Himself, nor of anyone, but of the Father alone, as eternally begotten of the Father; the Holy Spirit is a distinct person from the Father and the Son, in the same united Godhead; His difference is that He is the Holy Spirit, proceeding from the Father and the Son at the same time eternally, and having the Godhead not of Himself, nor of anyone, but both from the Father and the Son at the same time; and all this from everlasting to everlasting. Here, with this faith, I refrain from the heresy of Sabellii and his like, from Jews, Mahomet, and whoever else they are, who are smarter than God Himself, and do not mix the persons into one single person, but keep in the right Christian faith three different persons in the single, divine, eternal being, who nevertheless all three are one God, creator and agent of all things, towards us and the creatures.

69 All this is perhaps sharp or subtle to us Germans, and should remain cheaper in the schools. But because the devil stirs his tail in these last times, as if he would like to reawaken all kinds of heresy, and the world has become lustful and mad without it. Since we are tired of hearing new things, and weary of sound doctrine (as St. Paul prophesies in 2 Timothy 4:3), so that the devil's doors are open for him to lead in whatever he wants, it is useful and necessary that some, both laymen and scholars, especially pastors, preachers and schoolmasters, should also think of learning such necessary articles of our faith, and learn German.

talk. But if it be too hard for him, let him keep the catechism with the children, and pray against the devil and his heresy, against the Jews and Mahomet, lest he be led into temptation. Therefore, because we have come to this, we want to give those who like it more understanding of the article, that the one Godhead should not be separated, nor the persons mixed together, to strengthen and confess our faith.

(70) At the Jordan, when St. John baptized the Lord, heaven was opened and the Holy Spirit descended bodily in the form of a dove, and the Father's voice was heard: "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased," Luc. 3:22. Here the dove is a creature, which not only the Holy Spirit created, but also the Father and Son; as said that opera Trinitatis ad extra sunt indivisa: what is creature, God made Father, Son and Holy Spirit at the same time, as one God; nor is the dove called the Holy Spirit alone, or, as Lucas says, the Holy Spirit alone descended in the form of the dove, and in no way would the Christian faith suffer that you would say of the dove: This is God the Father, or this is God the Son; but you must say: This is God the Holy Spirit; although God the Father, Son and Holy Spirit are one God; that you quite rightly say of the dove: This is God, and is no other God; and yet wrongly say: This is God the Father, or God the Son; but you must say: This is God the Holy Spirit.

So the voice that speaks, "This is my dear Son," 2c. is a creature that not only the Father created, but also the Son and Holy Spirit, as said in Opera Trinitatis, etc., that apart from the Godhead all creatures are created at the same time by all three Persons, as by one God, and all three Persons are one God to the creature. And again, the creatures are one against the three persons, and not three works, nor is called and is the same voice of the Father alone; and cannot, as a Christian, say here of the voice: This is God the Holy Spirit, or: This is God the Son, but must say: This is God the Father; although God the Father, and God the Son, and God the Father, are one.

the Holy Spirit and God the Son and God the Father is one God; that you quite rightly say of the voice: This is God, and there is no other God; but wrongly say, This is God the Son, or God the Holy Spirit; but must say, This is God the Father.

(72) The same is to be said of the humanity of Christ, which is in itself a true creature, created at the same time by the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit; and is not to be suffered to believe that the Father alone, or the Son alone, or the Holy Spirit alone, created this creature or humanity; but is an opus indivisum Trinitatis, a work which all three Persons created as one God and Creator of one work; as the angel Gabriel says to the Virgin Mary, Luc. 1, 35: "The Holy Spirit will come upon you, and the power of the Most High will overshadow you." Not only is the Holy Spirit upon you (he says), but also "the Most High"; that is, the Father will overshadow you with his power, that is, through his Son or Word; also so "that which is born in you shall be and be called the Son of the Most High," that thus the whole Trinity is here as one Creator, and has created and made the one work, mankind, and yet the Person of the Son alone is united with it, and became man, not the Father, nor Holy Spirit.

73. and you cannot say of this man: This is God the Father; or: This is God the Holy Spirit; but you must say: This is God the Son; although God the Father, Son and Holy Spirit is one God, so that you quite rightly say of the man: This is God, and there is no other God; but you are wrong to say: This is God the 1) Father, or God the Holy Spirit, but you must say: This is God the Son; as St. Paul Col. 2, 9. says: "For in Christ dwells all the fullness of the Godhead," and yet the Father and the Holy Spirit are not deprived of the same Godhead, but are one God with the Son and the Man Christ. From this you see how the three divine persons are different, inwardly of the Godhead, to and not to be mixed into one person, and yet not to separate the divine one being, or to make three gods; but outwardly, against the creature, to be one creator, so completely united, that also the creature, if the persons take on themselves differently, are of all three persons as one God's one work.

The doctors, especially Bonaventure, give a rough simile to understand such a thing. As: If three virgins put on a garment among themselves, all three of them attacking the garment and putting it on the third, and the third herself also attacking it in the same way: then all three put on the garment of the third, and yet only the third is clothed with the garment, and not the other two. Thus it is to be understood here that all three persons, as one unified God, created the unified humanity and united it with the Son in His person, that only the Son is man, and not the Father, nor the Holy Spirit. In the same way, one should understand the dove, which takes on the person of the Holy Spirit, and the voice, which takes on the person of the Father. Item, the fiery tongues on the day of Pentecost, in which the person of the Holy Spirit is revealed. Item, the wind, and what more is preached of the Holy Spirit, that he should do in Christendom or the Scriptures.

(75) Here the question arises: Why then do we say, or rather, why does the Scripture teach us to say, "I believe in God the Father, Creator of heaven and earth, and do not also call the Son Creator? Item: In Jesus Christ, who was conceived by the Holy Spirit. Item: That the Holy Spirit gives life, and has spoken through the prophets. Here the persons are outwardly assigned their special different works, as they themselves are distinguished. This is perhaps too sharp for simple-minded Christians, who may stick to their simple-minded belief that God is Father, Son and Holy Spirit One God 2c. But one must speak of this in Christianity, and learn to resist the devil and his heretics. First of all, it is 2) certain that God wants to be known by us here in faith, there eternally in sight, as he is one God, and yet three persons; this is our eternal life, John 17:3. For this purpose he has given us his word and the holy scriptures, confirmed with great miraculous signs and works, that we should learn therein. For, if we were to know Him in this way, He would have to 1) truly teach us and reveal Himself to us and appear, so that we would not ascend to heaven on our own and find out what God is or what His divine nature is like. Well, for this he visibly needs his creature, as the Scriptures teach us, so that we may grasp it, for invisible creatures do not move our senses.

76 Accordingly, you must now view the creature in two ways. In the first way, as a creature or work in itself, absolute, so and so created or made by God. In this way, all creatures of God, that is, of all three persons, are one and the same work, without any difference; as has been said. For in this way they do not give us a different revelation of the three persons, because they are all the same work of the three persons, as of the one God. Secondly, you must look at them, not at themselves, absolute, but relative, according to their custom, as God uses them towards us. Here, God takes His creature, which has created all three persons, as a unified God, and needs it for an image or form, or shape, in which He reveals Himself and appears. Here are different images, shape, or revelation of the three different persons. So he needs the dove to be an image or revelation, in which the Holy Spirit reveals himself; and is a different image, which does not show the Father nor Son to us, but only the Holy Spirit, different. For the Father, Son and Holy Spirit wants the dove to show and reveal to us the Person of the Holy Spirit alone, so that we may be certain that God's one Being is certainly three distinct Persons from eternity. Therefore Lucas Cap. 3, 22: "The Holy Spirit descended in bodily form, like a dove."

(77) In the same way we speak of the Son, that he is revealed to us in mankind, or, as it were.

1) So the Jena and the Latin. Wittenberg and Erlangen: would have to.

St. Paul Phil. 2, 7. speaks in a servile form, grounded like another human being. And this form, or humanity, is not the image or revelation of the Father or the Holy Spirit, although it is the same creature of the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit, but it is a different form and revelation of the Son alone. For so it pleased God, that is, the Father, Son and Holy Spirit, that the Son through this form or shape of humanity would be revealed and recognized among men as a distinct person from the Father and Holy Spirit, in one eternal unified being of divine nature. The same is to be said of the Father, that he is revealed to us in the voice. This form or shape is not the Son's or Holy Spirit's form or revelation, but only the Father's, who in such different form has wished to be known to us as a distinct person from the Son and Holy Spirit, in one undivided divine being.

78 Take also from the Grammatica a rough example. When the priest baptizes, or absolves, and says, "In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit." These words are all God's creation and work in our mouths (as well as we ourselves and what we have), and are not different from the Father alone, or the Son alone, or the Holy Spirit alone, but from all three persons, the one God's one creature. But according to the interpretation or revelation, you must not say that this word "of the Father" means all three persons, but differentially the Father alone; the word "of the Son" differentially the Son alone; the word "of the Holy Spirit" differentially the Holy Spirit alone, in one unified Godhead, which is revealed to us by such words or interpretation, that three different persons are in the unified Godhead. For he saith not, In the names, as of many, or as if every person had a distinct name and essence; but "in the name" (saith he) as in One name of One essence, and yet three distinct persons.

79] So you see that the creature is to be regarded in two ways, ut res et signum, that it is something for itself, given by God.

and is also used to show or teach something else that it is not itself. Smoke is a res, a thing by itself, and yet also a sign of another thing which it is not, but shows and reveals the same, namely fire. Of this St. Augustine writes much de doctrina christiana; but here, in this high matter, it is something more. For the humanity of Christ is not a bad sign, or a living form, just as the dove is not a living form, and the voice is not a living form or image; but the humanity, in which God's Son is revealed differently, is full, and united with God in One Person, who will eternally sit at the right hand of God in His kingdom, as promised to David, 1 Chron. 18, 12. 18, 12. The dove is a form, taken by the Holy Spirit for a time, to reveal itself; not united with Him in One Person eternally, but left again; like the angels take human form, appear in it, and leave again. So it is also done with the voice of the Father. For there is no promise that it should remain forever, but it is a temporal revelation.

80. Now, when we speak in child faith: "I believe in God the Father, Almighty Creator of heaven and earth," is not the opinion that the Person of the Father alone should be Almighty, Creator and Father, but that the Son is also Almighty, Creator and Father; the Holy Spirit also Almighty, Creator and Father; and yet not three Almighty, Creator, Fathers, but one Almighty, Creator, Father of heaven and earth, and of us all, just as the Father is our Savior and Redeemer, the Son our Savior and Redeemer, the Holy Spirit our Savior and Redeemer, and yet not three Saviors nor Redeemers, but one Savior and Redeemer. Just as the Father is our God, the Son our God, the Holy Spirit our God, yet not three Gods, but one God: so the Holy Spirit sanctifies Christianity, the Father also, the Son also, yet are not three saints or sanctifiers, but one sanctifier 2c. Opera Trinitatis ad extra sunt indivisa...

(81) But all this is said so that we may believe and recognize the three persons in the one Godhead, and not mix the persons, nor separate the essence. The distinction of the Father (as we have heard [§ 68]) is that he has the Godhead from no one, but has given it from eternity, through the eternal birth, to the Son. Therefore the Son is God and Creator, like the Father; but he has all this from the Father, not again, the Father from the Son. For that the Father is God and Creator, he did not get that from the Son; but that the Son is God and Creator, he got that from the Father. So the Father or the Son does not get from the Holy Spirit that he is God and Creator; but that the Holy Spirit is God and Creator, that he gets from the Father and the Son. So the word "God Almighty, Creator" is written for the Father, and not for the Son and Holy Spirit, to note the difference of the Father from the Son and Holy Spirit in the Godhead. Again, the difference of the Son from the Father and Holy Spirit, 1) of the Holy Spirit from the Father and Son; namely, that the Father is the origin or source (so it should be called, as the Fathers do) of the Godhead, from whom the Son has it, and the Holy Spirit from the Son and Father for ever; and not again.

82) Above such inward difference of persons is now the outward difference, since the Son and Holy Spirit is revealed inwardly. The Son in humanity; for the Son alone became man, conceived by the Holy Spirit, born of Mary the Virgin, suffered for us, died 2c. as faith teaches further. But that nevertheless rightly means: God died for us. For the Son is God, and is no longer another God, but more persons in the same Godhead. The Holy Spirit alone is manifested differently in the fiery tongues, gifts, various tongues and miraculous signs 2c., although mankind is made of all three persons, and the fiery tongues, the gifts of the Holy Spirit, of all three per

It The words: "in the Godhead. Again, the difference of the Son from the Father and Holy Spirit" are missing in the original edition.

The first is that they are the creature and the work of others, as has been said enough for this time. One has delicious books about this, St. Augustine, Hilarii, Cyrilli, and such articles have remained pure in the papacy and among the school theologians that we have no quarrel with them about this.

Here some are concerned whether they call the person of the Father when they pray "Our Father" or the divine being? It is no wonder that, in this whimsical, incomprehensible article, whimsical thoughts occur to a man, one of which sometimes fails, or a word fails. But where the foundation of faith remains firm, such splinters, shavings or straws will not harm us. But the reason for faith (as stated in § 66 ff.) is that you believe that there are three persons in the one Godhead, and that each person is the same one perfect God; so that the persons are not mixed, the essence is not divided, but the difference of the persons and the unity of the essence remain. For this is that the angels for ever cannot be satisfied (as St. Peter [1 Ep. 1, 12] says) with seeing and marveling, and are eternally blessed; and if they could see it to the end, their blessedness would also be over and have an end; as we also shall see this, and thereby be eternally blessed, as the Lord says Jn. 17, 3: "This is life eternal, that they may know thee, and him whom thou hast sent, Jesus Christ." However, faith must hold to the word; reason can do nothing here, except to say that it is impossible, and contrary to itself, that three persons, each one a perfect God, and yet no more than a single God, and the Son alone a man; but to him who has the Father and Son, the Holy Spirit will well be known, from the Father and the Son.

84. so you have heard above [§ § 67. 80] that the Father is all our God and Father, the Son is all our God and Father, the Holy Spirit is all our God and Father; and yet is not more than one single God our Father. For the essence is undivided; therefore, whichever person you call, you have called the right one God in three persons, because each person is the same one complete God, and cannot err or fail in this. For Jesus Christ is not a

The Father and the Holy Spirit are not another God or Father or Creator, because the Father and the Holy Spirit are, even though they are another person. The Father and the Holy Spirit are also like that.

Therefore, it is not only wrong, but also impossible and void, that you would call the person of the Father, as the distinct person, Father, and not call the Son and Holy Spirit at the same time Father; for that would mean the divine essence separated, and the Son and Holy Spirit excluded. This is nothing. For according to such a way of personal fatherhood, the Father has no more than One Son, and the Son no more than One Father. He is not such a Father to you, and you are not such His Son; but this is the only Son from the Father forever, as the 2nd Psalm, v. 7, says: "The Lord said to me, 'You are my Son, today I have given birth to you'; but you are, according to your age, thirty, forty, fifty years, as long as you have been created and baptized, a temporal Son of all three Persons, One God. Quia opera Trinitatis ad extra sunt indivisa; sic cultus Trinitatis ad extra est indivisus; what God does to the creature, all three persons do without distinction.

For there is one divine essence of all three persons, and what we or the creature do to any person, we do to the one God, and to all three persons without distinction. For he is one God toward us, and in himself three persons distinct; as the Lord Christ himself says John 14:9, 10: "Philip, he who sees me sees the Father; how then do you say: Show us the Father? Do you not believe that I am in the Father, and the Father in me?" Joh. 5, 23. "They shall honor the Son, even as the Father." Joh. 10, 30. 31.: "I and the Father are One"; that is what we speak: One Thing, One Being, One God, One Lord. Here the Jews dug up stones and wanted to stone Him. Joh. 5, 17: "My Father works, or creates until now, and I also work"; therefore the Jews rather sought to kill him, that he not only broke the Sabbath, but also said that God was his Father, and made himself equal to God 2c., Joh. 10, 33. I will stop now, because I wanted to write a book, so I got into preaching:

Read the Gospel of John, which teaches us all these things abundantly.

Now we have Moses agreeing with St. John that there was a Word in the beginning by which all things were made, and that such a Word could not be a creature or made, and yet be something other, or another Person, than God, of whom such a Word is. For since it is not made, but all things are made by it, it must be God, Creator of all creatures, since it is certain that apart from the creature that is made, there can be nothing but God who makes it; and yet the Word, the God and Creator by whom all things are made, is other than the speaker, or who speaks such a word. Hereby Moses became our witness and a Christian, teaching the very thing that we Christians teach, namely, that God had a Word in the beginning by which all things were made, as John writes.

Now let us also hear the other legate, Saint Paul, recently greeting and calling Moses. Col. 1, 15. ff. he speaks of our Lord Jesus Christ thus: "Who is the image of the invisible God, the firstborn before all creatures. For by him were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are of the earth, visible and invisible; both thrones, and dominions, and principalities, and authorities; all things were created by him, and for him; and he is before all, and all things consist in him." These words could not have been spoken by Christ after mankind, that is certain; for he was not man before all creatures, but is Heuer 1543 year that he became man. And truly this is a mighty and clear saying, that Christ is an eternal God, Creator of heaven and earth, and that still today and forever all things exist, are preserved, or are made through Him, even all things that are high in heaven and earth, angels and spirits, visible and invisible. In this he agrees with John, when he says in Cap. 1, 3: "All things were made through him, and without him was not anything made that was made." If Moses hears and confesses the words of John, he certainly also hears and confesses these words of Paul, and says: "Yes, my dear Paul, just as you and John say, so I also wrote that all things were created by the Word, Gen. 1, 3. ff.

89. further Paul says 1 Cor. 10, 4: "They drank of the spiritual rock that went with them, but the rock was Christ". If Christ was at that time the one who went with the children of Israel, and from whom they drank spiritually and were baptized spiritually, that is, if they had the same faith with us in the future Christ who has now appeared to us, then Christ must be the true eternal God. For one cannot believe in the angels, which is due to God alone, nor can they be our spiritual food; God Himself must be. Item, there 1 Cor. 10. he says, v. 9: "Let us not tempt Christ, as some tempted [him], and were slain of serpents." What is to be done here? Moses writes everywhere that it is the LORD Jehovah, the right one God, whom the children of Israel tempted, Ex. 17:2: "Why do you tempt the LORD?" 4 Mos. 14, 22. Says the LORD, "They have tempted me ten times." If it is the Lord, as Moses writes, how can it be Christ, as Paul writes? Now they must both write rightly; for the Holy Spirit is not contrary to Himself.

90. From this it follows tremendously and irrefutably that the God who led the people of Israel out of Egypt and through the Red Sea, guided them in the desert through the pillar of cloud and pillar of fire, fed them with the bread of heaven, and performed all the miracles described by Moses in his books; item, who brought them into the land of Canaan, and therein gave them kings and priesthood and all things, is the very God, and none other than Jesus of Nazareth, the Son of Mary the Virgin, whom we Christians call our God and Lord, whom the Jews crucified, and still today blaspheme and curse, as Isaiah Cap. 8, 21: "In their fear they will curse their king and their God. Item, it is he who gives Mosi the ten commandments on Mount Sinai, and says Ex. 20, 2. 3.: "I, the LORD, am your God, who brought you out of Egypt; you shall have no other gods before me." Yes, JESus Nazarene, died on the cross for us, is the GOOD who speaks in the first commandment: "I, the LORD, am your GOOD." If the Jews and Mahomet should hear such, how they should rave! Nevertheless, it is true, and must remain true forever, and he who does not believe it must tremble and burn forever.

91. for Moses stands clear, saying that by the saying, or word, of God all things were made; and David Ps. 33:6: "The heavens were made by the word of God. If the heavens are made by the word, then all other creatures are made by it; for he who makes one creature makes them all; he who does not make them all will not be able to make any. And so Moses and David agree with Johanne and Paulo, who also both say alike with them, "All things were created and made by the Word," or by Christ." Now if all things were made through him, and without him nothing was made, as the text of all four, Moses, David, John, and Paul, says; then under that which they call "all things" must be included, and not excluded, the exportation out of Egypt, and what more was done in the people of Israel; yea, all things that have been done everywhere from the beginning of creatures, are still being done, and will be done henceforth. For they are great and important words, saying, "All things were made by him." And as Moses says, "God said, Let there be; and there was." Although Moses does not name the Son, or Christ, according to the Grammatica, yet he names and confesses the saying, or Word, by which all things were made; so that he indicates that in GOD there is another who speaks, and another who is the Word, and yet is one Creator of all creatures. For something must also be reserved for the New Testament, in which the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit are more clearly named, which 1) in the Old Testament God is called the Speaker, the Word, and the Spirit of the Lord.

Therefore the Jews, Turks and heretics do not help that they pretend to great devotion and boast against us Christians how they believe in the one God, Creator of heaven and earth, and also call Him Father with great earnestness, and yet it is nothing but vain, useless words, in which they use the name of God uselessly and misuse it against the other commandment; as Christ says John 8:54 to the Jews: "It is my Father who honors me, whom you say is your God, and you know him. 8, 54. to the Jews: "It is my Father who honors me, whom you say is your God, and you know him.

1) so. Trinity. Cruciger: yui, related a "f the previously inserted by him" vsus.

him not." Indeed, this rhymes very badly, calling the Father God, and not knowing who he is. For if you were to ask such a great holy 2) Jew, Turk, heretic, whether he also believes 3) that the same one God, Creator of heaven and earth (whose name they so devoutly praise and call Father, though all falsely), is also a Father, and has a Son apart from the creature in the Godhead? he would be terrified of great holiness, and consider such a thing an abominable blasphemy. If you ask further: whether this same God, Creator, Father (whom they thus call with their lying mouth), is also a son, and has a father in the Godhead? then he would plug his ears with great devotion, grit his teeth, 4) and worry that the earth would devour you and him. If you ask further: whether this same God, Creator, Father (as they boast), is also a Holy Spirit, and has the Father and Son, from whom he has his divine nature? then the most holy man would run away from you, as if you were the worst devil out of hell.

Here you see that they do not know what God is; and when they call Him: GOD, Creator, Father, they do not know what they say. For where God is not to be such a God (as the Scriptures teach us), who is a natural Father, a natural Son, and both have a natural Holy Spirit, in the one divine essence, God is nothing, and no God at all. Therefore, they have no God without taking God's name in vain and with sins, and invent for themselves their own God and Creator, who shall be their Father and they his children; take from him his natural fatherhood, his natural united son, and the natural Holy Spirit, that is, the whole right Godhead, and give him in exchange their vain dream and lies of God, Creator, Father; yes, such holy name of God they give to their dream and lies, that is, to the devil, who is their God and Father, a father of all lies; want to

94. For it has been decided, and thus God Himself has revealed Himself to us, that He is one God, Creator and Father of heaven and earth; and the same one God, Creator and Father of all the world, is a natural Father of one Son in the Godhead; and the same one God, Creator and Father of all the world, is one natural Son of the Father in the Godhead; and the same one God, Creator and Father of all the world, is a Holy Spirit, of the Father and Son in the Godhead. For the three distinct persons are one God, Creator and Father of all the world; and each person is the same complete one God, Creator and Father of all the world. And when you call upon Jesus Christ, and say: O my dear Lord God, my Creator and Father, Jesus Christ, you one eternal God! you must not worry 1) that the Father and the Holy Spirit will be angry about it; but realize 2) that whichever person you call upon, you call upon all three persons, and upon the one God; for you cannot call upon one person without the others, since there is a single, undivided divine essence in all, and in each person. Again, you cannot deny any person in particular, there are all three and the one God denied altogether; as 1 John 2:23 says, "He that denieth the Son hath not the Father."

95 Yes, I say, it is not wrong, but well done, if you call upon Jesus Christ in this way, just as the church also sings of the Holy Spirit: Veni Pater pauperum, come, you Father of the miserable. But it is better to keep the order of the persons, and not to despise, as the apostles do, and the church does according to their example, when they name the person of the Father in the invocation or prayer, as in the Lord's Prayer 2c. For he is the origin or fountain (as it can be called) of the Godhead in the Son and Holy Spirit, and the Son (when the Father is named) cannot be separated, but must be named at the same time.

and meant. So also, the Holy Spirit must be named and meant with the Father and the Son, because no person can be a special God apart from the other. Thus St. Paul [2 Cor. 1, 3] and St. Peter [1 Ep. 1, 3] say: "Praise be to God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of all graces"; and he himself in the Gospel always prefigures the Father, and ascribes everything to him, and yet says, Joh. 5, 23. that they should honor the Son as the Father; item, Joh. 16, 15.: "All that the Father has is mine"; without the Father being the first person from whom the Son has it; and not again. But that some sins are committed differently against the Father, against the Son, and in the Holy Spirit, belongs to the revelation of the persons, not to the separation of the essence, of which a little has been said above, and more elsewhere, (96) But how shall we do this, since St. John continues to write of the word, saying, "The Word became flesh. This will not rhyme with the word of which Moses writes, "God said, Let there be light"; or of which David says, "The heavens were made by the word of the Lord." So Moses, or the Word Himself (as we believe), commanded on Mount Sinai, Ex. 20:4, that no image or likeness should be made to Him, either in heaven or on earth; and John makes not an image, but a creature and man of it, saying [John 1:14], "The Word was made man." Paul does the same, and says [Rom. 1, 3. Gal. 4, 4.]: "He is the Son of David, or seed, born of a woman's image." Therefore Moses must speak of another word by which all things were created. By a man, who is himself a creature, nothing can be created. Also Paul and John are against themselves, that they make him a man, and yet say that all things were created by him.

97 Let us see if Moses can be found to say this. In Genesis 3:15 he writes that God said to the serpent: "I will put enmity between you and the woman, between your seed and her seed; he shall bruise your head, and you shall bruise his heel. It is obvious that God is not talking here about a common serpent that lives in the grass or in the water.

1) Walch and the Erlanger: say".
2) We have assumed with Cruciger "Father, Son and Holy Spirit" as subject to "recognize". He translates: st totin ciivinitntsin nAnosesrs st vslut nntsStari.

It is not a bad, silly snake that eats frogs, but the serpent, which at that time was a beautiful animal and had a high spirit with it, which could not only speak, but also speak of high, divine things and commandments, as if it had learned it in heaven, which is not given to any creature, except the angels and men, and thereby does such harm that it causes man to fall into sin and eternal death, through the most beautiful appearance of the divine name. This is not a bad, silly little snake that eats frogs, but devours the whole world. It is the sorrowful devil in the serpent, who brought death into the world through sin. God speaks of this death-slayer and sin-master and world-eater that his head shall be crushed, that is, his power, death and sin shall be destroyed, life and righteousness shall be brought back.

98 And the seed of the woman shall do this. And as he fell man by a woman, which came from man without a woman, so shall the seed, which shall come from woman without a man, fall him again. This seed of the woman will have to be a man and a son; for in the Scriptures "man's seed" is called the fruit which is a son of a man (as is known), and it is quite special in this place that this child or man is called "woman's seed". Otherwise "seed" is called everywhere the man's or father's seed, as, Abraham's seed, David's seed, and so on, through and through, in Moses and the prophets "seed" is called the man's seed; that Moses in this place reads just like Lucas and Matthew, that this woman shall be a virgin, who without a man shall become a mother of her own seed alone. And because this rhymes with the New Testament, we Christians, according to the established rule, should not allow either Jews or devils to have any other understanding.

99. Summa, this seed of a woman shall be a man, that is certain; in addition, he must truly be God, or Moses will be an idolatrous prophet of the devil. For he gives this seed the power that belongs to God alone and to no creature, namely, that he should put away death and the slayer, sin and God's wrath, and restore righteousness and life.

bring. Dear, this no angel, nor all angels together will not do; it must be a higher, mightier man than all angels and all creatures are. A damned idolatrous prophet (I still say once) must be Moses, if he gives such works, which strangle and overcome death and sin, 1) to make alive and righteous, to a woman's seed, which is a mere creature, and not itself the one God, who alone can make alive, 2) as Joh. 1, 4. says of the word: "In him was life."

100. Reason itself must confess that whoever can subdue death can also restore life; whoever can subdue sin can restore righteousness; since to take away death is no different than to restore life; to take away sin is no different than to restore righteousness, of which the serpent (the devil in the serpent) brought Adam and Eve, along with all their descendants and children of men, evil, and by his lies fell into sin and death; as the text clearly states Gen. 2, 17: "You shall not eat of the tree, or you shall die." Against this the liar and murderer says Gen. 3, 4: "You may eat from it, and you will not die, but you will become like God and know everything. That is (as said above [§ 97]) all about sins and death, which the serpent has created and caused. Therefore, the serpent's subversion must be nothing else than destroying his work and power; as Paul says that Christ destroyed death and brought life to light, 2 Tim. 1, 10. What Jews, Mahomet, and others here make up with their glosses, we pay no attention to. Moses agrees here with the New Testament, that is enough for us.

Adam and Eve also had such a mind, that the seed of the woman must be God, who should crush the head of the devil. For Gen. 4, 1. when Eve gave birth to Cain, she thought, perhaps because 3) the firstborn man on earth, he would be the best, and thought he should be the seed of the woman, but she the mother, or the woman; therefore she says, "I have the man, the LORD"; as if to say, This will be the man, the LORD, of whom GOD has spoken, the woman's seed 2c. Call the child a man and HErrn, or GOtt; for here stands the great and own name of GOtt, Jehovah, which means nothing else but GOtt Himself alone in His nature or being; and XXX, which, where it stands alone, without a woman, does not mean badly a man-image, as all men are; but a Ausbund and distinguished man; as we Germans also say: This is a man! That wants to become a man! So Eva wants here: I have born a son, he will become a man, yes, he is the man, God Himself, who shall do it, and tread down the serpent, as God has spoken to us. How is it possible? how can it be possible for her to speak of her child in this way: I have the man, the Lord, when she had not understood the saying that the seed of the woman must be God, who should do what God had spoken?

She will not have understood it like this alone, but Adam will have talked with her about it long before, and will have practiced this saying among themselves, and will have comforted themselves against sin and death, which should be taken away by this seed, and the innocence and life of the lost should be brought back; otherwise they would have despaired. So God's will is not yet wise, that his outward word (like this) should be spoken in vain and not be understood by anyone; as he says Isa. 55, 11: "My word shall not return to me empty, but I will send it. Now there were only two people here, Adam and Eve, who could understand it, therefore they must have understood it fruitfully, blessedly and rightly, however, as we Christians, and before that all prophets have understood it.

103. In this the dear wretched mother Eve is lacking, that she thinks she is the woman, because there is no other woman on earth but she alone; and with great desire and longing she hopes that her son shall be the seed, the husband of Jehovah. This is too soon and too much hastened; but [she].

is not to be blamed that she would like to be rid of the sins and death, that is, of the devil soon. But God did not say to her: Your seed shall do it; also not to Adam: Your wife's seed shall be it, but reads to both of them their good text, which all human children still feel, until the end of the world. But to the serpent he turns, and says: I will again create for thee a tramp on the head, which shall be the seed of a woman; I will fell thee haughty, mighty, evil spirit by the son of man, that again all men shall run over thee and trample thee under their feet, as thou hast now trampled Adam and Eve under thee. This has done, is doing, and will do forever, our dear Lord Jesus Christ, with God the Father One Jehovah, Amen.

Here someone would like to say: How is it possible that neither a Christian nor a Jew has seen this in this place? Because the interpreters all do it differently. The Latin therefore: "I have received a man through God". 1) The other Hebrew thus: I got the man from the Lord. I do not ask now. I have above [Preface § 9] often conditioned, I want to have this time no master, but indicate my opinion in interpretation. If no one likes it, it is enough that [it] pleases only one. The Hebrew word XX is "the" or "the", and is an article accusativi, as all grammatici must confess. When Genesis Cap. 1, 1. says: "In the beginning God created XX heavens, and XX earth": that means in German: the heavens and the earth, and always so, in that and the following chapter. As "Adam recognized XX Heva, his wife". "Heva gave birth to XX Cain." Item, further she bore XXX Habel, his brother. Item, Adam begat XX Seth; Seth begat XX Enos; and so on. Just according to the manner Eve speaks here, since she had born Cain: XXXXXXXXX: I have got the man, the Lord. For she hopes (as said), Cain should be the seed, which was promised by God to crush the serpent's head.

105 And I know for certain, when the worst

1) Thus the old rationalists (e.g. Gesenius) and some newer Lutheran theologians, e.g. Köstlin, Martin Luther (3rd ed.), vol. II, p. 602, who calls Luther's translation and interpretation an "exegetical aberration".

Jews, who crucified Christ, or would be even worse than those, who would like to crucify him even now much more cruel; as one says of those, who crucified a cat in Hungary at Ofen the other day together with the Turks and carried it away, to mock God, our Lord Jesus Christ, with many shameful blasphemous words: such wicked, poisonous GOD and cat crucifiers, if they could believe, or had to confess (without faith) the truth of the language otherwise, they would say thus: Yes, you cursed goyim, if it were true that the seed of the woman was God and man, then we ourselves would well know that the text rhymes from the measure of his, since Eve speaks: "I have gotten the man, the Jehovah", and freely confess that the language gladly and finely gives that this son, the man and God, the Lord, would be. But what one interprets differently here, as: I got the man through the Lord, or from the Lord, or with the Lord, is a forced, naughty thing, and not the right kind and nature of language, nor can anyone else prove it. Yes, in this way the wicked people would have to confess. But since they cannot stand that God is man born of a female image, this text and the whole of Scripture must be wrong, or have them make another nose.

(106) In the same way, all other Hebrew scholars, if they look at the text correctly, would have to confess that this woman's seed is Jehovah, that is, God and man. For that this little word XX means "the" or "the", and is a nota accusativi, that is proven, convinced, known by all Hebrews, Jews and Christians in all grammars. But that it should also be ad, de, vel cum, of, or with, or through, is still unproven, and should probably remain unproven. For on the examples they lead from Rabbi Kimhi, or from Scripture, it can easily be said that the Hebrew language has never come up again, and the Jews cannot know virtutem omnium vocabulorum, sicut res ostendit; much less do they know vim phrasis, figurarum et idiotismorum; but they doubt, equivocir, grope, and seek, as an unlearned organist seeks the claves or organ pipes, and asks: Is it you, is it you?

For, as teachers of the Latin language write, it is much another thing to speak Latin, and to speak grammatically: so also it is much another thing to speak Hebrew, and to speak grammatically. Grammatically they may speak, but very unfinished; but Hebrew, pure, good, and finished speaking, is now impossible. Everyone learns German, or other languages, much better from oral speech, at home, in the marketplace, and in sermons, than from books. The letters are dead words, the oral speech are living words, which do not give themselves so actually and well in writing, as the spirit or soul of man gives them through the mouth. As St. Jerome writes of Demosthene and Aeschine in prologo, and of Livio: Habet, nescio quid, latentis energiae viva vox. Especially this is no good, since they pretend that XX may be called de, a, ab, that is, from; as: I got the man from the Lord; because the examples 1 Mos. 44, 4. 2 Mos. 9, 29.: Egressi XX urbe, and the like, do not do it; because one says quite well: Egressus urbem, aedificavit lapides in altare, but appositive.

But that Moses also writes, Gen. 5, 22. and 6, 9.: Enoch ambulavit nx Deum, Noha ambulavit XX Deum; that they interpret: Enoch and Noah walked with GOD; this is no good, and does not read. Where did they walk with God? Towards the morning or towards the evening? It should be: ambulavit Deum, in accusativo; as the Latin also speak so: Vixit Sardanapalum; qui Curios<sup>1</sup>) simulant et bachanalia vivunt; exiit patrem; sic: Noha ambulavit Deum, id est, divinam viam, duxit vitam divinam; gessit et fecit opus Dei. So also St. Paul speaks Gal. 1, 10.: An suadeo Deum, vel homines? id est: An doceo divina vel humana? Ibidem Cap. 2, 20: Quod vivo. Rom. 6, 10: Quod vivit, vivit Deo. Idem 1 Petr. 4, 6. this and all more I know the Hebrews; as, 1 Mos. 39, 2.: The Lord was XX Joseph, with Joseph. Here we Germans must say so, but it does not give the accusativum well, and yet is accusativi nota in Ebraeo; it shall remain so. That is enough of the saying, since

1) Ouilos Dsntatus, the "defeater" of Pßrrhus, known for his great temperance.

943 Eve, or rather Moses, agrees with the New Testament that this seed of the woman is Jehovah, and understood by her and Moses thus, otherwise they both might well have spoken it differently.

109) Here also belongs the saying of Moses, Gen. 22, 18, where God promises Abraham with an oath, saying: "In your seed all XXX (Gentiles) on earth shall be blessed. Here the word XXX is written so that the present Jews (are they otherwise Jews) may revile and curse us, precisely so that we may boast of this blessing that God promises to Abraham, saying, "All XXX shall be blessed in your seed"; but they, the circumcised saints, want us Gentiles to be cursed, and they alone to be the seed of Abraha. But because they curse the Gentiles, and are such a seed by which all the Gentiles are cursed, it is evident that they are not Abraham's seed, but the devil's seed. For it is God, whose judgment is right and certain, who says that Abraham's seed shall not curse the Gentiles, as they do, but all the Gentiles shall be blessed in him; as has been done for 1543 years, and will be done until eternity.

Now, this blessing is not a human blessing, as one blesses with words, or wishes good morning or evening, for man cannot bless in any other way. Nor is it a devilish blessing, so that sorceresses bless children, cattle and the like, that they may prosper and be protected from misfortune. Neither is it a Jewish blessing, which is to be powerful and do wonders through the Shamhaperes 1) and their sorcery, with letters and figures, or God's name tetragrammaton; as the Turks' blessing is also the devil's blessing and idolatry, since they bless each other with letters and words in the fight, against iron and all weapons. Neither is it a papal blessing, which charms the water and wax, that they should become holy water and Agnus Dei, and get and help many virtues above their natural virtue: but it is a divine blessing, which GOD alone can and will give. Such a blessing is not a mere word that gives us good morning or wishes us good morning, and nothing follows from it, but gives and creates everything that it speaks. As Gen. 1, 28. God blessed all animals and men, and said: XXXX XXX: "Be fruitful, and multiply." There it does not remain with the bare word, but follows from it the work, namely that animals and humans became fruitful, and multiplied, until they filled the world. And such a blessing stands and continues until the end of the world. For by such we are what we are and have, in body, soul, goods, and all that is or will be.

1) Bergleiche Luther's writing of the Shem Hamphoras, St. Louis edition, vol. XX, 2051, K 60. In K 146 of this writing, "Schamhafteres" is correctly found, while the editions here offer "Schemhaperes".

So this divine blessing, promised in Abraham's seed, is also a real, actual, living blessing, which creates what it says or blesses. For it is promised and given against the curse into which the serpent has plunged us through Adam's disobedience and sin, and herewith the promise of the woman's seed is negated, and is now to be called Abraham's seed; as it became David's seed afterward, and finally the virgin's seed. Therefore, "blessing in the seed of Abraham" means as much here as it does above [Gen. 3:15]: "The seed of the woman shall bruise the head of the serpent," that is, it shall take away sin and death, and bring back innocence and life. For sin and death is the curse under which we would have to lie forever, unless we were blessed again through this seed, that is, made alive and righteous, holy and blessed. Yes, so we are blessed in this seed of Abraham; yes, we boast of the blessing of Goyim, and accept it by faith, are very hopeful, proud and splendid against the devil, his power, death and sin, and all that is more; thus we sing and say: In the seed of Abraham, David and Mary the woman, we have forgiveness of sins, remission of sins, redemption from sins, salvation from death and all evil: "For he is made unto us of God", 1 Cor. 1, 30, "our righteousness, our wisdom, our redemption, our sanctification", our blessing, our comfort, life and joy forever. Praise be to God for ever and ever, Amen.

112. now shall this seed of abraham sol-

If the God of God is able to give and create a strong and substantial blessing among the nations, he will not have to be a mere man who cannot say more than "Good morning" to us, which all men can do, but must be the true, natural, one God, who has such blessings powerfully in his hand. For, to abolish sin and death, to give righteousness and life, are not the works of men nor of angels, but only of the one, eternal, divine Majesty, Creator of heaven and earth. Again: If he is to be Abraham's seed, that is, his child and son, he must not be pure God, but a true, natural man, of Abraham's flesh and blood; that is, he must be both God and man in one person. Further: Because he is not the person who speaks to Abraham of the seed or this person: "In your seed shall all the Gentiles be blessed", he must be another, different person. For he who says to Abraham, "In thy seed," 2c., is not Abraham's seed, but speaks as of another, who is to be Abraham's seed. From this the difference of the two persons is derived, and yet the one, undivided God remains in his one divine being. Here the third person is found at the same time, who verbally expresses such things through Moses or angels from these two persons; as it is said above [§ 9 ff.] that the Holy Spirit is assigned the utterance of the verbal word, in which he is revealed to us differently; just as the humanity of the Son is different and its own revelation.

For us Christians, it is even more evident that the mother of this seed of Abraham must be a virgin, who should conceive and bear him without sin by the Holy Spirit. For if he was to be conceived by a man (like other Adam's children), he himself would also have to be conceived in sins, as the 51st Psalm, v. 7, laments of all men: "Behold, in sins I am conceived" 2c. According to the way he himself would need another seed, in which he would have to be blessed, that is, redeemed from sins and death, and would not be a blessing for us, nor be able to give us one. But from this saying we have St. Paulum a rich preacher, especially to the Romans and Galatians, since he teaches Abraham's and David's seed in this masterly way, that it is not necessary for us Christians to go on about it this time; for it is our daily bread and constant preaching, reading and singing.

Now see if Moses is not a good Christian, who so beautifully agrees with St. Paul and the whole New Testament. Should not the cursing Jews and devil-seeds stone such a heretic, as they often wanted to do in the desert? Should he be their prophet and master? O he is not worthy, with such heresy, that a circumcised saint should hear him called with his most holy ears; his name must be cursed with the accursed goyim, to whom he proclaims such glorious, blessed blessings. Although he does not exclude them with the word "all Goyim", for the people of Israel are also often called Goy in the Scriptures; but they exclude themselves, as David prophesies about them Ps. 109, 17. 18.: "He does not want the blessing, so it will remain far from him; he wants the curse, it will also come to him. And put on the curse like a shirt (the next garment on the body), and it has gone into his inward parts like water (through blood and flesh), and like oil into his bones" (through marrow and legs). We Christians now well understand the word of Christ Joh. 5, 46.: "If you believed Mosi, you also believed me, because of me he wrote." Certainly written, through his whole book, where he speaks of God and of Messiah. Item, the word Joh. 8, 56.: "Abraham, your father, was glad that he should see my day, and he saw it, and rejoiced." Where did he see it? In this saying, when he heard how his seed should be God and man, who should bless all nations, redeem them from sin and death, and make them eternally alive, holy and blessed; just as David, 1 Chron. 18, 16, had the same joy when the same son was promised to him.

115 Let us hear another saying from Moses. Ex. 33, 19. 20. when God was angry with the people because of the golden calf, and was not willing to go with the people, nor to take care of them, but commanded everything to Moses and sent an angel to him, he would no longer speak to the people, but spoke only to Moses, who said: "Let your glory be to me.

see. The Lord answered: I will pass all my goodness before thy face, and I will preach in the name of the LORD before thee, and will be gracious to whom I am gracious, and will have mercy on whom I have mercy. And said, My face thou canst not see, for no man can see me, and live." Look at this text, regardless of what ravens 1) or Jews devil in it, whether it also rhymes with the New Testament according to the unadulterated kind of language. Here the Lord Mosi answers, since he desires to see his glory, and says: It cannot be. But nevertheless he promises Mosi that he will let all his goods pass before him. This is a person, the father, who speaks of his son (who is all his goods, through whom he made all things), whom Moses, that is, his regiment and people of Israel, shall see, not in glory, but in a passing over, here in temporal life. For Moses in these stories and visions is not the born Moses of his father Amram, a privatus Moses, but the appointed prophet and head of the people of Israel, to whom he gives the law.

Immediately after this another person says: "And I will preach before you in the name of the Lord. Here you hear that the Lord will preach before Moses, that is, before the people of Israel, in the name of the Lord. What is this said: I the LORD will preach in the name of the LORD? Must there not be two different persons? One Lord who preaches and one Lord in whose name the Lord preaches. Now this preacher, who is a Lord, must certainly become a man if he is to preach before Moses and Israel. For the ministry of preaching God has commanded men, as prophets and apostles, through whom he proclaims his word to us. But what the preaching is to be in the name of the LORD follows: "I will be gracious to whom I am gracious, and have mercy on whom I have mercy," that is, I will not preach as you, Moses, must preach. For you must preach the law, thus: I command thee this day to do and to keep this and that: if not, it shall not be well with thee. But I will preach thus that in the sight of God the Lord no man is righteous or justified by the law, for no man keeps it as he ought, and is guilty of keeping it. Therefore your preaching makes vain and miserable people, showing them their sin, before which they cannot keep the law; therefore St. Paul calls it a ministry of sin and death, 2 Cor. 3, 6. Gal. 2, 16.

(117) But my preaching in the name of the Lord is thus: The Lord will do it himself, and his own merit and righteousness shall count for nothing, but he that shall have it shall have it by grace and mercy alone. He who seeks grace and mercy without merit shall have it. That is, "To whom I am gracious, I am gracious." So it is not said, "Whoever has the law or boasts of merit, I am gracious to him, but he who boasts of my graces, of him I am gracious to God. So that this saying goes primarily straight and mighty, not against the wretched sinners who are captive to the law, but against the stiff-necked, iron, brazen pride of their own righteousness. Behold, this is called preaching in the name of the Lord, that is, God wants to do what Christ preaches; but He preaches only grace, and says Joh. 7, 19: "None of you keep the law; and Joh. 8, 24: "If you do not believe that I am (that is, that I am the Jehovah, the First, the God Himself), then you must die in your sins." Joh. 1, 17.: "The law was given through Moses, but grace and truth came through JESum Christ."

Now hold such an opinion of the text of Moses in this place against the New Testament, and tell me if it does not rhyme with the same in a very fine, unconstrained, and very happy way, that one must neither force nor torture a word with strange glosses against its natural interpretation, but, as they read in the Hebrew language, so they agree with our Christian faith, which teaches us in the New Testament that Jesus Christ is Jehovah, God and man, and was preacher to the people of Israel; as St. Paul calls him Romans 15:8, minister circumcisionis, a preacher to the circumcised people of Israel; and he himself says Matthew 15:24. Paul calls him Rom. 15, 8, minister circumcisionis, a preacher of the circumcised people of Israel; and he himself Matth. 15, 24. says: "I am not sent but to the lost sheep of Israel"; he also forbade the apostles not to go among the Gentiles; and here he says to Moses: "I will preach before you. As if to say, "I will personally preach to your people alone, and to circumcised Israel, especially to the wretched, whom you have humiliated with the law; as Isa. 61:1 says, "He has sent me to preach the gospel to the wretched. So the gospel is nothing else but the word of Christ, the Son of God, in which he preaches to us all grace and mercy, in the name of God the Father, who sent him for this purpose, and does everything himself through him in us.

1) Erlanger: "Rabben." "Raben" - rabbis; cf. Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. XX, 2093, 2103.

This is the transition before Moses and his people, in which he knew us and all God's goodness was shown to us, and yet the glory of his divine being was not merely seen, nor will it be. For this does not belong to this life, but when we have died, then it shall come to pass, as he says Ex. 33:20: "No living man shall see me." This does not mean that God will never see a man, but rather that the resurrection of the dead is promised, since we will see Him. Alone it is said of this life. "No man," he says, "shall see me and live," that is, man may see me, but he must not live, must die first, and come into another life; there it shall not be denied him. Then he will understand that I am merciful to him whom I have been merciful; and that I have not been merciful to him at all, either for his righteousness or for the works of the law.

120 I know that this Hebrew word preach can also mean to call, to name, to read; as also Lyra and Burgensis testify, according to which it has a different letter and a different one around it; but as it stands here, with the little word "in" [X], it is commonly called preach, Gen. 4, 26. 12, 8. 13, 4. And whether the rabbis or quarrelsome Hebrews do not accept this, I do not care; I am satisfied, as I have often said, when Mosi's word, after the good manner of the Hebrew language, so finely and gladly detaches itself and gives way to the New Testament from the rabbis' compulsory interpretation, that everyone must say (whoever knows the language, whether he is not already a Christian or not) that the word "in" is a Christian.

would be): Well, if the Christians' faith is right, then Moses truly had their way with these words; for the words rhyme nowhere so finely and surely as in the New Testament. And in this way I would gladly take the whole Hebrew Bible from the Jews, from their shameful, blasphemous glosses; but it is not one man's work, it is enough to show others, who are more learned than I, an example or my good will, that they do it more and better.

121] And this is what follows in this place [Ex. 33:21-23]: "And the LORD said unto Moses, Behold, there is a place by me, where thou shalt stand upon the rock; and when my glory shall pass, I will put thee in the cleft of the rock, and will hold my hand upon thee, until I pass by. And when I remove my hand from thee, thou shalt see my hindmost, but my face cannot be seen." Here also two persons speak Jehovah. One speaks, "When my glory shall pass away"; this is the person of the Father speaking of the passing away of his glory, that is, of his Son; and he himself the Son speaks, "Let it be he that passeth away. All this is said of Christ, God and man, passed here on earth; as is heard above [§§ 115. 116].

The other thing, when he says, "There is a place with me," and what he says about the rock and his hand over Moses until he passes by, I understand to mean that God, for the sake of the future rock, Christ, still protected and preserved the people of the law, or Israel, under his patience, because they could not keep the law. In which way Paul speaks Rom. 3, 25, that the sin, which remained under the law with divine patience, was forgiven at this time, when Christ came with his passing away 2c. But after this transgression God has taken away the hand of such patience and protection of the rock. For the law is finished and fulfilled, [we] have no right to the patience or protection of the coming Christ. Yes, he is damned who still believes in Christ in the future and still wants to stand with Moses in the rock under God's hand. The rock and the hand are gone, we have the Lord and his transition, until which God's protection and patience should last. We see now after him what he has made before us, 1) that is what is his hindmost, what he has left us behind, namely, that he died God and man for us and rose from the dead; and therefore may mankind be called his back or hindmost, in which we recognize him in this life, until we come there, where we shall also see his face and glory.

123) Moses makes the Lord such a preacher in the following 34th chapter, v. 5 ff: "And the Lord (Jesus Christ) came down in a cloud, and stood with him (Moses) there, and preached in the name of the Lord. And the LORD passed over before him, and cried (preached), O LORD God, merciful and gracious, patient, and [of] great 2) kindness, and true, who keepeth his kindness to a thousand generations, who forgiveth sin, iniquity, and transgression, before whom no man is innocent, who visiteth the iniquity of the fathers upon the children, and upon the children's children, unto the third and fourth generations." Here the Latin Bible is wrong, whoever did it, which puts "Mosen" where "HErr" should stand. 3) [It] may have seemed unreasonable to such a master that the HErr should preach or call from the HErrn, which is better suited to Mosi. Burgensis also pleases me well, who holds that the text thus stands in the Hebrew: And the HErr went over before him and called (or preached) the HErrn HErrn GOtt, the 4) merciful, the gracious; in accusativo, or, as we say it in German: He preached of the HErrn HErrn GOtt. But it is and remains the same opinion; for it is the same in German, den HErrn, and von dem HErrn predigen.

(124) Well, this is also a bright text, that the Lord is a preacher, and preaches in the name of the Lord; there are two lords named, and yet they are not two gods nor lords; yes, the Lord, he says, preaches from the Lord, from the Lord, from the God; "Lord" is written twice, and God with it, of which there are three; nor do they have to be three gods. It is said above [§ 116 ff.] what it means,

The Lord preaches in the name of the Lord, namely, that Jesus Christ is this preacher, God and man, who was sent by the Father in the name of his Father and preached by his Father to Moses, that is, to the people of Moses, about all grace and mercy, so that no one can be justified by the law, because no one keeps it. He preaches the same sermon here in other words, saying: "The Lord comes to Moses and preaches. Why does he stand with Moses and not over him or far from him? The two preaching ministries, law and gospel, must be with each other, though the transactions are unequal. For Moses preaches of sins, and thereby kills; Christ preaches of grace, and thereby makes alive. But grace can create nothing where sin is not first revealed and recognized through the law. The Lord Christ himself says in Matth. II, 5 [15, 24] that he preaches the gospel to the miserable and to the lost sheep of Israel, that is, those who feel lost because of the law.

What does the Lord preach to Moses and before Moses? He preaches, he says, of the Lord God, gracious and merciful 2c. That is, that three persons are One God, before whom nothing is counted but merit from the law, which are nothing before him, and in truth are nothing; but only grace and mercy, goodness and faithfulness, who forgives sin, transgression, and iniquity, and no man is innocent before him. If then you want to call God by His right name, as it is written here, that He is a forgiver of sins, merciful and gracious, and no one is innocent before Him, you do not have to make much boasting about Him, whether you are Moses, John, or whoever you want; but you must say with St. Paul, Rom. 3, 23. All the world is guilty before God, and lack glory in God," or that they must not say they are innocent and righteous before God; otherwise, they will remain subject to the last part, where he says [v. 5]: He searches out the iniquity of the fathers to the fourth generation; as Christ also says Marc. 16, 16: He who does not believe is condemned.

126 And notice that it does not say here, as in the first commandment, Exodus 20:6, "He who shows mercy to the thousandth member, to them, who love me, and keep my commandments"; but for this it is written, "There is none innocent before him," that is, no one loves him, nor keeps his commandments, without those alone who boast no merit; but believe and call God gracious and merciful, and a forgiver of sins, but confess themselves guilty, and pray in the Lord's Prayer [Matth. 6, 12.], "Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us." This means nothing else, but grace preached; not what we should do, as the Ten Commandments demand, and do not do; but what God wants to do with grace to us, and has done; as the New Testament teaches and testifies to us. Now we have the preacher who reveals himself to Mosi and prophesies what he wants to preach in the New Testament. And as he prophesied at that time with Moses, so we see it fulfilled in the New Testament, namely, that no one shall be justified and saved by his own righteousness, but only by the grace of God, which is preached to us through this preacher, his dear Son.

127 Now that Moses asks the Lord to go with him and not to let them go, and the Lord answers that he will go with them and do great miracles, he is reconciled with the people, renounces the covenant, writes other tablets, and briefly summarizes the Old Testament's commandments and service, how they should live and do. But of grace and forgiveness, as above [vv. 6, 7], there is nothing here. And the opinion is: Moses now has the comforting promise of the New Testament, since the Lord Himself wants to preach and rule; now he asks, because this people is commanded to him to teach and to rule until the New Testament, that the Lord be with him. For what shall I do? [Ex. 34:9, It is a stiff-necked wicked people. If you are not with us, forgiving sin and bearing it patiently until you yourself come and become a preacher of grace, we will be lost for hours. We must have your divine patience and protection in this regime, since we are to preach your law and yet will not keep it. And this is exactly what is said in the 33rd chapter, v. 22, about the protection and hand of God in the cleft of the rock.

128. for GOD answers and says

[Now I will do it, and will make a covenant with all thy people, and will do wonders which are not done in all the land, and among all the heathen: and all the people among whom thou art shall see the work of the LORD, how wonderful it is that I will do with thee. Watch and keep what I command you today 2c. This is all said of the Old Testament and Moses' people; as also follows of the casting out of the Amorites, Cananites, Hittites 2c. which was done in the Old Testament. And with diligence he avoids the word: "My people"; but calls them Mosi's people, "your people", and among whom you are. Yet, as I have promised, I will keep my hand over it, I will guard it in the rock, I will do great wonders that have never been done among all the nations. And it is true, read the Old Testament through and through, and you will see how many great miracles God has done in this people, from Moses to Christ, even though they are not his people, that is, not of grace, but of law; except for those who understood Moses and put their hope in Christ; the rest have been vain saints of works, and stiff-necked, glorified 1) lawmakers.

But notice how the text makes it clear that the Lord who speaks to Moses is Jesus Christ, the future preacher of the New Testament; for he also speaks differently of himself and of the Father, when he says Ex 34:10: "All your people shall see the miraculous work of the Lord," which I will do. Behold, it is the miraculous work of the Lord, of which he now speaks, and yet he will do it, which the Lord does; just as he also speaks John 5:19, "What the Father does, that also does the Son." Item, v. 17: "My Father works until now, and I also work." Item, v. 21: "As the Father raiseth the dead. As the Father raises the dead and brings them to life, so the Son also brings to life those whom He wills." This means that John is the same as Moses, and Moses is the same as John, and almost rhymes with the same word. Here are different two persons, father and son (like Jo-

2) "with" is missing in the Erlanger.

The Lord who speaks of the Lord and does the Lord's miraculous work (as Moses says) is one and the same, not two and the same work; therefore it must be no more than one Lord and God.

130. item, so further in the same place [v. 23.] the Lord speaks with Moses, and says: "Three times in the year every child shall appear before the ruler, the Lord God Israel." Here again the Lord speaks of the ruler, the Lord GOD Israel. For these are not the words of Moses, but of the Lord, who speaks to Moses, and commands him the Old Testament, which he wants to protect and bear with patience until his own future transition, as is said above 119) enough. Whether the ravens and the Jews interpret all this differently, and despise our understanding, that is right; God's enemy shall not see God's word. But what they spit here about this text is not worth that a sow or an ass should read, if they could read at all. Moses' face has horns, and shines too brightly that they cannot see into it; but we have Moses, that his words, unconstrained, natural in speech, so cordially and sweetly agree with the New Testament. And although he must rule the stiff-necked, wicked people of his time in the Old Testament, he also prophesies powerfully of Jesus Christ our Lord, that he is a true man, and with the Father and the Holy Spirit, in a distinct person, one true God, who does all that the Lord does. That is enough for us, we want to be called fools and unlearned in the Scriptures, and leave the Jews and Turks their high wisdom in their land of sleeping monkeys.

(131) Well, believe each one for himself what he will, I believe and know for certain that I and all Christians have Moses for us, and that he is a true Christian, yes, a teacher of Christians. [It does not hurt that he is still in his cap, and dressed in the Old Testament, as if he were not a Christian, like a pious monk, like St. Bernard, who walks as a monk, but is still in his faith a true, earnest Christian, who does not build, insist, and defy on his cap or order, like the rest of the crowd, but only on the grace of Jesus Christ; as he himself is.

often testifies. So Moses lets the other bunch boast of the law and circumcision, always goes along in such cap; but his heart, faith and confession is Jesus Christ, Son of God 2c. Now if we have Moses, that is, the master and ruler, then his disciples, the prophets, will fall to us with multitudes after him, for they believe, confess and teach nothing else that neither Moses, their preceptor, does.

But where shall we put them, the beloved guests? This booklet is too small, [I] cannot put them all in here, so Moses cannot come all the way in. So let us do this: Let us go to them and eat with them; they have the kitchen and the cellar better prepared than we, and they can give us plenty of food and dine wonderfully. That is, each one take the prophets before him, read them diligently, and notice where the Lord Jehovah, Jesus Christ, speaks differently, or where he is spoken of. For now you have heard that it is he who speaks to Moses on Mount Sinai, guides Moses and the people, and performs miracles. And though he is not the only one who does them, but the Father and the Holy Spirit do all and one work with him, yet he reveals himself with such speaking and doing that he is a distinct person from the Father, in the one divine essence. And indeed, whoever understands so much in the Scriptures (which not everyone respects) that he can notice where the person speaks one from the other, as if there were more than one, he has soon seen the difference which is the Father's or the Son's person. But if you have the difference of the Father and the Son, then the person of the Holy Spirit is also different.

As Psalm 2, 7: "The Lord said to me: You are my son, today I have begotten you. And here, in Genesis, Ex. 33, 19.: "The LORD preacheth in the name of the LORD." Gen. 19:24: "The LORD rained down brimstone and fire from the LORD." Here you see quickly that the LORD who rains is the Son, from the LORD, that is, from the Father; for the Son is from the Father, and not again. Hof. 1, 7: "Thus saith the LORD; I will have mercy upon the house of Judah, and will save them by the LORD their God, and not by sword and bow" 2c. Zephaniah 3:9, saith the LORD:

"I will turn to the nations a clean lip, that they all may call or preach in the name of the LORD, and serve him with one shoulder." Ps. 45, 8.: "Therefore hath thy God anointed thee with the oil of gladness?"; and, v. 12.: "The king shall delight in thy beauty: for he is thy God, and thou shalt worship him." Jer. 23:5, 6: "In that day will I raise up unto David a righteous plant; and that shall be his name, that he shall be called, O LORD, which is our righteousness."

But if the person does not manifest himself differently by speech, so that there seems to be no more than one person, then you may keep the rule given above [§ 132], so that you do not do wrong when you point the name Jehovah to our Lord Jesus Christ, Son of God. Of this take a fine example Isa. 50, 1: "Thus saith the LORD, Where is your mother's bill of divorcement, that I may leave her?" Here the Lord means the person of the Son, although he does not speak differently of his person, as Lyra and others also interpret it. And has pleased me many years ago, that Lyra goes out so freely, "Thus saith the LORD, that is, JESus Christ." But if one reads the whole chapter after this piece (for Isaiah does not speak a word here, but the Lord speaks everything), it is found that the person of the Son, Jesus Christ, speaks here, not only according to the Godhead, but also according to humanity. For he speaks Isa. 50, 6: "My back I have given to them that smote me, and my cheeks to them that reproached me; and I hid not my face from shame and spittle: for the LORD help me" 2c. Read the whole chapter and you will find that God is the Lord who suffers and has help from the Lord, that is, Christ is true God and man.

135 Such an example, since there is no clear difference of person, is taken from the epistle to the Hebrews, Cap. 1, 6, and speaks from the 97th Psalm, v. 7: "When he brings in the firstborn into the world, he says: And all the angels of God shall worship him. Here one sees no special sign that such a psalm is to be understood by Jesus Christ, God's Son, without it saying in the beginning: "The Lord has become King, the earth rejoices", which is a Jew or spiritless man would not be allowed to be said of Christ. But the Spirit confesses that no person has become King except the Son; as the other Psalm testifies, v. 6: "I have set my King on my holy mountain Zion." 1 Chron. 18, 14: "I will set him in my kingdom forever." But that he is true God, this Psalm testifies, saying, "Let all the angels of God worship him"; Hebrew, then, "Worship him, all gods." "Gods" here cannot mean GOtt, who is not many, but only one GOtt; therefore he interprets it "angels." But he is the God whom they worship, Jesus Christ, the Son of God. Therefore, those who understand this Psalm of Christ, as the epistle does, do not do wrong, although they do not see the difference of the person.

136. item, since the same epistle [Cap. 1, 10. 11.] leads from the 102nd Psalm, v. 26. 27: "You founded the earth in the beginning, and the heavens are the work of your hands; they will pass away, but you remain. "2c. Nor does reason find any sign here that this was spoken and understood differently from Jesus Christ, as the epistle says, and would have found other brighter sayings in the Psalter; but he gives us such an example that we should look for Christ in the Scriptures, because he is certainly God and Creator, with the Father and the Holy Spirit; so that no one can do wrong who says of him that he is the one who created heaven and earth. But still we should diligently seek the different revelation of the person of the Son, and look at the words that give and reveal his person differently. Whoever does not have it better, let him accept this, which God promised David, 1 Chron. 18, 11, that his son Messiah should build God a house and be Lord and King in it forever, of which many psalms have been made.

This Psalm [Ps. 102, 14. f.] also prophesies of such a house and building, and anxiously asks that he will come and build Zion. This cannot be said of the fleshly Zion, which stood built then, which was not the house of God nor Zion, which David's son was to build and be king in it. Thus we have heard above [§ 23 ff.] that this builder and master of the house must be God.

and yet the Son of David. Therefore, the epistle leads this psalm right to the person of Jesus Christ, who is indeed One God and Creator with God the Father and the Holy Spirit, but with the building of God's house and kingdom is revealed as a different person than the Father. So also this is a different sign that Christ, the Son of God, is the seed of Abraham, through whom all the Gentiles shall be blessed and obey Him. Gen. 22:18, 49:10: "The Gentiles shall obey Shiloh," and Ps. 2:8: "Cry unto me, and I will give thee the Gentiles for an inheritance." This Psalm also speaks of such a kingdom among the Gentiles, and thus paints the person of the Son w.

Summa, there is One God, One Lord, One Divine Majesty, nature and essence of all three persons; but sometimes the person of the Father, sometimes of the Son, sometimes of the Holy Spirit is revealed. Whichever one is revealed, it is the one God in three persons, so that we may recognize the divine majesty correctly, and not, as Jews, heretics, Mahomet, blindly believe, as if God were nothing more than one person; God does not want that, but wants to be known, as He reveals Himself to us. And God is especially concerned with the revelation and knowledge of His Son, through all the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments; everything is directed to the Son. For the Scriptures are given for the sake of the Messiah or the Seed of the Son, who is to restore all that the serpent has corrupted: to take away sin, death, wrath; to restore innocence, life, paradise and the kingdom of heaven. And just as the fall of Adam happened, that he pushed himself differently against the Son, and yet at the same time sinned against all three persons, as the one God, so God again let His Son alone and differently become man, so that Adam would be raised up again through the Son differently, against whom he had pushed himself and fallen, and yet such raising up or redemption of all three persons is one and the same, as the work of the one God.

139. For when the serpent, the devil, wanted to fell Adam, he incited him against the Son differently, saying: "You will become like God. This was the son's

Both the devil and Adam wanted to deprive the Son of His honor, for only the Son is like, or the image of the invisible God, Col. 1:15, and the image of His divine being, who is like the Father in One Godhead, Heb. 1:3. And the devil had previously done the same thing in heaven, and learned with his angels about the same image, the Son of God; he did not let it suffice that he was the most beautiful image of God among all the angels (yet not born from eternity, but created in the beginning), but also wanted to be the inward, natural image of God, equal to the Son; as the fathers wrote the saying Isa. 14, 12-14. under the name of the king of Babylon: "How art thou fallen, O beautiful morning star? who said in thine heart, I will go up to heaven, and be like the most high God." For this reason the person of the Son was manifested in a different way, and became man, so that we, who had stumbled and fallen against His divinity, might rise again in Him through His humanity. So then, all Scripture, as I have said, is all Christ, Son of God and Son of Mary; all is to do with the same Son, that we may know Him differently, and thus see the Father and the Holy Spirit, One God, eternally. To him who has the Son, the Scriptures are open, and the greater and greater his faith in Christ becomes, the brighter the Scriptures shine for him.

[Of both natures in Christ.] 1)

If then you believe and understand that Christ is truly God and man, as the Scriptures teach us, see to it, and learn further to be sure that you do not separate the person of Christ, nor combine the two natures, or the divine and human natures, into one being, but distinguish the nature here, and keep the person one.

141. for here also many clever ones have come up against each other, that they either want to make Godhead and mankind One Nature, or else two persons, as Nestorius and Eutyches with their equals; but the Jews and Turks are excellently high and over high in spirit here, and consider us Christians to be great fools. If he is God (they say), how can he die as a man? for God is immortal. If he is a man, how can he be God's son? for God has no wife. Here it goes, as one speaks: Money has honor, said the frog, and sat on a penny. Here the high, high, even higher, and most highly intelligent people, the Turks, Jews, teach us that God cannot die and has no wife; how would or could we poor Christians know such a high thing more and more, if it were not shown to us mad geese and ducks by such exceedingly high masters that God has no wife and cannot die? It would be no wonder that, where a Jew or Turk walks, the earth under him would become so joyful before such a high spirit that it would leap over the sky with him, and the sky would likewise fall down before such great wisdom, with stars, suns and moons, at the feet of the Jews, Turks, or in the abyss of hell, for it is, indeed, an incomprehensible wisdom that God has no wife, nor can he die. O Lord God, Christians know nothing of this! Who would order God a wet nurse? Where did he want to get a maid? Who wanted to bury him? Who wanted to whistle and dance at his wedding? Who wanted to hold his soul masses? 2) Fie on Christians for worshipping a mortal God and making a married man out of him! Blessed, blessed are Mahomet and Rabbis, who teach us much better. Fie, fie you nonsensical Mahomet! should you be called a prophet, you who are such a rude fool and ass?

Let these miserable fools depart, and think themselves wise, until they have had enough; but hold fast the Christian faith, which teacheth us by the Scriptures, that JESUS CHRIST is truly God, and the Son of God, and also truly man, the Son of David, and the Son of Mary; yet not two sons, or two men, or two persons; but one only Son, and one only Person, of and in two distinct natures, the Godhead and the Manheity. For as above, in the article on the Godhead, you must be careful not to combine three persons into one person, nor to separate the essence or nature into three gods, but to keep three different persons in one divine essence: so here again you must be careful not to divide or separate the one person into two persons, or to combine the two natures into one nature, but to keep two different natures in one unified person. And just as the two natures unite in one person, so also the names of both natures unite in the name of the one person; which is called in Latin communicatio idiomatum vel proprietatum. Thus, man is called and is born of the Virgin Mary, and crucified by the Jews; the same name shall be given to the Son of God, and say: God is born of Mary, and crucified by the Jews; for God and man are One Person, and not two sons, one of God, the other of Mary; but is one Son, of God and Mary.

143. Now if you were to say, as Nestorius did, that God, or Jesus, the Son of God, was not born of Mary, nor crucified of the Jews, but only man, the Son of Mary, behold, you make two persons, and separate the one person, that there is another person who is born and crucified, and another person who is not born nor crucified, and thus each nature becomes for itself a distinct person, and two distinct sons; which is as much as that God did not become man, but God remains for Himself a separate person from man, and man for himself a separate person from God. This is no good, this does not suffer the Scripture, which speaks Joh. 1, 14.: "And the Word became flesh." Luc. 1, 35.: "That which is born in you shall be called the Son of the Most High, the Son of God." And the infant faith says: "I believe in Jesus Christ, the Son of God, who was conceived by the Holy Spirit, born of Mary of virgins" 2c., does not say that the Son of God is another, but the same who is born of Mary and becomes her son.

144 Again, if you would say, as Eutyches did, that the man JEsus, Mary

Son, is not the Creator of heaven and earth, or is not the Son of God, whom one should worship; as also recently a mad spirit pretended great grudges, how dangerously we Christians lived, that we worshipped a creature for God; the nonsensical fool reads no scripture nor books, but dreams out of his own mad head of such high things, and is a self-growing master klügel: Behold, here the person is separated again, and two persons are made out of one. Nestorius separates the persons in such a way that he tears mankind from the Godhead, and makes every nature a special person, so that man alone is especially crucified. Eutyches, on the other hand, separates the Godhead from mankind, so that he also makes every nature a special person, so that God should be worshipped as separated from mankind. But the Scriptures and the faith speak thus: When we worship the man born of Mary, we do not worship a separate man who is a separate person in himself, without God and apart from God, but we worship the one true God, who is one God with the Father and the Holy Spirit, and one person with mankind.

(145) He who does not have this understanding must err in the Scriptures, and cannot be trusted anywhere. For in the Scriptures Messiah is called God's servant, Isa. 42, 1. "Behold, this is my servant in whom I am well pleased"; and on the 53rd, v. 1 [Cap. 52, 13.]: "Behold, my servant shall go wisely"; yes, he is called "a worm, and not a man," Ps. 22, 7. 22, 7. And, more gruesome, he is called a poor sinner, Ps. 41, 5. "I said, Lord, be merciful to me, heal my soul, for I have sinned against thee." Ps. 69, 6: "God, you know my foolishness, and my debts are not hidden from you." Item, v. 10.: "The reproach of them that reproach thee is upon me." Ps. 40:13: "Sorrows have surrounded me without number; my sins have taken hold of me, that I cannot see; theirs is more than the hair of my head, and my heart hath forsaken me." Here reason, Jew and Mahomet cries out over us Christians: How can such be understood by God? How can God be a servant? How can he be a wretched sinner? Help God,

What nonsensical, mad, monstrous people we Christians are before such high, wise, holy people, who worship no creature, but only the one God.

It is true that reason does not find this in its Bible, that is, in the smoke hole, or in the land of the sleeping monkeys. Neither do the Jews find it in their Bible, that is, in the Talmud, among the Säupirzel, as they study their Schamhaperes inside. Mahomet also does not find it in his Bible, that is, in the whore bed; for therein he has studied the most; as he boasts, the disgraceful filth, that God (the devil) has given him so much strength of his body that forty women may not be enough for him to bed. 1) Yes, just as he studied in the same bible, in the whores' flesh, so also his chaste book, the Alkoran, is luscious and tasty; he has sought and found the spirit of his prophecy in the right place, in the Venus mountain. Who then studies in such books, what wonder is it that he knows nothing of God, nor of Messiah; if they know not what they speak or do?

We Christians know (praise and thanks to God for eternity!) that Messiah is God's only eternal Son, whom He sent into the world to take our sin upon Himself, to die for us, and to overcome death for us; as Is. 53, 6. 10. clearly says: "We all went astray, but God laid all our sin upon Him, and He gave His life as a guilt offering" 2c. Therefore we sing and boast with all joy that God's Son, the right one God with the Father and Holy Spirit, became man for us, a servant, a sinner, a worm; God died, God bore our sin on the Cross, in His own body; God redeemed us by His own blood. For God and man are One Person; what man does, suffers and speaks here, that God does, suffers and speaks; and what God does and speaks, that man does and speaks, who is one Son, God's and Mary's, in One undivided Person, and two different natures. The devil, and his fornicator and whore-hunter Mahomet, and his shame-haperists, the Jews, may be angry at this, blaspheme, curse (who can't leave it); but all together they shall tremble in the abyss of hell eternally for it, rattle their teeth and howl, there shall not belong long(whether God wills), amen.

148. Here I will stop this time to speak of these high articles from the Old Testament, for I hope that our Hebrew scholars are hereby admonished enough that they should take the Old Testament from the rabbis wherever they can, regardless of their interpretation, glosses, or grammars, because the rabbis themselves often do not know each other in this, where they are at home, and like to equivocate the vocabula and sentences to their great intellect, since the letter likes to rhyme with the New Testament, and it is certain that Jesus Christ is the Lord over all, to whom the Scriptures should bear witness, as they alone are given for his sake. This time I did not want to lead much to the New Testament, because in it everything is clear (that is why the Jews do not accept it), now at 1500 years; and especially in the Gospel of John, where almost above the other word (as one speaks) Jesus is preached as God and man, in one person. The same John, together with other apostles, evangelists, and many thousands of their disciples, were also Jews, or Israel and Abraham's seed by blood, as well and much purer and more certain than these present Jews or Israel are, whom no one knows who they are, or where they come from.

If we want to believe the Jews or Israel, then we should believe these Jews and Israel, who for 1500 years have publicly ruled the church throughout the world through their gospel, have overcome devils, death and sin, have interpreted the scriptures of the prophets, and have always performed miracles for and through their disciples. I say that we should believe such true, known Jews and Israelites more cheaply than we should believe the false, unknown Jews or Israelites, who for these 1500 years have done no miracle, interpreted no scripture of the prophets, perverted everything, and in the light have publicly done nothing, but in their corner, like the children of darkness, that is, of the devil, have vainly blasphemed, cursed, murdered and lied against the true Jews and Israelites.

(That is, against the apostles and prophets) have practiced, and still practice daily: that they may be proved to be neither Israel nor Abraham's seed, but poisonous, devilish enemies of the right of Israel and Abraham's children, and thieves, robbers, and transgressors of the holy Scriptures. Therefore, as of public thieves, one should again take the Scriptures, where the Grammatica gladly exists, and rhymes with the New Testament; as the apostles give us examples abundantly enough.

150 I will therefore return to the last words of David, as I began this booklet, and tie the little wreath together with the end and beginning, for I have rambled enough. Others can and will (I hope) do better, and search diligently for the Lord Christ in the Old Hebrew Testament, for he can be found gladly in it, especially in the Psalter and Isaiah. Try it according to the rule given above [§ 32 f.], and you will believe me and thank God. Now, I have begun this booklet in such a way that David's last words should be interpreted and understood according to Christian understanding, in this way:

V. 1-3. David the son of Jesse spoke; the man assured of the Messiah of the God of Jacob spoke sweetly with Psalms Israel: The Spirit of the LORD has spoken through me, and his speech has been through my tongue; the God of Israel has spoken to me, the refuge of Israel has spoken, the righteous ruler among men, the ruler in the fear of God.

151 Three speakers are here (as said above [§ 11]), the Spirit of the Lord, the God of Israel, the hoard of Israel; and yet is one speaker. But by the third, which is, by the "Hoard of Israel," it is written, "The ruler among men, the ruler in the fear of GOD." This ruler is Messiah, as the Chaldean text also gives. Now in the Hebrew it hangs on one another, namely, "The stronghold of Israel, the righteous ruler, theruler in the fear of GOD." But it is certain that XXXXX XXX is called the Hori Israel, and is God Himself; and yet is also Messiah, the man and ruler in the fear of God. "Ruler" here is Hebrew XXXX, which does not mean HErr, like Gott HErr but as men are lords and reign; and where God is so called, thou mayest boldly understand Jesus Christ there. As when Gideon speaks Judges. 8, 23: "I will not be your lord, neither shall my son be your lord, but the LORD shall be your lord." Ps. 22, 29.: "The LORD has a kingdom, and he rules among the nations." Ps. 59, 14.: "The God of Jacob is ruler in all the earth." So also Psalm 8, 7, speaks of Christ: "You will make him ruler over the work of your hands; you have put everything under his feet", which is just as much as David says here that he is "the guardian of Israel" (that is God) and "righteous ruler" (that is man) over everything that God has made. That is, to be like God, and yet also to be man.

He calls him a "righteous ruler. This is not speaking of worldly, temporal righteousness, of which David otherwise made a beautiful psalm, namely the 101st psalm, "Of grace and justice I will sing", but of the eternal righteousness, which Messiah brought into the world, and redeemed us from sins, and made us righteous. For, as follows, he speaks of the eternal covenant that God established with David's house, as Isaiah also understands it in the 55th chapter, v. 3: "I will keep you faithful to the grace promised to David"; and Ps. 89, 3, 5: "An everlasting grace will be established, and you will keep your truth faithful in heaven." For this, worldly righteousness is much too small, which, where it is best (which seldom happens), hardly preserves outward peace, resists murder, robbery, adultery, theft, etc., for with this one is nowhere righteous before God, although He rewards them temporally and gloriously with riches, honor, power, happiness, etc., which before God are bad, small, perishable rewards, which He also gives to His enemies more abundantly than to His dear children, who have a better reward to hope for, of which the world knows nothing.

Therefore the Rabbis and their followers have no understanding, because they think that David was said to be righteous and to live godly, because he was set up as a king and ruler. No, it is another man, this ruler in righteousness and godliness. David has by his regiment

Not one man made righteous and godly, not even himself, not even Moses with his law, Rom. 3, 10. 24. but are all made righteous and godly through this ruler Messiah and shepherd of Israel, Jehovah Christ; as also Zechariah Cap. 9, 9, says: "Rejoice, O daughter of Zion, behold, your King comes to you meekly, a righteous man and a Savior, riding on an ass" 2c. And Paul 1 Cor. 1, 30. 31: "He is made unto us of GOD wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption: that whosoever shall boast (as it is written), let him boast of the LORD," and not of our own righteousness, wisdom 2c. For this is his dominion. For this reason he is set up as Lord, to do such works among men, to make them righteous, and to restore them to godliness, innocence and obedience, from which we fell in paradise through the serpent's wiles. It is not necessary to speak of this righteousness and fear of God here; it is our daily sermon how we are justified and saved in Christ alone, by pure grace. Follows: 1)

v. 4. and as the light of the morning, when the sun goes out in the morning without clouds, when from the brightness after the rain the grass grows out of the earth.

He compares the reign or kingdom of Messiah, who is to restore and establish righteousness and the fear of God, to the beautiful, lovely nature of winter; for winter, because the sun departs from us, covers the earth with frost, ice, and snow, so that all trees become bare, all plants dull, and nothing grows green, nor blossoms, nor bears fruit, and everything is to be seen as a dead world. But when, toward summer, the sun comes to us again, the earth is refreshed, everything grows green and blossoms, everything springs up beautifully, everything becomes new, and the world is alive and joyful again. For all people, even the pagans, consider the Lenzen the merriest part of the year, as Virgilius writes: Tunc formosissimus annus;<sup>3</sup>) and considers it that the world is in the month of Lenzen, which is in accordance with the Holy Scripture, because Moses sets April as the first month of the year. So the reign and kingdom of grace is also a happy, joyful time, in which Messiah makes us righteous and godly, so that we grow green, blossom, smell good, grow and become fruitful. For he is the sun of righteousness that comes near to us again, as Malachi Cap. 4:2, "The sun of righteousness shall rise for you who fear my name, and salvation shall be under his wings." Therefore he also wanted to rise bodily from the dead in the spring or April, in the merry time, and to begin his reign, even though he was born in winter, that is, because of our sin he gave himself to all kinds of sorrow and death of Adam, and thus endured the hard winter for 33 years.

1) "Follows" is missing in the Erlanger.

(155) For as the prophet David signifies the blessed time of grace through Lenzen, which appears to us through Messiah his son, so he indicates that the winter signifies the antitype, namely, the time of disgrace under original sin, which we have through Adam's fall. And God has thus in His creation presented sin and grace to us for eternal remembrance until the last day (when other years, earth and heaven will be), so that they are preached to us daily and yearly through winter and summer, when we have ears to hear and eyes to see. According to this spiritual interpretation, Adam was first in the beautiful Lenzen (since he was also created bodily<sup>1</sup>) in Lenzen, in the beginning of the year), but soon brought the spiritual winter upon himself through sin, which Christ, the dear sun, drove out again, and began Lenzen. And so it goes: He who lives in the winter never dies; he who dies in the winter never lives; that is: "He who believes and is baptized will be saved, he who does not believe will be condemned" [Marc. 16, 16.]. For to him the sun escapes, to him the sun rises, of which David prophesies here.

156 Not only that of winter and summer David means, but rather and closer

This mystery, that Messiah's rule should not be like Moses' rule. Mosi's rule is the rule of the law, which not only does not take away sin, but also increases it, that is, reveals how great and abominable it is, and punishes it, thereby frightening man, and (to speak so) making him hostile to God's judgments and His law, by which he is condemned and killed in his sin. This is Mount Sinai, where it thunders, thunders, rains, and earthquakes, as if heaven and earth were about to fall, and the sun is hidden much deeper behind the dark clouds, whether it is in the season of lightning or in winter, when it sometimes shines brightly, but the sun's power is too far away from us. For the Gentiles so live without law in the unknown sins of winter, much safer are neither God's people, who must suffer thunder and lightning even at the time of the leniency of the law. For where the sun, Christ, does not shine brightly, there also the spring is not merry, but Moses makes it with the thunder of the law all frightened and quite deadly. So the weather in the sky is also an eternal prophet, so that sometimes the law also hastens us in our conscience, who are nevertheless in the time of grace.

But here, in Messiah's time, when he himself shall reign to make us righteous and blessed with grace, it will be as pleasant as the best time of the year, when before day there is a pleasant, warm rain, that is, the comforting gospel is preached; and immediately thereafter the sun, Christ, rises in our hearts, through right faith, without Moses' clouds, thunder, and lightning. There it grows, it greens, it blossoms, and the day is full of joy and peace, the like of which the whole year does not have. For here it is said: Winter, clouds, thunder, sin, death and all terror overcome, and a beautiful, joyful Easter day kept until eternity. Behold, this is called the reign of David, his Son Messiah, like a day in the spring, when it rains early, and the sun rises most lovely, and makes green and flourishing, smelling, and everything lively and cheerful. Ask yourself if it is not the best and happiest time of the year. Follows:

V. 5. For my house is not so with God; for he hath made me a covenant for ever, and all things are well ordered and kept.

158. it is said from 1 Chron. 18, 16. that these words: "My house is not so with God", should mean so much: "Oh, what am I? what is my house, against God?" Indeed, there is not such a house worthy of such unspeakable honors with GOD, from which Messiah, the XXXXX XXX, GOD's son, the righteous ruler among men, shall be born. And hereby David falls down in great humility and wonder that from his flesh and blood such great things shall come.

The other piece, of the eternal covenant and the house of David, I have dealt with quite enough in the booklet of the Jews, 1) and have thus given others cause to go further and better. The following two words, XXXXX and XXXX, well ordered and kept, are set with diligence, for teaching and comfort. For when you look at the histories, you will think that God has forgotten his covenant and has not kept it. The house of David and his descendants are so chaotic, disorderly and strange. It has not been kept alone until Messiah, but everything has remained well and in its order, against all devils and men. And no man hath been able to change it, nor to restrain it, but hath left it to go and stand, a scepter of Judah, as it is promised, until Messiah.

160 But according to Messiah, his kingdom, the church, is outwardly to be seen, much more desolate and disorderly, that there is no more torn, miserable, null regiment or dominion, than the Christian church, Christ's dominion. Here tyrants rend it and [make] it desolate with fire, water, sword, and all power. Here, the red spirits and heresies are tearing it apart and destroying it. So do the false Christians with their evil life, as if there were no more shameful, disorderly rule on earth. And all of these are working away, or rather the wicked Spirit by them, that Christ's reign should be nothing, or ever a miserable, disorderly thing. And Summa, Christ poses as if he has forgotten his rule, and is nowhere home, that here neither XXXXX nor XXXX is seen by reason; nor is it called XXX XXXXX and XXXX.

XXXX, everything well ordered and kept. Though we see it not, yet he seeth it that saith, High, Cap. 8:12: "My vineyard is before me." Matth. 28, 20.: "Behold, I am with you to the end of the world." Joh. 16, 33.: "Be of good cheer, I have overcome the world." Nevertheless, we see that always remained and remains a people who honor the name of Christ, have His word, baptism, sacrament, key and spirit, even against all the gates of hell. Follows:

To whom all my salvation and doings are, that nothing grows.

161. He wants to say: I am also a king and lord, above all kings, ordered by God, have waged many wars, have had great fortune, victory and salvation by God's help and miraculous deed, have also done much in the regiment, have ruled well, have set up and established the kingdom well, have administered justice, and have also suffered much because of it; but such my kingdom, rather the kingdom of all kings on earth, compared to this rule of my son Messiah, the XXXXX XXX, is nothing but a dry branch, which has never grown or been founded. For I and no king have conquered the victory against death, sin, hell, the devil and the world; neither has ours done so in his reign, that he made the people righteous, godly and eternally blessed. We are poor, meager, scanty lords in our regiment; but my son Messiah, the XXXXX XXX, that is the man who has obtained the victory over sin, death, the devil, hell, the world and everything, who has a regiment in which he does and accomplishes this, that he makes all his own eternally righteous and blessed; that is, green, flourishing, fruitful, and that can never wither away.

162) I have translated the word XXX "to do" according to the example of Solomon, Ecclesiastes 3:1: "To every thing there is a season, and to every thing that is done there is an hour. For this is how one speaks German: You must do something.

so that you do not walk idly, but do something to nourish yourself. Thus "to do" is called all kinds of state in which one exercises oneself in this life; and the philosophers also call it placita, proposita, instituta, because it pleases one to do this and another to do that. For it really means to have a liking or will, desire, inclination for a thing; for he who has no will for it does not do it, or does it in such a way that it would be as good as undone.

v. 6. 7. But Belial are all like thistles cast out, which cannot be caught with hands; but he that shall attack them must have iron and spears in his hand, and shall be burned with fire in the tabernacle.

Here he prophesies about the Jews who would not accept such a Lord and Messiah, and calls them or, as we are used to, Belial, which means useless or harmful in German. According to the outward rule, they are called useless, bad boys who like to do harm. But David is speaking here in the spirit of the kingdom of Christ, where it has this way that those who are hostile to the kingdom of Christ, as Jews, heretics, pagans, are considered the most useful. For even now the Jews, Mahomet, Pabst, and the red spirits make themselves believe that they are doing vain service to God, where they can harm the true Christians. These do not want to be called, but only the most useful. Thus says Jeremiah Cap. 23:32 of the false prophets: "Their usefulness is of no use to this people," that is, they 1) are the most harmful, precisely because they want to be the most useful. Summa, the Christians are Belial's and the devil's children, but these alone are God's children; what they do is right until God casts them out and burns them with the fire of His wrath; as we see in the present Jews what a terrible fire of divine wrath has come upon them.

164. he compares them to thistles in the grain in the field, which, in my opinion, Christ the Lord calls Matth. 13, 25. zizania, which we have translated "weeds". St. Ambrose in Hexa. says: Ex tritici semine degenerans in proprium genus, which we call trespens. But Christ speaks of an aergern, which one separates from the grain in the harvest and burns with fire, and almost needs the same words as David, who also separates his thistles and burns them with fire. Therefore zizania will be here, which means David, the large, evil, thorny thistles, or the other thistles, which our farmers call great graet, which one separates with scythes, sickles and rakes or spit wood in the harvest, because with hands no one can attack them both, and serve nowhere but into the fire; but trespens are needed for the cattle. So the stubborn Jews are such evil, thorny thistles and mad graetes that they have not been and still are not to be converted by any good deed or miracle of God, but have been cast out by the Romans' iron and spears, and burned with their city in their own dwelling, even with bodily fire. Above this they still burn in themselves, where they are in misery, with spiritual fire of divine wrath. Thus David proclaimed his destruction and final ruin to this people, because they did not want this king, as the Lord prophesied Luc. 19, 43, 44, and Dan. 9, 26, Zech. 14, 2.

Herewith I will have translated and interpreted the last words of David according to my own sense. God grant that our theologians may confidently study Hebrew, and bring the Bible home to us again from the wanton thieves, and do everything better than I have done; that is, that they do not give themselves captive to the rabbis in their tortured grammatica and false interpretation, so that we may find and recognize the dear Lord and Savior brightly and clearly in the Scriptures.

To Him be praise and glory with the Father and the Holy Spirit forever and ever, Amen.
